NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ALL Good Wishes for this New Year to friends near and distant! Its first days bring to many of us sorrow for a grievous loss, but such a sorrow as will go to the deepening of what is true and pure in everyone who cherishes the memory of a true and helpful friend.

THIS year brings with it on April 21, the centenary of the birth of James Martineau. It is grievous that the celebration must now take place without the presence in Liverpool, and in his old pulpit of Hope-street Church, of that successor who so truly interpreted his teaching, and so worthily maintained the spirit of his ministry.

AT one o'clock to-day (Saturday) the funeral service of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong is to be held in Hope-street Church, prior to cremation at Anfield. The service is to be conducted by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. On Sunday morning a memorial service will be held in Hope-street Church, conducted by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, Ullet-road, and the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth being closed, that the congregations may be together on that occasion. On Sunday evening the Rev. H. D. Roberts will preach in Hope-street Church, and at Ullet-road the Rev. J. Collins Odgers will conduct a special memorial service.

We are glad to call the special attention of our readers to the suggestion of Mr. Bowie's article, "A Church for the Unattached," in which he tells of the happy thought of an American Unitarian minister, and his successful establishment of a "Church of All Souls," in the fellowship of which he ministers weekly through the post to numbers of lonely souls. The idea, it seems to us, might be very fruitful in directing the activity of our postal missions into a fresh and most beneficent channel. Fellowship and sympathy in religion is what so many solitary ones most sorely need who are repelled from the actual ministries within their reach, and such an offer as this "Church of All Souls," intangible, yet quick in its response of sympathy and counsel, might bring untold blessing into many lives.

And may we not say, while we should warmly welcome every such unseen union that was successfully maintained, that this also is our ideal? We have no more earnest desire than that THE INQUIRER should succeed in becoming such a weekly messenger to friends near and distant, an organ not simply of news, but of helpful religious ministry. Comment, criticism, controversy may often be unavoidable, but nothing is of so much worth as the direct appeal from mind to mind, and from heart to heart, of direct religious teaching, the strong, illuminating word of truth, the kindling of a passionate loyalty to righteousness, and the all-conquering power of love. We trust that during this New Year, through the co-operation of many friends, a large measure of such helpful ministry will be exercised by THE INQUIRER, and for an ever-increasing number both in this country and in distant lands.

IT was an intense relief to hear at the beginning of the week of the surrender of Port Arthur, after one of the longest and most terrible sieges of modern times, and to be spared the horrors of a final storm and fight to the death. The Japanese have behaved with magnanimity, and it is pleasant to hear of the despatch of a British man-of-war with stores and medical assistance for the wounded Russians.

WHILE the newspaper funds for the distressed rise rapidly, and with the increasing severity of the weather may spring up by greater leaps and bounds, the Lord Mayor's fund for Mr. Long's London Central Joint Committee grows only comparatively slowly. The donations, too, are mainly those semi-enforced subscriptions from City firms and companies which are expected on such an occasion The achievements of the Committee are grievously small. Two hundred men have been sent to Hadleigh, at another place one hundred have been set on work, and by the end of winter the number may rise to a thousand, and one or two hundred can be employed at Garden City; the City markets will occupy one hundred skilled men in painting, and there are already above 15,000 applicants.

THE L.C.C. and the Borough Councils are doing better, the former offering work to 960 men sent by the Committee, and the Councils having already provided employment for two thousand. These facts certainly indicate that only through public bodies can a solution be hoped for, but they suggest also that if this enormity of distressed honest men is to cease the municipalities and the central government must take their responsibility much more seriously. This can only be if they are supported by the conscience of the community resolved, as it was expressed in the last report of our Public Questions Committee of the South Eastern Assembly, to use the wealth of the country for the adequate and honourable support and welfare of all its citizens.

MEANWHILE the Committee of the Trade Union Congress and the General Federation of Trade Unions has issued a manifesto which, while it cannot be said to go to the root of the difficulty, contains some useful suggestions, and is at least more thorough than the methods of philanthropy. The resolutions condemn the existing means of public, semi-public, and private employment agencies and charity as being "when not positively harmful, defective, and inadequate." As to its proposals: something is hoped for from a better organisation of employment, especially in government works, so that work shall be averaged over the year, and not rushed into intermittent spells of hurry and overtime; then the admitted needs for works of public utility are dwelt on, works for improvement of the Thames, and the London Port, Coast Protection, not against hostile navies, but against the encroachment of the sea, with the utilisation of land so reclaimed, the acquirement of land not suited to agriculture, but good for afforestation—these are but some directions in which work is wanted not as charity, but as national policy (and to carry them out we must have a Minister of Labour, who ought to be appointed this Session).

The Committee also call for a considerable representation of trade unions on such bodies as Mr. Long's Committee, and suggest that colonies for the "respectable men temporarily distressed" from lack of employment should lead to a scheme of co-operative farming, and generally that the trade unions should be set a far larger part in this problem of the unemployed. On the whole the reflection resulting from these and other treatments of the question is that there need not be an unemployed problem, but that it rests with the united action of the community to prevent it.

THE Church disruption proceeding in Scotland has in it elements of strife and bitterness more troublesome than that of sixty years ago. The leaders of the Free Church are busy determinedly claiming legal possession of the buildings they require. They ignore the mediator appointed by the Crown, and decline to be bound by the terms of the Commission of Inquiry. They have claimed over a hundred churches, mostly in the Highlands. In every case where a claim has been considered by the Court of Session it has been allowed. In their communications with the U.F. leaders, they have all along affirmed that the blame for litigation rests with them in refusing to acknowledge the effect of the legal decision.

IN some places, impatience for possession of churches has been so great that sudden seizure was made. To prevent such in other cases, the defensive possessors have slept in the pews. In the address to adherents issued by the F.C. authorities it is stated that "not a few congregations, in addition to those existing in September last, have been organised in connection with the F.C., and are carrying on worship and Christian work. Meetings are advised and encouraged of those having sympathy with the F.C. in its desire to stand for the old faith." All that is having effect. Meetings are being held everywhere in the Lowlands. The din of discussion is omnipresent, and it is likely that the F.C. will largely augment its following.

IT is not to be expected that Scotland will all at once, and as a whole, give up its Confessional Calvinism. There may be a wider and deeper reaction than was anticipated. It is only the scarcity of men that prevents the Free Church from sweeping into it the whole body of theological conservatives. There is no progressive party in the field.

THE leaders of the United Free Church are very uneasy. They have eagerly grasped at the Commission of Inquiry in view of legislation, but no Parliamentary measure can undo what has been done. A gulf has opened between the two bodies and a breach made in Presbyterianism which cannot soon be closed.

THE stun of the "hurricane" (as Principal Rainy calls the event) seems to have made the leaders insensible to the necessity for a declaration of doctrinal advance. They have lost time in this respect. The Highland Witness for January, 1905 (the monthly organ of the U.F.C. for the north), contains a message from Principal Rainy. It candidly admits "serious losses," and calls for "more self-sacrifice and consecration" to save the work of the Church from being "crippled." But there is in it a lack of forward leading. The message acknowledges "a sharp and unexpected admonition" and "a visitation which no doubt we needed," still there is no sign given for progress of thought. The leaders have not risen to the occasion. They have trimmed, assumed an apologetic attitude, and shown more anxiety for property than for going forward to larger spiritual ground. They have endeavoured to minimise the Declaratory Acts and to show that the Church is still Calvinistic.

IT is all in vain. The solidarity of the Church is broken. Instead of rousing its own spirit for a great intellectual effort for progress, it is looking to Parliament for extrication. A Parliamentary measure may serve to preserve some property, but it will not give the Church moral force, and that is what it most needs. It has let its best opportunity go by. All along its course it refused the liberalising leaven and suppressed or cast out the progressive energies, and now, when it needs them most, they are not forthcoming.

As an outcome of one of the side movements during the Liverpool Church Congress a Central Church Body has been formed, "with the purpose of emphasising the principle, as it bears on all questions of doctrine and practice, which is laid down as to our public liturgy in the preface to the Prayer-book—viz., 'that it hath been the wisdom of the Church of England ever since the first compiling of her publick Liturgy to keep the mean between the two extremes.'" There is no doubt that the mental state which this new Association is intended to express constitutes the strength of the Church of England, and commands the allegiance of a great majority of her members. But the wisdom of seeking to define and recognise it by means of an organised society with a written constitution is not so evident. The policy of steering a safe middle course involves the negation of logic, of clear thinking, and of definite principles, for if a man is to keep midway between two independently moving squadrons, it is clear that his movements cannot at the same time be determined by any ideas or promptings of his own. If the Centre has any one characteristic virtue, it is that of decency; but is it quite safe, from that point of view, to lay down as a rule of conduct—"Keep one eye on Lord Halifax, and the other on Mr. Kensit, and see that you remain at an equal distance from both"? The Central Body had better wait until the Church is disestablished, when it will come into its own. The extremes will spring apart to their several poles, and leave the equator in comfortable possession of the middle cut.

THE most interesting of the recent utterances by Churchmen are those of the Bishop-Designate of Birmingham, who has been giving a course of sermons on Miracles, and of the Dean of Westminster, whose subject was the Inspiration of the Bible. The Dean's addresses, which have been much discussed in the daily press, are admirable in themselves, and most significant of the coercion which the new light on Christian origins is beginning to exercise over earnest minds even in creed-bound societies. The interest attaching to Dr. Gore's sermons is of another kind. It is personal. The logical texture of his work is not to be distinguished from that of ordinary apologetic. We find the same harsh misuse of premisses, the same audacious assumptions of the thing to be proved, the same manipulation of argument to reach a pre-determined conclusion. The distinctive point is that all this comes from Bishop Gore. The lines in Browning's apology for another bishop—those which begin, "Nay, friend, I meet you with an answer here"—are irresistibly brought to mind. Which will prevail, the sincerity and courage which are not to be gainsaid, or the irrational instinct of submission to ancient authority? We still have hope of Dr. Gore, whom meanwhile we heartily congratulate on the attainment of his heart's desire in his translation to the new diocese of Birmingham.

THE Revival in Wales has occupied much space in Methodist papers, but also in many of the secular newspapers. That it has taken hold of the people with a kind of resistless force is evident. A religious excitement that makes Welsh people careless of their singing-classes, so that a musical competition drops through from inattention, is no ordinary event. Since the days of Wesley and Whitefield one has hardly read such stories of the spread of religious emotion of its seizing alike the hardened sinner and the apathetic believer, and of its compelling power not only in the direction of prayer and praise, but in the way of purer morality, of reformed lives, of the paying of neglected debts, the reconciliation of those who had long been known as enemies. It is giving Nunquam an importance somewhat beyond his due, and the revival itself something less than its true significance, when a Wesleyan writer calls it "God's answer to Robert Blatchford." A problem for Robert Blatchford and for the rest of us it undoubtedly is; but until the problem is more clearly worked out we had better be very reticent in throwing its answer at other men, believers or unbelievers. The history of this revival is still in the making; it is too early to read the moral.

SOCIAL ECONOMICS.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

YEAR after year the weather brings the recurrent problem of the unemployed, and year after year we fail anew in our attempts to avert the sufferings arising out of it. To a large extent it is to be feared, we have even aggravated the evil by encouraging the worker to feel that should he lose his work in the winter months it is the business of some one—the Poor Law Guardians, the Borough Council, or some charitable fund—to step in and provide either meals or a job. The fact that these outside agencies always fail in their efforts makes him indeed feel injured, but does not restore to him his own sense of responsibility; and his activities are apt to turn to "agitating" rather than to seeking for work.

But notwithstanding our recurrent failures—perhaps because of them—we note a steady change in our method of approaching the matter. Soup-kitchens and newspaper funds fall into disrepute, work comes to the fore as the true remedy, and the making of "artificial" or "useless" work becomes discredited in favour of work which is really needed and remunerative. And so gradually we are reaching the position that the true remedy lies in a better organisation of the industrial resources of the country. And we are coming further to see that amongst those industrial resources which call for improvement the most in need of it are often the faculties of the workers themselves.

In this matter of unemployment and experimental remedies for it, London stands as a great object lesson to the rest of the country, for there we find on a large scale the problems and difficulties which beset smaller towns on a smaller scale. Let us look then at what has been attempted in London in recent years. Indiscriminate doles, I have said, are becoming discredited as a remedy. Unfortunately they are still regarded as a palliative by the short-sighted majority; and a new sensation has recently been provided for the public by the deplorable expedient of providing free or cheap meals at all hours of the night. That the daytime is the proper time for feeding human beings, and that no one is likely to be more fit for his work from having been tempted to pass the night in the streets, does not seem to have occurred to the promoters of this latest craze.

As a remedy for real want of work the Poor Law is as helpless as miscellaneous charity. When wisely administered it may indeed be most efficacious in checking an increase in that section of the "unemployed" to which work is a greater evil than the want of it, and which so greatly increases the difficulty of dealing with the problem. Unfortunately many of the London Boards of Guardians have been far from wise of late years, and in some districts are very largely responsible for the winter distress.

What are the powers of Poor Law Guardians in this matter? Legally, they can only offer relief to the able-bodied man out of work on condition that he will come into the workhouse; or in London and some large Urban unions, they can offer work in a labour yard under supervision. The idea of making the man come into the workhouse was that there he could be given definite tasks of work to do, and that this would be deterrent to the lazy man, and make him prefer to work outside to asking for relief. But in some of the poorest unions now a false sentiment has decided that it is "degrading" to a man to be set to tasks; these have been abolished, and the result is that the workhouses are crowded with loafers who feel no degradation in idling away their lives at the expense of ratepayers who can ill-afford this addition to their burdens. In some unions the Guardians have opened a labour yard, and under proper supervision this seems the best means in their power of affording temporary assistance to the genuine. Unfortunately the supervision is seldom adequate, and then the whole thing becomes a farce; those who are willing to work are overpowered by the majority who are not, and to the expense of providing materials for work which is not done, is added the impossibility of keeping order. Hence, in other unions no attempt is made to set the men to work, and out relief is given freely and quite illegally to practically all comers. In one union alone, West Ham, from £50,000 to £60,000 a year is spent in out relief to various classes of people, and largely to the able-bodied. Some of it no doubt, goes to men who would willingly work, but where no work is offered and no test of any kind applied, it is impossible to say how much goes to fostering and increasing the admittedly large number of loafers.

The man who receives relief from the Poor Law is thereby disqualified electorally and considerable pressure is being exerted to abolish this disqualification, This gives rise to a new set of problems and difficulties. Quite apart from the serious question whether the man who fails to be self-supporting should enjoy the full privileges of citzenship, the road would be opened up to the worst kind of political corruption if it were possible to make payments to electors out of the rates.

Meanwhile the attempt has been made to obviate the disqualification by throwing the responsibility for finding work for the unemployed upon the municipal authorities. For some years past many of the London Borough Councils have attempted this, always at a great loss, for no one seems able to make the work of the "unemployed" remunerative. But not only has the employment thus provided been unremunerative, it has also been utterly inadequate to meet the demands upon it. In no case has it been found possible to give regular employment to any man; generally speaking two or three turns of two or three days work has been the utmost any one man has received; and frequently all that each man has had has been one spell of three days' work during winter. Worst of all, to attain even this insignificant result has in some cases meant a reduction of the regular staff of workmen.

One result of these failures was a serious attempt last winter to deal carefully and adequately with at least one section of the unemployed. The committee of the Mansion House Relief Fund resolved to disregard for the present the apparently hopeless mass of wastrels, and to devote their energies to a new experiment with respectable heads of families. The plan was that the men should be sent to regular work in the country—Hadleigh and Osea were the places selected—while their families were supported from the fund in London. 467 men were employed in this way, and on the whole the results were more encouraging than any so far attained. The selection of men was not sufficiently careful at first, and this led to a larger proportion of failures than there would otherwise have been. At Hadleigh, 23 men left through drink, 13 left "through general dissatisfaction," 4 were dismissed as unsatisfactory, 15 left as tired of the work and 11 left without giving any reason. At Osea, 1 left through drink (the small number being due to the fact that no drink was obtainable), 7 through being dissatisfied, 7 dismissed as unsatisfactory, 21 left with no reason, and 44 because they disliked the supervision. I quote these details as evidence of the difficulties arising out of the natures of the men, even when they have been more or less carefully selected. The fact must be boldly faced that amongst the unemployed are large numbers who do not want work if they can possibly live without it, and still more who will not work regularly, but only casually.

Of those who stayed, however, the reports were favourable, and it was particularly noticed that their work improved greatly, no doubt owing largely to good food and open air exercise.

It is probable that this winter will see a large extension of the experiment. The idea of setting the men to work in country colonies rather than in town is rapidly gaining ground; and what is even more important, the necessity of distinguishing between different types of "unemployed," and dealing with them accordingly, has been recognised. But at the best these are only expedients for carrying us through an exceptionally bad time, and cannot be regarded as a final solution. Work carried on for a few weeks in mid-winter can never be made remunerative; and we must look in other directions for the causes which will ultimately lift the burden of the unemployed from the community. Meanwhile it is probable that the next few years will see an improvement in trade which will do more than any philanthropic effort to make life easier for the genuine workers; whether it will do much to improve the condition of irregular workers and loafers must depend largely upon the wisdom or unwisdom of Poor Law Guardians and municipal authorities.

PROFESSOR FRASER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.*

THE octogenarian Professor Emeritus of the University of Edinburgh has done an excellent piece of work in thus giving to the world a vivid description of both the external and internal events of his fruitful and honourable career. The picture of his outward life is of high interest, treating, as it does, of his ancestral connection with the Fraser and the Campbell clans, of a boyhood passed in the romantic land of Lorne, of high distinctions gained as a student in the university in which he afterwards did such eminent service, and then of a long literary and professorial life enriched and gladdened by intercourse, and in some cases by close intimacy, with many of the foremost thinkers and theologians of the last century. But charming as is the story of the outward life, this is treated by the author as subsidiary to the main purpose of the volume, which, we are told in the preface, is partly to infuse some familiar human interest into an account of a philosophical endeavour to deal with the riddle of the Universe; and partly to show how racial, educational, and social influences, as well as changing phases of thought and national interest, in the last eighty years of the nineteenth century, have tended to direct the issue of that intellectual endeavour.

It is in reference to the interest of the work as a contribution to the philosophy of religion that the present notice is written.

The most important of Professor Fraser's philosophical works are his edition of Berkeley's writings and his Gifford Lectures on "The Philosophy of Theism." It is to be noted first that, though Fraser during the latter half of his life has come into closest contact with the German idealism which Ferrier, Hutchison Stirling, and the two Cairds have made so influential in Scotland, and though some of the ablest of his own pupils have been captivated by this mode of interpreting the universe, he himself has remained in substantial agreement with the "commonsense" school founded by Reid and Dugald Stewart. When Ferrier's "Theory of Knowing and Being" appeared in 1854, Fraser was the editor of the North British, and in 1855 he contributed to that review an able critical article on Ferrier's work.

It was on the fundamental question of "Causation" that Professor Fraser parted company with the Absolute Idealists; and on this essential point he has always been in agreement with Dr. Martineau: So close is the resemblance between the views of these two eminent writers on the philosophy of religion that it is very surprising to find no evidence that they were personally acquainted with each other. Both were members of the "Metaphysical Society," and also of the Athenæum Club, but there is no mention of Professor Fraser in the "Life and Letters of Dr. Martineau," and in the present work all that is said about Martineau is that it was worth a visit to London to hear Martineau in friendly debate with Huxley, and Manning or Ward arguing for supernatural faith with Tyndall or Clifford, and to follow the subtle reasoning of Gladstone in an encounter with the outspoken scepticism of some of his associates.

How far, if at all, the thought in the Gifford Lectures, which were delivered in 1894–96 was influenced by the "Study of Religion," published in 1888, we cannot say; but students of Martineau's works were already familiar with some of the leading conceptions in the Gifford Lectures. God, argues Professor Fraser, was of old invoked to explain only what seemed to be inexplicable by natural causes, and it was supposed that the more fully "natural" causes were revealed by science the less was seen of God; "but," he continues, "it had become my habitual conception that every fresh discovery of a natural cause was a fresh revelation of God." As Dr. Martineau's writings repeatedly show, this had also long become his habitual conception; and we need hardly say that the following identification of Cause with Will which forms the central idea of the "Philosophy of Theism" is also the basal principle in the "Study of Religion."

If [says Prof. Fraser] all active causation or power, as seen at our point of view, must be spiritual—if natural law is only the grammar of the divine language of nature—then positive science, instead of extinguishing metaphysics and religion, must deepen and enlighten both. Cosmical change is then the immediate issue of omnipresent and omnipotent Will: the unbeginning and unending evolution of the universe of finite things and persons is the continuous miracle or constant supernatural activity which constitutes nature; the whole natural order is an aggregate of divinely established signs, which enable us by their regularity to forecast the consequences of events, as well as to refund events into their constant and continuous antecedents.

There are, however, important differences in the ways in which Dr. Martineau and Professor Fraser conceive and apply this principle of Causation. Though Fraser in the above passage speaks of all the changes in the cosmos as issuing from omnipresent and omnipotent Will, he does not think, as Dr. Martineau apparently did, that we can reach the belief in this Divine Will simply by that experience of resistance to our personal volitions which gives us the idea of causes in nature akin to our own wills. In Dr. Martineau's religious philosophy the idea of Cause thus gained, when blended with the idea of Infinity, which God's presence kindles in the soul, occasions the conception of, and the belief in, God as the omnipresent Will to whose activity all cosmical existences and phænomena are due. Professor Fraser, on the other hand, rightly emphasises the fact that this experience of resisted volition can only admit us to a knowledge of the existence in the world of finite and dependent causes like ourselves, and therefore cannot of itself lead to an insight into the self-existent Ground and Cause of the universe of things and persons.

I do not [he says] think of Omnipotent and Omniscient Mind as "a cause," in the way so-called "natural causes" are treated as causes. . . . In the narrow meaning of "cause," the causal judgment cannot be applied beyond the limits of physical experience. It does not enable us to penetrate beyond the finite data, empirically presented, of which it is a uniting principle. But causation in the highest sense must be originative, not transmissive only, even if continuously transmissive.

Accordingly, Fraser reaches the idea of God as the self-existent and creative Cause of all finite causes, not chiefly by inference from our own personal causality, but by the argument that the rational presupposition of an omnipresent and omnipotent Active Intelligence as the infinite ground of the universe is justified by the fact that, "unless this assumption is made unconsciously or consciously, man could not have any science or intelligible experience." We cannot say that we clearly see how he reaches this conclusion; but we readily admit that we could not have any intelligible understanding of the cosmos, were it not for those necessary principles of our thinking, which appear to arise from the presence and self-revelation of God in our inner life, and which, therefore, we are constrained to believe, pertain to the essential nature of the Eternal One. We do not doubt that, apart from these divine intuitions in our own souls, the universe would be meaningless to us, and that Professor Fraser is right when he says that Finite and contingent facts, however numerous, could not, per se, by their merely finite evidence, conduct to the infinite and absolute conclusion which theism requires. The incomplete cannot by itself alone prove the Absolute.

There can, we think, be no doubt that our experience of resistance to our volitions could not by itself furnish the conception of God as the creative ground, and cause of all finite existences. This grand theistic conception can only arise from the self-manifestation of the Eternal in our rational nature; and Dr. Martineau evidently recognised this when he spoke of God as the "Cause of causes," and the Soul of souls. But we question whether this intuition of the Absolute in our reason can be fitly described as a "presupposition." In like manner Professor Fraser argues that the rationality of the universe requires the presupposition not only of omnipresent Active Intelligence, but also of omnipotent and omniscient Goodness in the heart of the universe, for that "this is implied in the practical reliability of human experience."

We find [he says] that trust in the constancy of natural order is ultimately trust in a morally trustworthy, or essentially divine, universe; in which man could not at last be inevitably put to intellectual and moral confusion.

Instead of building upon this idea of "the constancy of natural order," we should prefer to maintain that society derives its life and its progressiveness from the fact that it is pervaded and more or less unified by moral, æsthetic, and spiritual ideals, which are indestructible and authoritative because they are partial self-revelations in humanity of essential features in the character of the immanent God.

It is interesting to note that in his treatment of Free-will and of Personal Immortality Professor Fraser's teaching and that of Dr. Martineau are in close accord. While the Hegelians at Glasgow and even his own successor in Edinburgh accept what Professor James calls "soft determinism," maintaining that moral freedom involves no real power of free choice, and is only another name for self-determination, Professor Fraser speaks with no uncertain voice, and repudiates the doctrine that a universe which should contain persons able to do what they ought not to do, and so to introduce some discord and suffering as the consequences of their sin would be a universe inferior in rationality to one in which uniform determinism should prevail.

If [he says] freedom to become what one ought not to be is implied in an individual personality, and in responsible agency; and if a universe that contains moral agents is more worthy of existence than a wholly non-moral one—the temporary existence of sinners and sufferers on our planet, or elsewhere, would even be a consequence of the divinity of the Whole.

YEAR-BOOKS.

THE first place, because of its special interest for members of our own religious community must be given to the Essex Hall Year Book, with its invaluable lists of ministers and congregations, of missionary societies, educational and other beneficent agencies, its legal and other information. There are this year 364 ministers and exactly the same number of churches in the lists. Interesting particulars of liberal religion in other countries are also given. (British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1s. net.)

The Reformers' Year Book, 1905, edited by F. W. Pethick Lawrence and Joseph Edwards, is the eleventh annual issue of this admirable handbook. There is special information as to labour members and labour candidates for Parliament, but a great deal besides as to progressive movements of every kind. In view of the next General Election, the book will be found of great service. There is a section dealing also with Politics and Reform in other lands, and a final "Directory of Reformers." (The Echo Office, 19, St. Bride-street, E.C. 1s. net. In art linen, 2s. net.)

The Literary Year-Book and Bookman's Directory, 1905, in this, its ninth annual volume, has a new publisher, and has been completely re-set. Much of the matter has been re-arranged, and the "Index of Titles" of current literature, filling over 230 pages, is a new feature. One slip we notice in the Directory of Authors is the retention of the name of Sir Henry Thompson, who died April 18, 1904, and should have been transferred to the Obituary. This book is of great interest and of practical service to anyone engaged in or attracted to literary pursuits. (Routledge & Sons. 5s. net.)

Who's Who, 1905, has this year grown to a volume of nearly 1,800 pages, and impresses one by its bulk, with the enormous number of distinguished people this country contains. There are, of course, many grades of distinction in these more than 17,000 biographies, but all the information is interesting, a great deal of it most valuable, and some of it amusing. (A. & C. Black. 7s. 6d. net.)

The growth of Who's Who has rendered it necessary to eliminate a large amount of valuable matter which formerly appeared in preliminary lists and tables. This is now published in a separate volume as the Who's Who Year-Book, 1905. The Royal Family, the Government, House of Commons, municipal, legal, medical, literary lists, are all here, and among the additions are a list of race meetings, of leading London specialists, and of great London preachers of all denominations! (A. & C. Black. 1s. net.)

The Englishwoman's Year-Book and Directory, 1905, is again revised and enlarged and entirely remodelled. It is an invaluable book of reference in every branch of woman's professional and industrial activity. There are also sections on various branches of social work, reform and charitable activities, lists of homes for children and girls, convalescent homes. In the section on religious work, the paragraph on "Unitarians" is admirable. This year is the seventh of the new issue and the twenty-fifth of the publication. Miss Emily Janes, organising secretary of the National Union of Women Workers, is the editor. (A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d. net.)

Herbert Fry's Royal Guide to London Charities is in its forty-first edition—new and revised. (Chatto & Windus. 1s. 6d.)

OBITUARY.

MRS. JAMES WORTHINGTON.

A LIFE of great beneficence, of wise and warm-hearted generosity, was brought to a close on Thursday week, by the death of Mrs. Worthington, of Sale Lodge, Sale, widow of the late James Worthington. Mrs. Worthington, who was seventy-four years of age, had been in indifferent health for some time, and in September went to stay at Torquay, where she had previously wintered, and it was there her death took place.

Mrs. Worthington was the oldest daughter of the late Henry McConnel, of Cressbrook Hall, Derbyshire. She was married in 1857, and after residing for a few years in Manchester, Mr. and Mrs. Worthington removed forty years ago to Sale Hall, which was their home until Mr. Worthington's death in 1887.

Mrs. Worthington's main interest was in educational and philanthropic work. Until within a few years of her death she gave much time and personal service to the many institutions which appealed to her sympathies, while her ample means, her abounding generosity, and her shrewd but kindly habit of satisfying herself as to the worthiness of the many appeals made to her, enabled her to help in many other directions where personal service was impossible. She was a frequent contributor to the Owens College, and took an especial interest in the work and life of the women students, contributing at one time £5,000, at another a considerable sum, towards practical schemes for their permanent welfare during their college days. The University Settlement in Ancoats, the Manchester Domestic Mission, and the Collyhurst Recreation Rooms found in her a generous and untiring friend. In the neighbourhood of her own home her liberality was no less marked. She was the president and one of the founders of the Sale and District Nursing Association, an organisation which does excellent service among the sick poor, and the Sale Girls' Training Home is a typical example of work which for her was of the fullest interest. She maintained a small private home of rest for over-worked women from Manchester; and for many years supported a day school at Sale Moor, in the management of which she took a constant part. One of her great gifts to Sale was the public park, for which she purchased and gave the land in 1899, when the township had by public meeting decided against the proposed purchase.

Mrs. James Worthington has long been known, as her husband was, as the generous friend of all good work in connection with our churches. She was a munificent donor to the new buildings of Manchester College, Oxford, and the Unitarian Home Missionary College, the Manchester Domestic Mission Society (already mentioned), and the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches, having in hand various schemes for the enlargement of their work, were among the objects of her bounty until the end. Her private benefactions were countless.

Until failing health compelled her to remain indoors or seek a warmer climate she was a constant worshipper at Dunham-road Chapel, at Altrincham. She was much interested also in the Unitarian Chapel at Sale, and in the Hale Chapel, where her husband and younger son were buried. But, loyal as she was to her own convictions, and generous to the churches of her own denomination, she had a most catholic spirit, and hated anything that seemed to her narrow and bigoted. Any denunciation of the religious convictions of others was unendurable to her. Her personality was as winning as her heart was large. A woman of wide reading and of keen intellectual interests, she combined in her own life simplicity, brightness, and an abiding charm. Her memory will long be held in honour by the many friends to whom her death brings a sense or irreparable loss.

MR. CHARLES HARDING.

IT is with profound regret we announce the death, in his 66th year, of Mr. Charles Harding, at his residence, Knutsford Lodge, Birmingham, early on Saturday morning, Dec. 31, after a short illness. He attended service at the Old Meeting Church (of which he was a life-long member) on Christmas morning, and during the day seemed in his usual health and spirits. On Monday evening influenza revealed itself, and so rapid was its progress that in five days it had claimed its victim. On Friday pneumonia set in, and brought about failure of the heart. His many friends, amid their sorrow, will be glad to know that there was but little pain, and that he passed peacefully away in his sleep. Mr. Harding was the second son of Mr. W. Sextus Harding, who practised as a solicitor in Birmingham, and to whose practice he in course of time succeeded. In 1870 he married Ada, daughter of Mr. Wm. Long, of Knutsford, Cheshire, and a more beautiful union can hardly be imagined. Mrs. Harding, with two daughters and a son survive, not simply to mourn his loss, but to carry on a great tradition of service, kindness, generosity, and to honour his example of simple, unaffected piety.

Mr. Harding was the representative of a family which had been connected with the Old Meeting for nearly 200 years. To the end he remained absolutely loyal to the inheritance he had received of religious truth and freedom. He was warmly devoted to the cause of Liberal Religion, and a generous supporter, not only of the church to which he belonged, but of various institutions connected with the denomination as a whole. He was especially interested in the welfare of ministers, and was a director of three great funds for their assistance, e.g., the Ministers' Benevolent Society, the Ministers' Sustention, and the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Funds. He was also secretary for many years of the Pargeter Fund. No layman in the Midlands was brought into closer and more frequent touch with the ministers of that district than Mr. Harding, and they always found in him much sympathy, and not seldom received practical proofs of kindness given always with the greatest delicacy and as if the receiving it conferred a favour upon himself. It may be truly said of him that the greater part of his life was spent in thoughtful consideration for others, and in devising and carrying out plans for conferring kindnesses, helping young students, finding the ways and means for promising talent, and giving assistance in many ways to workers in art, music, and religion. His public benefactions were many and large, but his private charities were even more numerous. He loved to do good in secret, and he often did not let his left hand know what his right hand was doing. A man of absolute integrity, of an affectionate and cheery disposition, of great simplicity of nature, he set a great example of plain living and high thinking. Yet his hospitality was boundless. Next to religion his greatest interest outside his home was in music. He was a vice-president of the Festival Choral Society, and acted as hon. secretary to the local committee which raised ten scholarships, tenable at the National Training School for Music, which has now developed into the Royal College of Music. In order to encourage sight singing in the Board schools, Mr. Harding presented to the Birmingham School Board, some years ago, a challenge shield to be competed for by the various schools. He took great interest in the formation of the Birmingham University and in its subsequent development. In recognition of his liberal contributions to the funds he was made a life governor of the University. When the School of Modern Languages was founded in the University, in 1902, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Harding gave four scholarships of £50 each for three years, and entitling each holder to a further scholarship of £100 for a fourth year to be spent at a German University. Quite recently Mr. Harding offered to the University a large portrait of Sir Oliver Lodge, painted by Sir Robert Reid (President of the Scottish Academy, 1901-2). The portrait has been accepted, and will be hung in the large academic hall of the new University buildings. While on the subject of painting, we may mention that a few years ago Mr. Harding presented to the municipal Art Gallery a beautiful specimen of the work of the French painter Bouguereau.

One of the modern movements in which he took keen interest was that in favour of cremation as a substitute for burial. The foundation of the Birmingham Crematorium at Perry Barr was, in a large measure, due to his efforts, and at the time of his death he was a director of the Crematorium. His funeral took place at the Crematorium on Tuesday, January 3, and was attended by a large number of friends, and by deputations from the various institutions with which he was connected. The service, conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood, was of a specially bright nature, it having been his wish, and that of his family, that everything gloomy should be banished from such an occasion. Long will he be missed in the city, which he served in quiet ways, in the church which he loved, in the home and the beautiful family life of which he was the centre.

J. W.

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

WE recorded in a brief note last week our sorrow at the death of the Rev. J. W. Chadwick, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N.Y. Mr. Chadwick had been latterly in somewhat poor health, but the summons came to him with unexpected suddenness early on Sunday morning, Dec. 11. He and his people had been preparing to celebrate on the following Sunday the fortieth anniversary of his settlement as minister at Brooklyn.

A native of Marblehead, on the coast of Massachusetts, north of Boston, John White Chadwick was born Oct. 19, 1840, and as a youth worked in a dry goods store, and was apprenticed to a shoemaker; but he was determined to enter the Unitarian ministry, and with fine gifts of mind and heart, and strong determination made his way, and in 1864 completed his college course, graduating in the summer of that year from the Harvard Divinity School. It was then that he wrote his fine hymn:—

Eternal Ruler of the ceaseless round
Of circling planets singing on their way;
Guide of the nations from the night profound
Into the glory of the perfect day;
Rule in our hearts that we may ever be Guided, and strengthened, and upheld by Thee.

While at college, Chadwick had come to know Samuel Longfellow, who was then living in his brother's house at Cambridge, and he rejoiced that the young man should succeed to the ministry of his old church at Brooklyn. (He had resigned in 1860, and in the interval Nahor Staples had been minister.) It was Chadwick's sole charge in the ministry, and Longfellow took part in the Induction service on Dec. 21, 1864, giving the charge to the minister, which concluded with Lowell's noble lines:—

New occasions teach new duties; Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of Truth;
Lo, before us gleam her camp-fires! we ourselves must Pilgrims be,
Launch our Mayflower, and steer boldly through the desperate winter sea,
Nor attempt the Future's portal with the Past's blood-rusted key.

That was prophetic of Chadwick's whole career. He was a fearless radical, and had his battles to fight. In his own congregation, as well as in the wider connection of the churches, there were those who feared what seemed to them his dangerous iconoclasm, before they were won by the deep religiousness and the spiritual power of the man. Mr. Chadwick told something of this when he celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his settlement, rejoicing then, as he did to the end, in the loyal affection of his people. "He won honourable fame," says a friend writing of him in the Christian Register, "as a preacher, a theologian, an author, and a literary critic. In these four departments he had the unusual distinction of standing in the first rank among his fellows. He never aimed at popularity, and, while no man enjoyed more than he did the sympathy and praise of his friends, he stood ready at any moment to sacrifice everything if he believed that his duty called him to say that which was unpleasant to the public and to his nearest friends. He had the quality which one of his admirers smilingly described as 'his fierce goodness.'"

His sermons have been a help to many, in this country as well as in America, such volumes as "The Faith of Reason," "Seeing and Being," "A Daring Faith," and "Old and New Unitarian Belief," as also the lectures in the volumes, "The Bible of To-day" and "The Man Jesus." We referred last week to his biographies of Parker and Channing, and his contributions to Chambers' Encyclopædia of English Literature. We have delighted also in his poems and hymns, of which one of the best known is good now to be recalled:—

It singeth low in every heart,
We hear it each and all,—
A song of those who answer not,
However we may call;
They throng the silence of the breast,
We see them as of yore,—
The kind, the brave, the true, the sweet,
Who walk with us no more.

'Tis hard to take the burden up,
When these have laid it down;
They brightened all the joy of life,
They softened every frown;
But, oh, 'tis good to think of them
When we are troubled sore!
Thanks be to God that such have been,
Although they are no more.

More homelike seems the vast unknown,
Since they have entered there;
To follow them were not so hard,
Wherever they may fare;
They cannot be where God is not,
On any sea or shore;
Whate'er betides, Thy love abides,
Our God, for evermore.

Gannett, Hosmer, and Chadwick, the three singers of the Liberal faith in America to whom we owe most, in these latter days, were all born in 1840. Savage is a year younger, and our own Richard Armstrong was three years younger. The writer of these lines once saw Chadwick and Armstrong greet one another in Liverpool, and it was good to see these two strong men together. They were friends and kindred spirits, and both in rugged strength and tenderness of nature not dissimilar. Now they have both passed from us into the celestial light, but leave with us many treasures of their noble life.

WATTS EXHIBITION AT THE ACADEMY.

THE Winter Exhibition at Burlington House, which opened on Monday and will remain open until Saturday, March 11, is devoted chiefly to the works of the late George Frederick Watts. One room, indeed contains paintings and drawings by the late Frederick Sandys (1832–1904), many of them extremely beautiful, and in the Central Hall is the model of the design for the National Memorial to Queen Victoria, by Thomas Brock, R.A., to be executed in marble and bronze and erected in front of Buckingham Palace. But the great interest of the exhibition is the wonderful collection of Watts' pictures and drawings, 248 in all.

The catalogue gives a brief biographical account of the artist (1817–1904), and some of his own notes on the pictures, which aimed "to show that the object in work has been to suggest, in the language of art, modern Thought in things ethical and spiritual." Thus, "in the several subjects relating to death, the object has been to divest the inevitable of its terrors; the power has always been depicted as impersonal, and rather as a friend than enemy."

In this exhibition one can with the deepest interest trace the story of a great life, devoted, with a noble simplicity, to the highest ends in his art; and here also is the artist himself, for there are three portraits, the first painted in 1834, when he was a youth of 17, the next of the young man of 36, the last left by the old man of 87, unfinished at his death. There is a portrait of his father, a fine face, painted in 1836, and a number of Watts' portraits of the most distinguished men of his time, including an early portrait of Joachim, clean shaven, in 1866. Of special interest are the three portraits of Tennyson, that of 1859, lent by Lady Henry Somerset, familiar from a well-known engraving, one still more wonderful in its presentment of poetic power, painted in 1864, and lent by Sir Paget Bowman, and the Cambridge Trinity College portrait in D.C.L. robes, 1890. Besides the portraits in oils there are a number of very beautiful chalk drawings, one a portrait of Lady Mount Temple, another of the Hon. Rollo Russell as a child.

The great symbolic pictures are here, "Love and Death," "Love and Life," "Hope" and "Love Triumphant" (a small sketch for the larger picture as companion to "Time, Death and Judgment"). To the catalogue are added a chronological and an alphabetical index of the pictures, which are a great help in their study. Of "Love and Death" there are three copies, the largest, painted in 1877, now belonging to the Manchester Whitworth Institute, and two smaller ones. Of "Love and Life" there are four copies, including that in chalk made for the Whitworth Institute in 1890. The picture itself is dated 1883. "Hope" is dated 1886, and there is also the 1891 Whitworth chalk copy. The artist's note on this picture is:

> Hope, blindfold, and clad in a pale blue robe, is seated on the globe, and holds in her hands a lyre, of which but one string remains; she lends her ear to the melody she still can make.

And in another place: "Hope strives to get all the music possible out of the last remaining string."

The chalk drawing of "The Dweller in the Innermost" is wonderfully beautiful. Of this Watts said: "The vague figure may be as vaguely called conscience."

This exhibition offers a rare opportunity to students and lovers of ideal art.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

NEW YEAR'S EVE.

DECEMBER 31ST, the last day of the old Year, and here we are, far away from old England, in a land of snowy mountains, with a brilliantly blue sky overhead, and sunshine so bright and hot that though we are walking over snow frozen so hard that it scrunches underfoot like salt, our English winter coats and furs are almost too warm.

I wish I could bring you to see this place, children, for it is perfectly lovely. Imagine great snowy mountains sweeping away up to the sky, their sides, every here and there, so steep that the snow has slipped away and has left the great craggy rocks or slippery grass slopes all bare in the sunshine; then imagine little chalets and clumps of tall stately pines dotted about the mountain-sides, and you will have a fair idea of what we see round us on three sides. On the fourth side we look down a deep valley running right down to the lake, some 2,000 feet below us; not that we can see it, indeed it is a little hard to realize that it is there, for the whole valley is full of soft, white, puffy clouds, and as we look down, we can see nothing below us but cloud land, all dazzlingly white in the sunshine..

This morning we are off for a walk to the woods, for it is New Year's Eve, and we want some of those long trails of ivy that grow up the fir-trees, to decorate our rooms for the festivities. First of all we must go down the valley a little way towards our "mer de nuages," or sea of cloud. We pass the little roaring torrent still unfrozen, although little ice-bridges cross it here and there and every stick and stone in its neighbourhood is covered with ice and icicles; then we go on again, right under the great cliff of rock where every now and again a little avalanche of stones comes scattering round us and then,—but suddenly we we hear the shout of "Gare! gare!" and behind us come two of those big sleighs heaped with hay, each managed by a man who steers it with his feet, while he holds on to the two handles in front. They sweep past us in a moment and are gone, and we follow rather more slowly. Round the next corner a glorious sight meets our eyes:—a waterfall coming down the mountain side in five distinct leaps, has been frozen from top to bottom, and there it is, beautiful as some fairy transformation scene. One leap is just a group of long icicles, another is a frozen curtain behind which the water is still falling, and we catch the shimmer of its movement behind the crust of ice. What a glorious palace the frost-fairies have been building! Are they, too, going to have a New Year's dance to-night?

But now we have reached our wood, and we turn off the main road, and in amongst the pines. Tits and chaffinches are busy in the trees, and the air is as full of their merry little trills as if it were already spring instead of December. But even in winter these woods are very beautiful. Look how warm and red those dry autumn leaves look round the beech roots. Here is a shrub with big bunches of red berries, a little further on is a wild rose bush loaded with scarlet hips, in that sheltered corner under the pines are ferns still green and fresh, while the bank where we stand is covered with beautiful mosses, tiny red ivy, and the sweetest little strawberry leaves imaginable, some still green, some yellow and some quite a bright scarlet. As for the long ivy trails that we have come to look for, they are climbing up nearly every tree. Certainly we shall have no difficulty about getting plenty of decorations!

* * * *

It is New Year's Eve! The children's party is over, and now the grown-ups are going to dance the Old Year out and the New Year in. Somehow I do not feel inclined to join them, so I have run up to my room, wrapped myself in a warm cloak and am standing out on the balcony alone with the mountains and the moonlight. How still and quiet everything is! The moonlight is almost as bright as day. Away up in the dark sky a few stars are peeping faintly; in the distance I can just hear our noisy little torrent still tumbling down the valley. . . . This is the last night of the Old Year! Is it not strange to think that it is slipping away minute by minute, and that we cannot stop it however much we may want to? Only two more hours, and it will have gone for ever!

I think on the whole it has been a very happy year. It has brought some trouble, and a great deal of happiness, plenty of hard work, some most delightful play, a good many failures and a few unexpected successes. And yet as I stand thinking about it with those quiet mountains looking down upon me, I cannot help feeling that I might have made it a good deal happier both for myself and other people. I had so often been impatient and cross, I had taken kind things that others had done for me without a word of thanks, and had allowed myself to lose my temper over little trifles—little trifles that seem so very small this evening in the presence of those great quiet mountains! I wonder whether other people are thinking and feeling the same way to-night, wishing as I do that they could just undo a few things, unsay a few words, in the record of this Old Year? None of us ever can do that, but happily another year is just beginning in which we shall have another chance. Shall we try to do better in it? try with all our strength not to get cross, not to lose our tempers, not to say those hot, hasty words that we are always sorry for the moment we have uttered them? I wonder what you would say if I could just have a little talk with you and ask you? I think I know what you would say—let us show what we can do.

THE STRENGTH OF THE ETERNAL.

THE New Year comes to us with its fresh call to service, bidding us by the very swiftness of the passing of our time stand upon our feet, and in the strength of those things which do not change and pass away, realise in what a world we live, and what the work is that we are called to do. Even now, in the shadow of a great personal sorrow, bereft of a leader in the strength of whose faith and courage many of us have often walked, the call comes to us, and with earnest steadfastness we must obey. It is ever so, and the voice of our friend bids us now be of a good courage, and while the benediction of the ultimate peace rests upon us with him, know that in the strength of the Eternal we also may be strong.

At such a season as this we must feel anew the great calmness of our trust in the Eternal Goodness, that we are indeed ever in the presence of an infinite Joy, did we but realise the meaning of the deeper things of life, all the glory that has been revealed in the past, what the human heart has known that, helped by the Spirit, has searched the deep things of GOD. We stand in the midst of life divine, with infinite possibilities, and beyond the shadows of our mortality, have vision of blessedness, glory beyond glory. This is given to us to know, with wondering reverence and thanksgiving, in simple human fellowship, in the common ways of daily duty, because we are with GOD in the world, because He has found us, and bids us work for Him; because our fellowship can be perfected by that spirit of brotherly love which was in JESUS, and in the secret places of our love and trust our FATHER is very near to us, and there is nothing in the whole world to make us afraid.

So He gives us our watchword for the New Year, "With God," in presence of the Infinite, who is Truth, and Righteousness, and Love, in the spirit of self-forgetting service, for His Kingdom here on earth, but reaching into the heaven of His blessedness and peace. Then the terrible things of His providence are seen in their true light, and we have a rejoicing strength to endure hardness, and courage even for the bitterest trials. Nor can we be daunted by the whole mass of evil, which threatens to overcome our faith. The foul things of the earth, the evil things of its greed and cruelty and base passion, the emptiness of its pride and selfishness and foolish conceit, the dreary weight of common-place ugliness, the waste places of life, where no glimmering of noble thought or aspiration appears, these are all still there—but they are so terrible to us just because we know of the greater good, and have the vision of infinite purity and eternal love; and they bring us the urgent call of duty, and set our tasks of patient or vehement endeavour to overcome the evil with good.

We are to be strong in the New Year through the simplicity of our obedience, and in the knowledge that our salvation must be found by living an honest human life, bent on the bettering of the common lot of our people, to make cities and villages, schools and workshops, what they ought to be, to cleanse the pleasures and the politics of the nation, with steadfast integrity to bear witness to truth and righteousness, to throw all the influence we have on to the side of helpfulness, compassion and brotherly love.

We are to know the truth of GOD by just that simple loyalty to the duties of each day, in the spirit of our Christian discipleship, and so to demonstrate the truth to the world. There is no other way. He is a present GOD. "The word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it." The light that was of old can only shine for us through the kindling of the inward light, and through the faithfulness of humble hearts it must shine more and more unto the perfect day.

And as each individual life must in this way find its strength and the opening vision of the diviner glory, so in the fellowship of our churches. They also are set as witnesses to truth and righteousness, for the nurture of the true spirit, in worship and brotherly love. As each one true to his own light must be with GOD in the world, so the Church, in the constant spirit of its devotion. The call is to every man, and to every congregation, to be true to the light, to be strong and of a good courage, to be doing the Father's will, and to rejoice always, because He has given us our work to do, in His strength and in the knowledge of Eternal Love.

THE welcome of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the Rev. Charles Hargrove on his return from Australasia will be held at Essex Hall on Tuesday, Jan. 31, when the president of the Association, the Right Hon. William Kenrick, will preside.

RICHARD ACLAND ARMSTRONG.

IN the quietness of reverent gratitude, in presence of a silent form and a face touched by the peace of GOD, we have simply to record at this moment the great loss that has befallen us. The REV. RICHARD ACLAND ARMSTRONG, Minister of Hope-street Church, MARTINEAU'S Church, in Liverpool, passed away early on Wednesday morning, being not quite sixty-two years of age. Warnings of failing health there had been for some time, and latterly he had the comfort and the help of a friend as co-pastor in his ministry, but during the autumn he had been able to lecture for six weeks at Northampton and Nottingham on successive evenings, giving his course on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," and we had hoped that there were still years of quiet happy work before him in our midst. But the summons came last week in a paralytic seizure and again early on Sunday morning, from which time he lay in a calm unconsciousness to the end.

In him a great power for righteousness is taken from our midst. For twenty years he ministered in Liverpool, and for fifteen years before that in Nottingham, and in both places made his power felt as a strong man, with passionate indignation against wrong, ardent in his labours for progress, for the cleansing and uplifting of the life of the community, for enlightenment and social amelioration. At the same time, through all his public work, the influence of which was by no means confined to Nottingham and Liverpool, he was a faithful minister of the things of the spirit, blending in himself much of the force of a Hebrew prophet with a tenderness of feeling, deep and most sensitive sympathies and affections, which held him very close, for those who knew him best, to the mind and heart of Christ. All the depth of personal grace in him was known, perhaps, only to a few, but for more than thirty years he has been one of the chief among our ministers, ever welcome as an earnest and persuasive preacher, a clear and forcible speaker, a keen debater, a wise counsellor, a leader whose clear insight and undaunted will could always be relied upon—one who now can ill be spared.

All that he has been to us in the life of our churches throughout this past generation it would be difficult to estimate, but we shall hope next week to furnish some record of his manifold activities. At the time of his death he held the office of Visitor to Manchester College, Oxford; he had been Preacher of the Annual Sermon and President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and Essex Hall Lecturer; he was the second to be chosen, in succession to the late CHARLES BEARD, as preacher of the National Conference Sermon, at the triennial meeting held in Birmingham nearly twenty years ago. He had been in America, in Holland, and in Scandinavia, as the trusted representative of the Unitarians of this country, and it was only the state of his health which stood in the way of his undertaking that mission to Australasia, from which the REV. CHARLES HARGROVE has just returned.

As a teacher Mr. ARMSTRONG has long held a unique position amongst us. A pupil of MARTINEAU'S in Manchester College, he followed the great tradition of his teacher in the vindication of the fundamental truths of the religious life, publishing a series of books, of which his essay on "God and the Soul" was the crown. Other volumes, containing lectures on some of the chief leaders of thought and poets of the past century, passed on to a much wider circle the stimulating and illuminating thought by which his pulpit had been enriched.

To the INQUIRER his loss brings a direct and personal sorrow. For many years one of the most valued contributors to these columns, as to other periodical literature, he became two and a-half years ago Chairman of our Board of Directors, and took a deep interest in the management and prospects of our paper. The last two contributions from his pen were the leading article on the death of GEORGE FREDERICK WATTS, on July 9, and the review of HERBERT SPENCER'S Autobiography on Aug. 6. The former of these articles touched on some of the deepest sympathies of his life, his love of the beautiful, and his admiration for the pure and beautiful character and the prophetic insight of our great ideal artist. There is an echo in some of those words which bring him now very near to us, and we will repeat them here. He was speaking of WATTS as a true artist, all the more because he was a prophet of truth and righteousness:—

"He is therefore often stern. But he believed that life is good and that the world is beautiful. His prophecy was sometimes a prophecy of woe; but more often it was a psalm of joy. No Hebrew ever had a more intense conviction that sin inevitably brings its scourge. But neither had any man ever a more full persuasion that the great, silent, perpetual forces which control the sum of things are kindly, beautiful, divine. And so his legend of death is not as other men's. He stretches hands across the sea to WALT WHITMAN. Death is a gentle mother, a protecting nurse, a crown and triumph of life. Even when love passionately protests, none can behold Death pressing to the threshold without feeling that this is, after all, a benignant guest. When the babe lies gathered to the bosom of death, whose sable and purple plumes circle the bending form, we long that we too might know the embrace of those gentle arms."

Those are things we may now say also of our friend. He has entered into the nearer presence. We thank GOD for the strength and nobleness and beauty of his life.

THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE'S MISSION TO AUSTRALASIA.

RETROSPECT FROM HOME.

LEEDS, January 2, 1905.

MY last letter, dated October 4, was written from Wellington, and, as I had completed my mission and visited the eleven chief towns of Australasia, seeking out all such as called themselves Unitarians, and ministering as best I could to their religious needs, I did not anticipate that there would be much more to tell of interest to your readers. But were I to write at length my experiences since then, I should have to ask for a number of the INQUIRER devoted entirely to my doings, which would be to give them an absurdly disproportionate importance.

I mentioned that while I was at Wellington we had a meeting of sympathisers and supporters, at which a resolution was passed to form a Unitarian Society, and hold services once a month until arrangements could be made for a settled minister. This was the most satisfactory outcome of all my journeyings, and I trembled for the life of that infant society lest it should perish from indifference or want of lead or some indiscretion or division among its members. It was very welcome news which reached me by last mail that at a later meeting the society had been formally constituted, a simple constitution adopted, and officers elected; moreover, that a beginning had been made of monthly services with a result quite as satisfactory as there was any reason to expect.

We left Wellington on October 5, and reached Auckland on the 7th. Here I spent a last week with this dear congregation, whose story is an example to be loudly proclaimed among us in Great Britain of what may be done by a few people in earnest, with the right kind of man for minister. Of their own accord they have given notice to the Association that they can support themselves henceforth, and set the amount hitherto granted to them free for the support of other missions. I am informed that at Wellington there were some who advocated the like independence from the beginning, but as this implied that a minister should not be engaged until the whole amount required for the support of the church had been promised, it was wisely determined to ask for help to start with, and aim at independence to be achieved as soon as possible. I wish I could be convicted of wronging some of our home congregations when I say that they have no ambition to be self-supporting. Some I know of which never can be independent. Others, I suspect, are quite content to take all they can get, and spare their efforts and their purses. Some, please remember, Mr. Editor, by no means all, for I know many who are doing bravely and giving even beyond their means. But if the example of Auckland—a very ordinary congregation so far as wealth or talent or social position goes—were laid to heart, our work would advance mightily.

We left New Zealand early in the morning of Friday, the 15th, and so was completed the work which I had been sent out for. "You have done more good than you know," one said to me the last day I spent there, and it was the most cheering of all the kindly and flattering things which had been said to me and of me while sojourning among our fellow-countrymen in this Southern Hemisphere. One learns with advancing years, if not earlier, to deduct a heavy discount off compliments which are often dictated by kindliness of heart rather than by deliberate judgment; and, in spite of all I have been told, I should find it difficult to give an answer satisfactory to myself to the question, "What good have you done at so great a cost to the Unitarianism of England and of Leeds?" But this compliment from one I scarcely knew I accepted and cherish. I have not made converts to Unitarianism, and I have not drawn crowds to listen to my word; had such a result been desired it is another kind of man should have been chosen. I have brought to the scattered Unitarians on the other side of the world an assurance of the sympathy and interest of their English brethren. I almost dare to hope that I have brought to some a deeper faith in God and righteousness, and a firmer resolve to be true in word and deed to their convictions.

As the steamer made its devious way through the islands and round the headlands which enclose the Auckland Harbour my eyes rested lovingly on the city, my twin in age, where I had received so much kindness and made so many friends whom I should in all probability never see again. For a long time Mount Eden, the very perfect crater, one of a hundred in the neighbourhood, could be distinguished, and marked the site of the city beneath. When it faded on the horizon the cone of Rangitoto, a volcanic island, which, a few days before we had visited on a congregational excurison, drew my attentive gaze, and then, as it was lost to view among the clouds, I bid good-bye to a land which I had learnt in nine weeks to admire and to friends whom I shall respect and love as long as memory lasts. Good-bye, dear friends all, who dwell on the shores of the Southern Sea! To as many as the INQUIRER reaches I would send my thanks, and tell them how deeply I appreciate all the kindness they showed me. If only they were fewer in number I would write to each, but to so many—from two or three to ten or twelve in each of the eleven cities I have visited—I can only ask them to accept this public assurance of my grateful feelings towards them.

Our first experience after leaving Auckland was one which is to be met with only on the Pacific Ocean. The day after Saturday I discarded my tourist suit, and appeared in ministerial black—oh, why should ministers be condemned to perpetual mourning, why should it not rather be expected of us to set an example in costume as in life, and dress in garments which would show the dirt and be washed of it, instead of in dark clothes which hypocritically look clean with the dirt of months upon them?—well, I was prepared for Sunday and the saloon pulpit, when I was met with the intimation that Saturday would be repeated, so I got for once what I have often desired—another day in the week.

On Sunday morning we came in sight of the peaks of Tutuila, where we were to take up the mail for San Francisco. Little did I dream as we drew near and marked the palm-girt villages along the coast,and, through a narrow passage between coral reefs, entered the land-locked harbour, how much the place was to mean to me.

We had an introduction from Mr. Smith to his son, the postmaster and ship agent. We went ashore at 3 o'clock, and, finding he was busy embarking cargo on our steamer, we presented our letter to Mrs. Smith, who received us most kindly, and took us, after a cup of tea, for a walk to see a native village. It was further than we thought; alarmed by the ship's whistle, we hurried back, but we were too late by five minutes, and found ourselves left for three weeks at a naval coaling station where there was not even a hotel, nor, if there had been, had we the money to pay for suitable accommodation! The very light clothes we wore and a few articles left by oversight when clearing our pockets of all superfluous weight, an Essex Hall diary, a pocket book and fifty dollars,—such was for the time being my whole worldly possessions. Thanks to the generous hospitality of our New Zealand friends, we fared as well as the island permitted.

Your space would not permit of my telling of this romantic home to which I found myself so unexpectedly transferred from the very unromantic but comfortable accommodation of an ocean liner. Suffice it to say that my sojourn was not quite idle, for on the two Sundays I spent there I conducted service for the United States sailors and the residents at the station. There are three places of worship in the deep bay, Roman Catholic, London Mission Society, and Mormon, but at all three the services are conducted in the Samoan language; and here are some 240 sailors and 20 white traders, and half a dozen ladies living there with never a meeting for public worship. It was therefore a great satisfaction to comply with the request made to me by Captain Underwood the commandant, and conduct a morning service on each of the two Sundays I was there. About sixty attended, which, considering that they had all grown used to passing the Sunday without any religious observance of the day, was, I think, a creditable attendance.

The third Sunday I spent at Apia, in Samoa, the island of the group which will be always distinguished as the scene of Robert Louis Stevenson's last years and death. It is about seventy miles from Tutuila, and a dirty little steamer,usually crowded with natives, makes the passage every fortnight. Of my Sunday there I wrote as follows in my diary, and with this I will conclude :—

Sunday, November 6.—At eight o'clock I attended the service at the native church. There were more men than women present, and the choir, which sat in the middle, dressed in brown cotton jackets and lava-lavas, or loin cloths, consisted almost entirely of men. I was told that the music selected was of a quieter description, and the tunes all English, because of its being Communion Sunday; but the tunes were translated into the musical fashion of Samoa, and to me were weird and unrecognisable, the strong alto soaring, ever dominant above the forty basses, which swelled and fell and rose again as if seeking in vain to prevail. The native preacher was dressed in white, his lava-lava reaching to his bare feet, which were rough and broken, as if the skin were of coarse brown bark. He was very fluent, as they are all said to be, loving to speak on any occasion or excuse. For myself the minister prayed —so it was translated for me by Mr. Sibree, the missionary in charge, who sat by my side—"Bless thy servant who takes charge of thy work in another country and unites with us to-day. Different is his speech, yet one are our prayers and our praises. Dffierent the section of thy church to which he belongs, yet one is our faith and our Lord. Bless him here and when he leaves us." The text of the sermon was Heb. x. 29, "Of how much sorer punishment shall he be counted worthy who hath trodden under foot the Son of God." The preacher, the island being now a German dependency and the people familiar with the German National Anthem, showed what it would mean to trample under foot the son of the Kaiser did he come to visit them. So, he said, do those who refuse to hear the word of Jesus, who take the side of his foes. Here in Samoa are many who once knew Him and served: "Of what punishment shall they be worthy if they have turned against Him? True, God is love. He does not wish to punish. He rejoices not in visiting sin with its penalty. But all sin brings with it its own penalty. Don't be proud if you are a pastor or a church member. Perhaps you are guilty of sin which will bear its fruit in time. So the ruin of Jerusalem was the reward of its sin, though Jerusalem was the Holy City. And we who come to the Communion Service today shall not be saved by Communion." These are a few hasty notes made for me during delivery. From an English pulpit such a sermon would be ordinary enough; preached as it was by a man whose grandfather was, no doubt, a heathen and probably a cannibal, his world the Samoan archipelago, to a full congregation of his own countrymen, it was remarkable enough. Of the old religion there is nothing left but some old superstitions, beliefs and practices, such as survive even in Europe after ages of Christian profession. All the people are nominally Christians, and I should say the greater number more really so than is the majority at home. It is considered the correct thing to "belong to the church" and even to be a communicant, though none are admitted to Communion without giving satisfactory proof of the sincerity of their profession.

After another hymn and the benediction, some of the congregation, less than half, withdrew, and I gladly accepted the invitation to join in the sacred right, which is the symbol of the common life of faith of all Christian people. Not a word of reading, hymn, or prayer could I follow, nor know whether I could assent or not. But here was a language we all understood, and as I ate of the one bread and drank of the one cup of the common drink, I felt myself indeed at one with these my dark brethren, and with all followers of Christ throughout the world. I think if I had before objected to the service this novel experience would have reconciled me to it. We want something more universally understood, more sacred, more reliable than any language is, to express our consciousness of the deep underlying unity of the Spirit. Wine is not the ordinary drink of the people here, and is, indeed, unknown to the natives, dear, and not easily obtainable; moreover, it would be very undesirable to make them acquainted with its use, or lead them to look upon alcoholic drinks as desirable or permissible. So the milk of the cocoanut, with which they are familiar from infancy, is used instead. It is to them the translation into their mode of life of "the fruit of the vine" which was the common drink of Palestine.

Sailed off at 8.30 p.m. in the dirty uncomfortable little Maori, with a lot of natives, half-castes, and Mormon whites. I was asked to take the service at the mission church for the white people, but dare not risk again being late for the boat. Passed a wretched night on deck, lying on the dirty floor or finding a seat where I could.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

INTERNATIONAL MEETINGS AT GENEVA.

"GENEVA—centre and hearth of Protestant Reform of the French-speaking people—centre and hearth of liberty of thought in religion, was beforehand designed to receive into its midst the representatives of Liberal Christianity." These words are quoted from the preliminary circular announcing the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Geneva in September of this year. "The high significance of such a gathering in the ancient city of Calvin," writes Professor Montet, "will not escape the friends of liberal religion; and the local committee rely on the presence of all those to whom absolute independence in religious thought is dear."

The exact date of the meetings will be fixed later. There is to be an International Peace Congress at Lucerne in September, and care will be taken that the dates are not allowed to clash.

The preliminary programme gives the following particulars:—

On the first day the proceedings will begin in the evening with a sermon in French, followed by a reception to the foreign delegates. On the second day, at 10 a.m., there will be the President's speech, reports, and papers; after luncheon, open conference and discussion of the papers; in the evening, from 5 to 9, there will be a picnic on Lake Geneva. On the third day, the proceedings will begin with a sermon in German, followed by papers on the theoretical side of religion, with discussion as before; conversazione in the evening. On the fourth day the proceedings will begin with a sermon in English by the Rev. M. J. Savage, D.D., of New York; papers and speeches on the practical side of religion will follow; in the afternoon an organ recital in the Cathedral of St. Pierre; in the evening a banquet. A more detailed programme will be submitted later.

French, German, and English will be spoken at the meetings. Papers are not to exceed 25 minutes; speeches are limited to 10 minutes. The principal heads of the papers will be distributed among the audience, printed in all three languages.

The membership ticket will cost twenty francs, and this will entitle the holder to attend the meetings, the picnic, the conversazione, and the banquet, and also to a copy of the published report of the proceedings. The purchase of a membership ticket does not imply adhesion to any dogmatic formula nor to any particular Church. Wives of members or female relatives can procure a lady's ticket for ten francs: this entitles the holder to the same advantages as a member's ticket, with the exception of the report.

The names of many University Professors, and leading public men in Geneva are included in the organising committee. The officers are:—Professor A. Chantre, Hon. President; Professor E. Montet, President; Pastor C. Congard and Dr. P. Ladame, Vice-Presidents; Pastor E. Rochat, Secretary; M. J. Roux-Eggly, Treasurer. Among members of the Committee are:—M. G. H. Boveyron, President of the Municipal Council, M. J. J. Gourd, President of the Chamber of Commerce, Professors H. Balavoine, L. Campart, J. J. Gourd, P. Oltramare, also Deputies, Councillors, and Members of the Consistoire.

Special arrangements will be made for cheap tickets from England to Switzerland, and also for hotel and lodging accommodation at Geneva. Those desiring to join the parties from England are invited to communicate with the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C. It is hoped that quite a large number of delegates and visitors will attend from all parts of Great Britain and Ireland.

A CHURCH FOR THE UNATTACHED.

In not a few parts of the British Isles there are avowed Unitarians, and many others who are in sympathy with Unitarianism, who reside too far away from any of our places of worship to participate in the Sunday services. Instances are frequently brought to our notice of men and women who crave for just such a message as Unitarians have to offer concerning the great verities of religion, but who are prevented by distance or expense from hearing the gospel preached.

Cannot something be done to reach these eager, earnest, lonely souls? Where there is a group of them, lectures and special services, or drawing-room and cottage meetings, might be organised by the district societies or by the nearest resident minister. Too little use is made of the excellent sermon-literature of Martineau, Thom, Sadler, Herford, and others. Hymnals and books of devotion are also available in abundance for services in home-circles. Unitarians, with all their love of freedom, are often curiously, almost stubbornly, conservative in some of their opinions and methods, especially in their view that the conduct of a religious service requires the presence of a regular minister.

There are doubtless several towns and suburbs of large cities where, with enthusiasm and hard, patient toil, Unitarian churches could be established, and there is need of more keenness and enterprise on the part of several of our local and district societies in discovering suitable centres for such missionary efforts. But if all that might be done were done, there would still remain, scattered up and down the country, solitary men and women unchurched.

To meet the needs of such people the Rev. W. Channing Brown, of Littleton, Massachusetts, organised some time ago a Unitarian Church of All Souls. Once a week, regularly, an envelope containing a Unitarian sermon, and occasionally, in addition, a programme of some important meeting, a list of new books, or a pastoral letter, is posted to each adherent of the Church of All Souls. Mr. Brown endeavours, as far as possible, to establish and retain a personal interest in everyone connected with the church. Quite early in its history upwards of a hundred names were enrolled, representing several States and widely separated places. Those who are interested are invited to contribute towards the expenses as they are able, and the church may easily be made self-supporting. The American Unitarian Association provides the printed sermons and other literature, and Mr. Brown, who serves without salary, personally answers letters and renders any other service he can; consistent with his ordinary work as pastor and preacher.

In a communication received some time ago Mr. Brown says: "The letters which I print are simply to keep up the interest and the goodwill, and to make those scattered ones feel that they have a place in our fellowship. I invite personal correspondence that I may help people in their perplexities and keep in touch with their real thought and life. I select the sermons I send from the American Unitarian Association's publications and elsewhere. I try in all possible ways to make the church helpful to those who are upon our mailing list.

"I should hope that out of such a movement there would grow Unitarian lay meetings, reading circles, and eventually churches and Sunday-schools. But this is all vision and dream. The cold fact is that we have gone far enough to know that we are organising and maintaining one church which is worth while to numbers of lonely souls who have been unchurched."

Sermons by Dr. Crothers, Dr. Savage, Robert Collyer, and other American Unitarian preachers have been sent week by week in a neatly printed blue paper covering letter prepared by Mr. Brown himself. Those who receive the sermons are under no obligation to contribute towards the expenses of printing and postage, though they are invited to assist. They are asked to send word if they wish their names removed from the list; and in the event of no message of criticism or gratitude coming from correspondents for a considerable time the names are removed.

It seems to me that there are some admirable features in this Church for the Unattached. Might not each of our district ministers organise such a church as a regular part of his missionary work? I am sure the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association would be pleased to provide a selection of sermons, and to render help in other ways, if required. The Committee of the Central Postal Mission might also be willing to co-operate.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

XI.

THE domestic, as distinct from the devotional, treatment in art of the Madonna and Child dates from the fifteenth century. The Sacra Famiglia succeeded the Sacra Conversazione. It is The Holy Family in the domestic sense that touches the Protestant mind. Here we are wont to recognise the consecration and the glorification of home life. In this nearer presentation no part of the domestic ideal is lacking. Age and sex and character are brought into beautiful and harmonious relation; manhood, womanhood, and childhood meet together to form a complete whole; protecting strength, and ministering love, and appealing innocence give and receive in turn satisfaction and delight. This is the source from which, more than from any other, comes the Christian conception of the sacredness and dignity of family ties.

But do we make more of the family, and of family relationship, than Christ himself would have had us make? I am moved to say this by the words:—"Behold my mother and my brethren." St. Mark's drawing of The Holy Family differs from that of St. Matthew. It is, so to speak, in the form of a triptych. There is the group without—"his mother and his brethren"—there is the crowd within—"my mother and my brethren"; there is the unnumbered throng, wide as the far horizon—"my brother, and sister, and mother."

Some, no doubt, there are amongst us who make, not too much, but too little of the home. Family life, it is often said, shows signs of decay. It is dying, like a tree, at the top and at the bottom; the rich take their pleasures abroad, and the poor work anywhere but where they live. Parents and children live their lives apart. This may be true, and, if true, cannot be too much deplored, but the fact remains that the first thought in Christ's mind was not so much the establishment of the home as the advancement of the kingdom. We cannot easily set aside the crowning words: "Whosoever shall do the will of God." They exalt spiritual above natural ties; they point to a more comprehensive unity than that of the human family. As an expression of the perfecting "will of God," the realisation of social life must go beyond, and rank before, the fulfilment of home life. In the eternal order of things it must be so, and experience approves the larger view. Family affection, with all its sweetness and fulness, is still exclusive, self-centred. It sets up and jealously upholds its own judgments and standards, claims and traditions, sympathies and repugnances. Its charity too often ends where it begins, and then ceases to be charity. If one of its members suffer, all the members suffer, but how few are the all! There was little then in Jewish family life that needed reform, but Jewish thought was tied and bound fast at many points, and its outlook upon the world was grievously illiberal. Think of the liberating effect of those words upon those who could receive them—"brother, and sister, and mother."

There are those, moreover, to whom family life is the faintest of memories, perhaps even a remembrance of pain: There are those also to whom it is denied in prospect. Is there no larger circle to take them in, no bond of union to hold the place of blood relationship? I can almost understand the Roman cult of the Sacred Heart of Jesus when I think of the solace it may bring to those of solitary life, who have never received from any human heart the response for which they yearned.

This then, I take it, is the true Holy Family—the spiritual unity in which God is all in all. In this unity Jesus ranks himself as still a child, and claims kinship with brother, and sister, and even mother. If there is a larger fellowship, it is that of a Communion of Saints, the last inheritance of the children of light. The domestici fidei become domestici Dei. The two titles may be entwined into a motto for the New Year.

NEW YEAR'S GREETINGS.

THE Motto Card for 1905 issued by the Sunday School Association reproduces the well-known picture of the baby Moses among the bulrushes, which is also the frontispiece of the new volume of Dr. Brooke Herford's "Bible Stories Retold." The motto is, "What shall become of the Child?" to which is added Samue Longfellow's verse:—

> Go forth to life, O child of earth,
> Still mindful of thy heavenly birth;
> Thou art not here for ease or sin,
> But manhood's noble crown to win.

And on the back of the card is printed a series of Bible readings for each Sunday of the year, each month being devoted to a special subject: Our Work, Obedience, Faith and Faithfulness, Hope, Preparation, Joy, Courage and Steadfastness, Love, Truth, Thankfulness, Repentance, the Kingdom of God. On these subjects there will be some brief notes each month in the Monthly Notes for Sunday Classes, edited by Miss Marian Pritchard, and issued by the Association (½d. monthly, or by post 1s. for the year; the Motto Card, 1d., or 1s. a dozen, postage 2d. Note in the Notes that A. A. Procter's name is twice misspelt). The Monthly Notes open with a New Year's address on the subject of the Motto Card, by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, President of the Sunday School Association, which we should be glad to think will be used in one way or another in every one of our schools and in many a home. The following letter from the President was also sent out for New Year's Day to every teacher and elder scholar over sixteen in our schools. We are glad to reproduce it here that many others also may be the better for its earnest words:—

A NEW YEAR'S LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

DEAR FRIEND AND COMRADE,—Will you please accept this letter, not merely as a greeting from me to you personally, but as a token of the goodwill and fellowship existing, I trust, among the ten thousand elder scholars in the schools connected with our Association?

What an army this "ten thousand" is, and how effective for good it might be if every member of it were "up to the mark"! Whether we live in the North, South, East, or West, in England, Ireland' Scotland, or Wales, we ought to be really one in aim, sharing as we do the same great thoughts. To-day let us wish the best for one another all round.

No doubt our circumstances differ widely; but as in a game of chess it matters little what the pieces are made of, and everything how they are moved, so in our life the important thing is not what we work with, but how we work—not the scene, but how we play our part.

As a sort of elder scholar myself I am happy to reckon you not only as my "friend," but as my "comrade." You have arrived at years when you can judge for yourself things formerly taken on trust. It is equally clear to us both that, whatever our start may be, many a life fails as it goes on, not for lack of opportunity, but for lack of character, true manliness, "real grit," as we call it. On the other hand, those who possess this splendid quality win the truest success, and even turn difficulties to good use.

How, then, shall we acquire this quality? Well, how does the gardener get prize roses? Just by intelligently cultivating his rose trees. God has put high possibilities into our nature; it is ours to cultivate them, to look after our whole being, body and mind, so that by nurture and exercise it may reach as near to perfection as possible.

May the New Year find us all alert and resolute for this great endeavour! May its months and days never see us weary in well-doing, but, on the contrary, persevering,—yes, in spite of failure,—ever persevering in the attempt to win "manhood's noble crown," the fullest health, "a sound mind in a sound body," the wisest, strongest, most useful, most beautiful life!

Wishing you, above all, a brave, cheerful, grateful spirit, always ready to respond with willing service to the love, human and Divine, that blesses you every day,—I am, yours very sincerely,

WM. GEO. TARRANT.

New Year's Eve, 1904.

A GLAD NEW YEAR.

SEEK not for newness in the year;
'Tis but the old returned again,
God's mercy in its endless ring
Of summer, autumn, winter, spring;
Of joy and sorrow, pleasure, pain,
Of gainful loss, and losing gain—
All links in heaven's unfolding chain.

Seek not for newness in the year;
'Tis in thyself the new must be,
For old the new within an hour
Without the Spirit's secret power,
And new the old when eye can see
And heart can feel thro' purity,
Thro' faith, and hope, and charity.

So, seeking not, new be thy year;
New with delights oft missed before,
Old blessings grasped with gratitude,
Old pleasures shared with quietude,
New joy in bird, and tree, and flower,
New gladsome meaning in the hour
When life is dark and sorrows lower.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

THE New Year finds us half-way through the season of dark evenings, which is generally supposed to be favourable to congregational worship and social activities. There is more than half the work to do, however. Summer holidays have a knack of extending long into the fall; and then our dark evenings have been so very dark and our days so dull that the Unitarian of merely average devotion has had plenty of excuses for slackness. It is high time to awake out of sleep!

In the early months of the year the annual meetings of our churches are usually held. Does it not occur to some of our business friends that some steps should be taken to improve the character of these meetings? After all, a church is not a joint-stock company nor a society of subscribers to a charity. In the case of the latter, the committee and officers have often to think themselves lucky to get subscriptions and pass their own report with as decent a visage as possible. In the case of the former, the directors may—in good times, at least—issue their printed statement, and if the dividend is respectable they may retire in rotation, co-opt, and do pretty much anything by themselves. But if a church is not a company of brotherly people, what is it? I have seen annual meetings that could not be better devised had the intention been to freeze out the last spark of zeal, to chill the young people's imagination, and to create the impression that in spite of all the Unitarian brag we have a doleful "faith" to preach and a God-forsaken world to live in. Let us reform these things.

The young Laymen's Club is beginning to make itself felt. I believe it is ready for lots of work. Arrangers of soirées, &c., cannot do better than utilise the forces here offered. The variety in the help available is wide. You can get speakers, singers, instrumentalists, entertainers of many kinds. Some of the young laymen preach, all attend service—at least that is my belief. A recent advertisement assures the world that, doubtless for the young women's sake, the club arranges a dance now and then. They have a choral society in formation. More solid fare is not left out, be sure. Conferences with our own ministers, addresses by distinguished outsiders, practical discussions raised by members, occupy the club's attention. I believe the numbers are now full. But when cause is shown there is no reason why the club should not run to four figures instead of three.

Indeed, London Unitarianism imperatively needs all its summed up energies just now. There is a scheme for building the three churches—viz., at Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead. If one did not know how easy it is to print and post letters, circulars, and appeals, and how difficult to get them attended to, we should say every Londoner who reads these lines knows all about the scheme. And yet that cannot be the case, else the subscription list would be much longer. Once more, then, let me say, this is a scheme to complete work already begun, and well begun. In each case there is a congregation already, in each case vigorous and healthful, in each case needing better housing and general equipment. In each case the land is secured, and the preliminary buildings are in full use. The scheme has the hearty sanction of all our recognised leaders and advisers. Donations may be sent to Mr. T. H. Terry, treasurer, 89, Tierney-road, Streatham, S.W., and whether they are half-sovereigns, five-pound notes, or those handsomely inscribed cheques which are so pretty to look upon, they will be warmly welcomed. Why should a man miss the joys of life, especially in a new year? Non-subscribers, subscribe!

In the autumn (as THE INQUIRER reminded us last week), we had two or three notable "functions." That given by Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, as president of the London District Unitarian Society, was in every way encouraging and enjoyable. It was largely attended, the addresses were excellent. The earlier gathering, when the Home Missionary College Jubilee had its London echo, was spirited enough, but the generous host and hostess, Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, did not, for some reason or other, meet so large a company as they and the College's friends wished. London has not yet done its duty, I venture to think, in return for the good work done by the alumni of the College both here and in other parts of the country. But there is still room for repentance.

Among the season's meetings is to be one at Essex Hall to greet the Rev. Charles Hargrove on his return from the Antipodes. This gathering, which is to take the place of the usual autumnal meeting of the B. and F. U. A., will no doubt attract, as it deserves, friends from distant parts. Mr. Hargrove needs no praise from my pen, but every man needs some visible token at times of the love and respect felt for him; and this will be an occasion of so memorable a kind that we look to see a large assemblage of those who not only admire the Association's representative, but who are heartily glad that our brethren so far away have received this practical token of interest from their religious kindred "at home."

A few notes will convey to friends in the country how things stand generally with our score and a half of congregations. At most of them there is no conspicuous loss or gain to record. We just go on, doing—shall I dare to say—our best. Here and there I catch notes of discouragement, but these are balanced by cheerier tones elsewhere. Losses by death and removal continually trouble us. There are districts in London where the newly cleaned houses are taken by three-yearly tenants, who punctually leave at the end of their period, and try another district. It is an old complaint, also, that even good Unitarians will not infrequently let proximity to a congregation of their own kind be the last consideration when the choice of a new residence is before them. These things we fight against, and, as I said, do our best. Personally, I have had a considerable number of letters introducing young (or older) newcomers to my district. I hope this is so in other cases. Friends in the country may often do excellent service by remembering these passports in the best of all interests.

All I hear respecting the more recent settlements at our churches here is to the credit of both ministers and people. No mistake appears to have been made in the appointments offered and accepted; new efforts are being made, with no small success. One additional appointment has to be recorded, that of the Rev. Addison A. Charlesworth at Highgate. This congregation has had the misfortune of a shorter pastorate from the Rev. R. H. Greaves than was hoped. We shall all wish success to the new arrangement. Mr. Charlesworth comes to London, very much a stranger to us though not to the metropolis itself. He has a capital opportunity before him.

Unfortunately for us we are to lose the Rev. J. E. Stronge, who for ten years—its first ten—has devotedly and most successfully ministered to our Kilburn congregation. It is an added regret that after doing so much for his church, he is not destined to lead his people into the new building (which is to be built). London owes much to Mr. Stronge in other ways. He has been joint secretary of the London District Unitarian Society for a long time, and he gave most valuable service to the Ministers' Conference in its earlier years, after reconstruction. He goes to Kidderminster in the ripeness of twenty years' experience, and still with plenty of youth in brain and blood. We shall bid him a confident God-speed.

This ministerial change leaves us as badly off as before with empty pulpits; indeed, we are one worse, for our good old friend the Rev. George Carter has given notice that he will retire from the active ministry in February, and thus Peckham comes on to the vacant list. Mr. Carter has, in a quiet unobtrusive way, rendered genuine service to our cause in London. Engaged in business as well as doing Sunday duty, it is a marvel that he has stood the strain so long. His retirement will assuredly be amid the applause of many grateful people who owe him much, and who cannot grudge him now his well-earned rest. The opportunity at Peckham especially calls for a young, ardent, self-denying and tactful minister. Given such a man, there should grow up around him an excellent congregation on the foundation so well laid by Mr. Carter.

While Richmond and Acton are engaged in the difficult process of "choosing a minister" we cannot hope more than that the friends will hold well together, and thus prepare the way for the new leaders whom we trust they will secure before long. The Hackney congregation has been for several months under the ministrations of the Rev. J. Page Hopps, and strenuous efforts have been made to stir up the neighbourhood. The chief success, however, is still that of the faithful workers already on the spot, who, in spite of many difficulties, are keeping the various institutions in effective order. Mr. Hopps will perform a similar duty at Little Portland-street in the opening months of the year.

In the East there is to be, I understand, an attempt made to reach the lapsed masses by services at the Stratford Town Hall; but the particulars have not reached me. This movement is so far good; but the problem of our work in East London is of a kind that dwarfs all merely occasional spurts into comparative insignificance. Our little worshipping societies at Mansford-street, Forest Gate, Stratford, Stepney, and—further out—at Walthamstow, are undoubtedly doing good work, and their influence would be missed if they dropped out. Yet there needs some vigorous unifying force, and there needs money as well as men. Above all, there needs a deep love of souls, a care for the destitute for whom no Mansion House fund can provide, whose mental condition is chronically on the starvation line. We Unitarians have brains, more or less; have we hearts?

Let me end with a note of admiration. Our esteemed minister at Wood Green, the Rev. J. S. Mummery, completed his eightieth year on New Year's Day. Not yet is his strength labour and sorrow: with cheery mind, alert and fruitful, he still commands the love and reverent heed of his zealous young congregation. May he continue thus to keep his brethren juvenile!

W. G. TARRANT.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdare.—Our correspondent writes from the Old Meeting:—Readers must not be surprised, but this wonderful Revival is flooding our Welsh Unitarianism. The tide reached us at the Old Meeting House last night, and we are all rejoicing. The general complaint is that our meetings last too long if they exceed an hour; the complaint last night when we broke up at ten was that we broke up too soon. We must not be too great sticklers for the proprieties of etiquette when we find drunkards made sober, lives made cleaner, homes made purer, old feuds wiped away, and love and peace reigning in the place of strife and hatred. May I add that the Revival is stirring up our people to increase of endeavour and deepenings of spiritual life at Wick, Gellionen, Llandyssul, &c.

Ashton-under-Lyne (Resignation).—The Rev. W. C. Hall has resigned this pulpit, having accepted an invitation to Small Heath, Birmingham.

Birmingham: Small Heath (Appointment).—The Rev. W. C. Hall, of Ashton, has accepted the unanimous invitation of this congregation to their pulpit.

Leigh.—A very successful Sunday-school party and prize giving was held on Saturday last, and a pleasing incident in the proceedings was the presentation to the church of a polished alabaster christening font by two young ladies on behalf of the members of "Our Guild," who have been subscribing 1d. per week for that purpose during the past year.

London: Little Portland-street. — On New Year's Day, the Rev. J. Page Hopps entered upon his three months' engagement to conduct the services at this chapel. It was a bitterly cold day, but the congregations, morning and evening, though not large, were encouraging. At the evening service Mr. Page Hopps appealed to all—both old friends and new—to rally round and to stand together in the effort to revive interest in the chapel, which had an honourable past, and might have an honourable future. It was one of the few places in London which stood for modern thought, modern science, and modern ethics as applied to religion. It was essentially a home for free, rational, and spiritual worship in harmony with the modern mind, the modern conscience, and the modern ideal of God. For its own sake, therefore, it deserved and demanded support; and for their own sakes they would do well to cling to it. They might be too anxious about numbers. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation." It must be a good thing to maintain in London such a home for rational and spiritual thought and aspiration. What might come of it they knew not. All they could do was to be self-denying, serious, and faithful, fully persuaded that—

"All that is beautiful shall abide,
All that is base shall die."

London: Peckham.—The members and friends of the Avondale Band of Hope gave a tea and entertainment to about 250 poor children on Tuesday evening. After tea a short address was given by the Rev. Geo. Carter, followed by an entertainment of a most interesting character. It included a fairy tale told by Mr. A. H. Biggs, and a concert by the scholars of Bellenden-road Higher Grade School. A number of action songs were also given, and examples of musical drill.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The annual congregational party was held in the schoolroom on Monday evening, and was largely attended. The Rev. N. Anderton, who was in the chair, offered a very hearty welcome to the new friends who had joined the church, and also spoke of the valuable work done by the Ladies' Sewing Society during the past year, and appealed for help to assist in the mission services to be held in the Irlams o'-th'- Height district, with the view of spreading the Unitarian gospel there.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne.—The congregation of the Church of the Divine Unity has recently sustained an irreparable loss by the death of Miss Mary Lambert, one of the oldest members of the church, who held an unique place in the affections of the congregation. Descended from a family always identified with religious and philanthropic movements in Newcastle, she entered early into the congregational activities. For many years she was superintendent of the Sunday school, devoting infinite pains and love to the work, with the result that the efficiency of the school was then of the highest order. The Ladies' Sewing Society never had a more faithful member. From the formation of the society she was its hon. treasurer, and held that office until early in 1904. She was a member of the church committee up to the time of her death, and always took the keenest interest in its work. Until quite recently the committee often benefited by her counsel. She was always to the fore in benevolent and philanthropic work, aiding the various charitable agencies not only with liberal contributions but also by constant work on committees when needed, or as adviser, when consulted. Among many objects the Jubilee Industrial Schools, City-road, Newcastle, must be mentioned as an institution she had much at heart and furthered greatly in former years. On the day after her death the church committee passed unanimously a resolution recording its sense of the loss, and offering respectful sympathy to her surviving elder sister. Her remains were laid to rest in the family vault in Jesmond Old Cemetery, on Wednesday, December 7, when the Rev. Frank Walters read the service and gave an address, in the presence of many friends and members of the church. On the following Sunday, at the close of the sermon at morning service, the "Dead March in Saul" was played upon the organ, while the congregation stood in reverent silence. Shortly after the passing away of Miss Mary Lambert the congregation suffered a further great loss by the death, on December 28, of Mrs. Jane Alice Watson, widow of the late James Watson, at one time a well-known bookseller and a prominent Chartist. They were both earnest Unitarians, and closely attached to the church. Mrs. Watson had attained the venerable age of eighty-nine years. She was buried, amidst many proofs of respect, at St. Andrew's Cemetery, Newcastle, on December 31, the Rev. Frank Walters conducting the service. The "Dead March" was played in memory of her on Sunday last at morning service in the church.

Plymouth and Devonport (Appointment).—The Rev. J. H. Belcher, formerly a Congregationalist minister, has entered upon the joint charge of these two congregations, preaching for the present in the morning at Plymouth and in the evening at Devonport, the other services being provided for by lay help.

Rhydygwin.—The congregation has received from a local friend the gift of a plot of land for building a much-needed chapel-house and school-room.

Kilburn, Lewisham and Plumstead Church Building Funds.

AN APPEAL FOR £7,500.

THE Committee of the London District Unitarian Society urgently appeal to their fellow members of the Unitarian body on behalf of these three energetic and progressive congregations.

Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead have already amply vindicated their right to exist, and are deserving of our most generous support.

Church buildings have now become essential to secure their position, and ensure their continued progress. Excellent freehold sites have been secured, and in the case of Kilburn and Plumstead wholly paid for. A church building at Lewisham will save the congregation a yearly outlay of £70 for hire of a chapel.

Energetic ministers are in charge of the congregations.

This appeal is warmly commended by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on behalf of the Committee.

HOWARD CHATFEILD CLARKE, President.

Contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Hon. Treasurers of the Appeal Fund.

DAVID MARTINEAU, Esq., J.P., 4, South Road, Clapham Park.

"THE NEW AGE"

A Weekly Review of Politics, Religion, and Literature.

"The paper has made for some years past, and continues to make, a strong effort to touch our politics with religion. Its standpoint is that of a broad and Liberal unsectarian Christianity, and its great aim is to be helpful and suggestive to all who seek to enlarge and ennoble the national life."

"The New Age" is thus commended by R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.; JOHN BURNS, M.P.; JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.; CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.; SILAS K. HOCKING; G. W. KITCHIN, Dean of Durham; J. BRYN ROBERTS, M.P.; PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A.; HENRY J. WILSON, M.P.

"WILL WARBURTON," GEO. GISSING'S LAST WORK, will appear as a Serial, beginning with the New Year.

All Liberal Thinkers and Social Reformers should support "THE NEW AGE."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

COPIES of the title-page of THE INQUIRER for 1904 may be had (gratis) by those who require them for binding, on application to the office.

ON account of the memorial notices of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, we have been obliged to enlarge this week's INQUIRER; but, even so, a considerable number of items of Church news have to stand over.

THE attention of friends interested in the progress of liberal religion in India is directed to the appeal published on behalf of the Calcutta Brahmo Boys' School in our present issue. The support of such work does not fall within the sphere of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, but it has the cordial sympathy of the Foreign Committee of the Association. Our readers will remember that through the kind instrumentality of Mr. Ion Pritchard substantial help was recently given to the Brahmo School for Girls in Calcutta.

THE extreme difficulty of the education problem is illustrated by the reply of the Archbishop of Canterbury to an appeal made to him by American sympathisers with English Nonconformists. The appeal arose in conjunction with the Primate's recent visit to the United States, a visit which ought to have opened his eyes to the plain fact that, after all, the religious future of the English-speaking peoples does not lie in the hands of English episcopacy. Perhaps, after this, Lambeth Palace will not again veto the representation of the Anglican Church at any future Parliament of Religions, as it did, only to the discredit of Anglicanism, on the occasion of the great Chicago gathering. But to the point: the Archbishop was approached with a view to a friendly consideration of the troubles now embittering the relationship of Church and Dissent in this country. It is clear from his reply that he either cannot or will not understand that there is any real trouble at all.

NEITHER argument nor action seems sufficient to convince the Archbishop that there is anything serious the matter. "No impartial observer," he says, "can maintain that there is in these provisions [i.e., of the recent Education Act] the smallest interference with religious liberty." On the contrary, he declares that "the whole tendency of the Education Act is to remove what are described as 'Nonconformist difficulties.'" Realising, apparently, that to American readers these contentions must appear strange, he hastens to add that they can easily be proved, except to those who are "unfamiliar with the exact working of our English system." Well, no one can deny, not even an Anglican dignitary, that Nonconformists, especially in our villages, are very often rendered painfully familiar with the exact working of our English system. Their money is taken to support a system of "Catholic" teaching, Roman or Anglican, which they deplore and even detest. Their children are forced to attend schools where the so-called "atmosphere" is provided by strict clerical supervision. Their teaching sons and daughters are excluded from the possibility of attaining headships except at the price of conforming to the Church. Public control is prevented by packed committees of managers.

WHILE Dr. Davidson sees no hardship in all this, the protest of Passive Resistance goes on and increases. Some forty thousand summonses have been enforced against the resisters, and there have been nearly a hundred committals to prison. It pleases some of our contemporaries to sneer at the misguided enthusiasts who rather pay penalties and endure imprisonment than willingly accept a law of the kind; and the Archbishop seems to think that all this opposition to the Act is manufactured by skilful politicians. Can anything be more hopeless? If he deliberately said there was no help for it, but that Nonconformists must endure hardship rather than the Church's sacred duty (and privilege) should be taken away, one could at least respect his one-eyed sincerity. But to talk as he does is to deceive no one, unless it be himself. For our own part, we should like to see a system established in which the last pretence of religious bodies to be the sole or chief guardians of education should be abolished, and the community at large be recognised as the only authority in the matter. Our objection to the recent legislation arises not out of our Nonconformity—though there we suffer hardships certainly not less than those of other Dissenters—but out of our citizenship. The Acts have been passed in defiance of public opinion, and they trample on public rights. The day will come when their authors, and their supine acceptors, will be alike covered with the disgrace they deserve.

THE out-going and the incoming chairman of the Congregational Union have issued addresses to the churches which help us to understand something of their attitude to the world-problems which in one form or other are troubling all sections of the universal Church. Dr. Goodrich, as a result of his frequent intercourse with his brethren, is glad to discern signs of an increasing spirituality.

> The purpose to beget and nourish spiritual life is more definite and resolute. The intellectualism of a few years ago is giving place to an enlightened evangelism. The Gospel is treated not so much as a problem to be discussed as a message to be given. The tone is less apologetic, more prophetic. . . . And the people, I notice, are not so keen about orthodoxy and heterodoxy as about spiritual power.

At the same time there are a few things about which Dr. Goodrich is mildly disquieted. "We are exercised about our new constitution. . . . We are losing confidence in the ordinary means of grace, and getting an increased liking for detached missions, for secular clubs, for special services, and we are becoming anxious to fall upon some new method. . . . We are perplexed as to what we can do to regenerate the collective life, to help wisely the economic, the recreative, the social, the home, and all other sides of the life of the people." But "the feeling is deepening that the solution of them will come with a new quickening of spiritual life, with an enlarged baptism of the spirit of Christ."

THE New Year's message of Principal Forsyth is thoroughly characteristic of one of the most virile personalities in the Congregationalist world of to-day. Our neighbours love a strong man, one who is in no doubt as to his own meaning, and who possesses a trenchant style in which to express it. This message sounds the one note that Dr. Forsyth will repeat with cumulative energy during his year of office. We might find much to criticise in it, and many of his brethren will find themselves in antagonism. We are not concerned to criticise, but rather wonder what the effect may be. To what extent will the chairman of the Union succeed in recalling the denomination from a slightly invertebrate humanism? At least the man and his clear, confident appeal must serve as a valuable element in the Church life, forcing those who may not agree with him to examine more deeply into their own faith. Here are some sentences which outline the thought:—

The greatest thing of all is the positive Gospel, at any theological cost—the positive Gospel instead of the mere "Spirit of Christ," a divine, eternally decisive deed at the Bible's core instead of only a character loving and beloved, a Redemption instead of a mere divine appeal and moral recall.

And here in the thought of Atonement as an external juridical transaction, and not merely a spiritual process, challenge is given to the growing tendency of the Congregational churches. Or, again, as to the task of the Saviour:—

The moral need was not sympathy, but expiation, and not amelioration but redemption, and not adjustment but reconciliation. It was not the sorrow of the grievous world that lay upon him, but its sin. . . . And it is not the sense of world-sorrow that equips the great deliverers for their work. They must outgrow their Buddhisms and their Wertherisms; come to close and final quarters with human sin; feel the wound to Holy God more than the damage to pitiful man; . . . and gain from his foregone moral Redemption a power and insight that do not always go with acutest sympathy.

The attention of friends in London is called to the advertisement of a performance of the Cantata "Princess Zara," to be held at the Mansford-street Mission next week, on behalf of the Southend Home.

A recent number of the Chicago Unity contained the following "Helps to High Living," taken from Carlyle's letters to Emerson:—

Sunday.—A friendly thought is the purest gift that man can afford to man.

Monday.—Silence is the great thing I worship at present; almost the sole tenant of my Pantheon. Let a man know rightly how to hold his peace.

Tuesday.—A man that has discerned somewhat and knows it for himself let him speak it out and thank Heaven.

Wednesday.—The rudest speech of a man's heart goes into men's hearts and is the welcomest thing there.

Thursday.—There are blessings which do like sun gleams in wild weather make this rough life beautiful with rainbows here and there.

Friday.—Man lives by Belief (as it was well written of old); by logic he only at best longs to live.

Saturday.—This earth is not an unmingled ball of mud, after all. Sunbeams visit it;—mud and sunbeams are the stuff it has from old consisted of.

From the stern discipline of life we may learn that we are watched over by a love that would make us worthy of being loved.—H. W. Crosskey.

By a Minister.

XII.

In the Colloquies of Erasmus there is nothing more engaging than the dialogue between two belated Franciscan friars and a village innkeeper, of whom they ask shelter for the night. In the bandying of words which follows the would-be guests are more than a match for the surly host. At first he will have none of them, would drive them from his door, hurls at them every kind of well-worn taunt and sneer. They meet and turn all his points, with now and then a lunge and thrust to his own confusion; they defend their order, their habit, their manner of life; they lead their assailant on by degrees into more serious talk; and all with so much humour and good sense, that he is at last quite disarmed, supplies their wants, and promises them good treatment, if ever they come again that way.

One of the pleas put in on the monkish side of the argument is the contention that the monk, in the first instance, was only a better sort of layman (purior pars laicorum). This, I suppose, is true. It was the world, not the church, that made the first monk. It did not love the better sort of layman. It drove him into isolation, first, and then into association with his kind. He did not yet aspire to the priesthood, and for many a year no priest was allowed to become a monk. He wished only to possess his soul in peace, and the clothing of his body was the dress of the ploughman or shepherd of his time.

As you cannot indict a whole people, so neither can you indict an institution which numbers its years by centuries. Its long life, if it is not an answer to all charges, is still its best defence. That it has survived is a proof that it had a function and met a need. It is like a tree, which grows, flourishes, declines, decays; is fruitful and barren by turns; is now in need of furtherance and now of restraint; and is a good tree, or a bad tree, according to the time and season chosen for passing judgment. Monachism shows every variation which friends and enemies alike desire it to exhibit. It has been a source of blessing and of woe, has ennobled human effort and degraded it, enriched human character and enfeebled it. The history of monachism in our own country seems to present all these stages and transitions in edifying order. Celtic converts, excluded from family and tribe, set up their wattled cells together, entering into new association under a new tie. With the seventh century, and the reintroduction of Christianity, began that passion for the "religious" life which filled the mind of Bede, now with grateful admiration, and now with prophetic dread. Luxury and laxity had begun to creep into the English monasteries a hundred years before the Northmen purged them with flame. Reform followed, with the encouragement of the Benedictine rule, and the Benedictine order was itself in course of time reformed by developments of severer rule—Cluniac, Cistercian, Carthusian. But all in vain. Wealth and power had begun to dissolve the monasteries, long before the order for dissolution came.

And yet how unfair it is to judge the monk by the failure of his system. There is not a form of corporate life which has not failed, or has been saved as by fire. We do not yet know what we owe to the individual monk. It is a commonplace to say that he once held the loneliest outposts of civilisation, reclaimed waste lands, cultivated the arts of peace, nursed the sick, sheltered the friendless, fed the hungry, taught the young, and kept alive and handed on the torch of learning. What is often forgotten is, that in the days when the profession of arms alone was worthy, and nearly all labour of the hands was servile, few of these things would have been done if the monk had not been willing to do them. Under the transforming vow everything common was touched with new dignity. Nor, by living apart from the world, did he, to his own mind, or in the minds of others, cease to live for the world. His prayers availed, it was thought, for those who toiled by land or sea.

It should be remembered also that, without the special immunity from depredation allowed to religious houses, there would have been little security amid the strife and sweep of arms for the triumphs of peace. And, further, if the monastery was sometimes the refuge of the weak, it was more often the training school of the strong. The story of Hugh of Avalon, says Froude, ought to be familiar to every English boy. It is the story of a twelfth century bishop who wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, out of weakness was made strong. Under the bishop's robe he wore the Carthusian shirt. It needed a brave man to withstand two of England's fiercest kings in acts of tyranny, but he who had died to the world, and had gone far in conquest of himself, was the man to to it, and did it well.

It has been said that no religion which has ever attained a certain degree of development has failed to produce the monk; and, further, that for the monk, as a distinctive type of good man, a religion which would be universal must continue to find room. To this we may add that, if some of the better sort of laymen will set themselves to endure hardness, and bind themselves to fight against fleshliness and worldliness, we will not quarrel with them about a name. And yet our friars in the Colloquy put another view very aptly, when they put it to the inn-keeper—Humanam regulam desideras, qui regulam evangelicam professus sis? Think of your duty to your wife and children, they continue, and to your servants, and you will find that your burden is heavier than if you had professed the rule of St. Francis.

Hugo of Lincoln argued much to the same effect when he said, God, at the day of judgment, would not ask why he had not been a monk, but why he had not been a Christian.

Our fidelity must be tested in the warfare of the world; and our daily life is the battle-field where we must either conquer or yield.—Echoes of Holy Thought.

We live in an eternal world, and watch with ever-deepening love and delight the mighty unfolding purposes of God.—C. J. Perry.

THE RELIGIOUS SITUATION IN FRANCE.

THE great change which the past year has brought in the religious situation in France is that the prospect of a separation between the State and the official churches has come very much nearer than it was at the beginning of 1904. Since the time of Napoleon I. there have been four churches in France, called national churches, because their organisation is recognised by State laws and their ministers are appointed by the Government after presentation by the ecclesiastical authorities, and receive a small salary from the national treasury. The Roman Catholic Church, which includes, at least nominally, the immense majority of the French people, the Reformed or Calvinistic Protestant Church, the Lutheran and the Jewish Churches. Besides these official bodies there are some small free churches, as we call them, which have no bond at all with the State, e.g., Baptist, Methodist, Evangelical, but numerically they are a negligible quantity.

The separation between the churches and the State, i.e., the suppression of any legal bond between them, a kind of disestablishment, has been for more than half a century an article of the radical programme in France. But until last year most of the partisans of this reform themselves acknowledged that it was not yet practicable in this country. No doubt on many platforms it was a topic pro forma, which the candidate subscribed as a proof of his strong anti-clerical feelings, and which was accepted by the constituents, as synonymous with independence in politics towards the spiritual power of the Roman church. Even at the last general elections, in 1902, when a radical majority was returned, this question did not seem to stir the people, for it was left on one side in most of the programmes. Yet, now, two years later, with the same Parliament and the same Government, one may think that within some months the separation will be realised.

What are the reasons of such a change? There are many. In politics there are currents which increase in force till they are exhausted by their own excess. In France since the "affaire Dreyfus," which showed the dangerous power of the clerical and military spirit, we have an "anti-clerical" current, which has become mightier from year to year, and seems now to have reached its highest mark. The first attack was against the monks, against that great number of friars of all names and all colours, who since the foundation of the Republic had increased as never before, and who tried to lay hands on the schools, the church, the army, &c. The Prime Minister Waldeck-Rousseau was the leader during the first stage; he drew up a Bill on the right of association, which was the first really liberal one we ever had in France, but which stipulated a difference between civil or undenominational associations and monastic congregations, and subjected the latter to special conditions. The object of that Bill was to be the dissolution of all congregations which did not obtain a special licence from Parliament.

A new House was then elected. M. Waldeck-Rousseau resigned of his own accord, and the duty of applying the Bill devolved upon his successor, the Prime Minister Combe. He was known as a strongly anti-clerical member of the Senate. In his early youth he was a pupil of a seminary, and was intended for the priesthood, but he escaped before taking orders, and from his sacred studies he retained only a strong aversion for the spirit which prevails in those seminaries, and an irreconcilable hostility to clerical principles. There are no bitterer enemies of the church than those who, having been once her pupils, have escaped from her authority. On the other hand, the new Parliament, made up of members who, forasmuch as they were radical and anti-clerical, had met in their boroughs a furious opposition, not only of the monastic party, but of all the clericals, hoping to be able to modify the Bill on the congregations, came together with highly incensed feelings against everything clerical.

The result was that the Government and the majority of Parliament agreed in refusing licence to all monastic congregations devoted to teaching or to contemplative life, and who had not been regularly authorised in former times. It must be remembered that, even before the Republic, the former Governments in France, however they might be often of a clerical spirit, gave but to very few monastic orders an official acknowledgment, as they liked better to maintain them in some dependence on the civil power. The only ones whose requests have been taken into consideration by M. Combe are those devoted to charity works, and I must add that it was chiefly because the State would not have been able to take charge of all the poor, the orphan, sick, or crippled who are nursed in the numerous institutions of the church by monks and especially by nuns. The situation of each of those charity organisations has to be examined apart.

Certainly such an application of the law elaborated by M. Waldeck-Rousseau was very stringent. It seemed justified by the need for a strong effort to stop the dreadful extension of monastic education which conduced to a separation of our French youth in two hostile camps, as in the time of the Ligue in the sixteenth century. But one may easily understand that the whole Roman Catholic party was very much excited by such a policy. The antagonism between clericals and anti-clericals became acute, and, as always happens in such cases, every day a new conflict arose between the Government and the Roman Church.

According to the Concordat the French Government elects the bishops, and the Pope gives them spiritual confirmation. Since about twenty years the Roman Court had contracted the habit of writing in the Bull of investiture "Nobis nominavit," instead of "nominavit." This little word "nobis" seems of no importance, but it changes the meaning of the sentence. It means the French Government "has named to us" (the Pope) M. N. to be a bishop, instead of "has named" only, which means, in Latin, "has chosen, or elected." So the French Government seemed only to make a proposal to the Pope and to share with him the right of nomination. This is a very fine example of clerical cunning. Now M. Combe refused to agree to such bulls, and after long negotiations he gained his cause. But if the right form was re-established there was not much change in substance. The Roman Court refuses to invest the bishops chosen by the French Government, because they are, or at least they seem to be, liberal, republican, and democratic. It is always easy to find some ecclesiastical reason to justify a refusal, which is really only inspired by the fear of introducing into the bishoprics of France some free-minded prelates, who on occasion would be able to maintain their independence against the Pope.

Now it is the visit of President Loubet to the King of Italy in Rome, without going first to pay his tribute of homage to the prisoner of the Vatican, which provokes a protest of the Roman Court, in such terms that the Government is obliged to recall its ambassador at the Vatican; and when, some months later, the budget of the foreign department comes before Parliament, the credit for the ambassador is refused by a great majority.

And so it goes on. When a husband and wife live on bad terms, they quarrel about everything, the slightest fact gives occasion to virulent scenes, and if one of them has a friend, who, instead of pacifying, would prefer them to be separated, they are easily brought to the prospect of a divorce.

The friend who in this case has introduced the proposal of divorce is the socialist party, which has great influence in Parliament, although not numerous, because it is the indispensable complement of the majority of M. Combe. Last spring, as soon as spirits were sufficiently excited, they brought in a Bill of separation between State and churches. The Government did not object to the Bill being taken into consideration. A Committee was elected to examine it and to make a report. The result of the vote was that in a Committee of 33 members there were 17 for and 16 against separation. At first it seemed that under such conditions it would not be possible to realise such an important reform. But there is the anti-clerical current of which I spoke in the beginning of this letter.

The influence of the sticklers for separation has grown stronger. The Government itself, nettled by the behaviour of the Roman Court, has come to a decision. M. Combe has introduced his own Bill, much more severe than that of the socialists, and the Committee, always indeed with a majority of only one voice, has adopted it nearly whole. Now they say that the public discussion will be held in the first session of 1905. And so it happens that on January 1, 1905, we are perhaps on the eve of the separation between State and churches, when on January 1, 1904, nobody thought that such a reform could come for many years.

THE farewell sermons preached by the Rev. S. Farrington at the Richmond Free Church on October 30, on "Experience Worketh Hope" and "The First and the Last," have now been published, and copies may be had at Essex Hall, or from Dr. H. C. H. Carpenter, Brook Lawn, Teddington, Middlesex. Mr. and Mrs. Farrington are sunning themselves at Palermo under blue Sicilian skies. In Rome they would find the Rev. James Harwood and his family, and Dr. and Mrs. Joseph May, of Philadelphia.

LITERATURE.

QUINTIN HOGG.*

THIS Life of Quintin Hogg by his daughter is an exceedingly interesting book. Born in 1845, the son of rich parents, and one of a large family, he went to Eton, and at nineteen into business in the City. His mother was a deeply religious woman on the lines of the old Evangelical orthodoxy. So the boy was "converted" at school, and was at first very orthodox. But his religion was never in the least morbid. In his mind and heart the thoughts of salvation and service were closely linked. He writes: "I saw that I was to begin by being saved, and then work for love of Him who saved me." Here he strikes his key-note.

Hogg was a great athlete at school and very fond of outdoor recreation. But sympathy with others awoke in him very early, and as he went about in London the sight of the ragged little urchins of the great City haunted him, "and his heart cried out in overwhelming pity for them." Their ignorance appalled him. "What do you know about God?" he asked two little urchins playing in Trafalgar-square while the church bells were ringing. "Why, that's the chap wot sends us to 'ell," came the prompt reply. He felt that God "for whom one has done so little" was calling him to bring others to better ways. In these early business days he writes: "I felt as if I should go mad unless I did something to try and help some of the wretched little chaps I used to see running about the streets." It was so plain to him that they had no means of innocent recreation, of education, of anything that could turn them into God-fearing respectable citizens. This, it should be remembered, was about the middle sixties.

The work with which Quintin Hogg's name became so closely associated, which he inspired and built up from the humblest of beginnings, had its actual commencement in an offer to teach two crossing-sweepers to read under one of the Adelphi arches. The flight of the pupils at the approach of the police is humorously told. Hogg felt that he must know more about such boys in order to help them effectively. So he purchased a second-hand suit of shoeblack clothes and the outfit required for the craft, and, office hours being over, occupied himself in holding horses, blacking boots, and performing odd jobs. It is on record that he once blacked his father's boots, being unrecognised by that stately gentleman. He slept under arches in company with his new friends and turned up smiling at breakfast at home the next morning. After a few months he and a fellow-worker hired a room in an alley and started a ragged school. But this was not his only care. He visited the whole district in which his ragged school was planted, and was always putting forth new efforts. He started meetings for Covent Garden porters, held open-air meetings, was connected with a medical mission in Endell-street, had a Mission Hall in Hart-street, and a class for flower girls. We get vivid records of his experiences. One of the families he visited at this time prided itself on being "the wickedest family in the court," and all these slums were cesspools of iniquity. But Hogg had quenchless patience and perseverance. Of this "wickedest family" two members are now at mission work in the City, another is a nurse, a fourth is the matron of a hospital in New South Wales.

But, full of compassion as he was, he was the determined enemy of crime, and did his best to bring thieves to justice. So, for a while he went in peril of his life, and twice nearly lost it by being trapped into dens of infamy, where attempts were made to kill him. But his courage, quickness, and physical strength brought him safely through. On another occasion, being in bed with a bad cold, he was suddenly called out to quell a riot among some older boys, and found for the first time that he had some kind of instinct or capacity for managing them. Wherever he worked he would have order.

These labours went on for about five years, from his nineteenth year till he was nearly four-and-twenty. All this time he was characterised by qualities not always found in combination. The condition of the poor and wretched made unfailing appeal to him; he was an enthusiastic athlete; he was still the irrepressible schoolboy; and he was also an industrious, hard-working, and capable man of business. The affairs of his firm called him after a while to the West Indies. He left the work in which he was so deeply interested in the hands of capable and devoted helpers, and on his return found the ragged school still growing. Removal was made to more spacious premises, and all varieties of ameliorative work were carried on. Hogg's personal magnetism quickened fellow-labourers into an enthusiasm and effectiveness like his own. Still the work grew, and a better class of working boys were drawn into it and helped in the ragged school. Thus there began to shape itself the nucleus of the Polytechnic, which now numbers 18,000 members and students.

Hogg was an early convert to the desirability of emigration, for great numbers of the lads with whom he came in contact. What so many of them needed was a fresh start in new surroundings, away from the old corrupting influences. Much time and labour were given to the emigration scheme, and in the course of a few years 1,500 boys were sent out. When, a few months after their marriage, Hogg and his wife went to Canada, they found everywhere boys rescued from filthy slums now occupying good positions, leading right lives, and willing to help others. There is a striking story (p. 81) illustrating the way in which the rescued helped in the work of rescue. A thief taken from the London streets into the home had been sent out to America at a cost of £10, and Hogg told him he must repay the money when he could, to enable another boy to be sent. "The lad prospered, then proceeded to use that £10 by sending for first one and then another of his old comrades," and "in this way twenty boys were brought out and started afresh by that £10." A man, personally a stranger to Hogg, who accosted him in America, was one of the twenty. "You see, sir," he ended, "Jack used to say that as he had been helped himself he felt bound to pass it on." Much of the philosophy of redemptive work is summed up in these words.

Before long, Hogg broke down with a serious illness, and he suffered from frequent ill-health all the rest of his life. But he never relaxed his efforts for the common good. Fault has been found with Miss Hogg's story of her father's life on the ground that the book is too big. It is indeed a substantial volume, but there is little in it which one would wish away. And it is to Miss Hogg's credit as a biographer that, full of admiration as she is for her father, she does not attempt to make out that he was perfect. He had the saint's simple piety and selflessness, with a wonderful capacity for doing well whatever he undertook; but he seems never to have lost a certain boyish and inconsiderate love of mischief and horse-play, and his practical jokes and the roars of laughter with which he greeted the discomfiture of his victims must sometimes have been rather hard to bear. But those who suffered from his pranks loved him all the same, and it was largely his sustained boyishness that carried him through. The testimony which his old schoolfellow, the Duke of Argyll, gives to his character is valuable from this point of view, and the portraits and other pictures in the biography bring the whole narrative more vividly before us.

Quintin Hogg's later labours were not among quite the lowest class, as his earlier had been. But this was only because he had lifted up so many hundreds of those among whom he first started, and had, so to say, grown with them. Under his direction the Polytechnic became a great working-class club with technical classes; and the work was all so solidly built up that it has not suffered from the loss of its founder. Last year, 1903, £14,000 was received in fees alone, and all of these were small. The work as it grew may be described as an all-round development, with Religion as its inspiring force. Hogg was always on the look-out for improvement and enlargement. A favourite quotation of his was the couplet:—

Our lives must climb from hope to hope,
And realize our longing.

Death, swift, unexpected, painless, came to him at the beginning of last year. His last act was one of generosity to a lad on a cold winter's night. Then, the summons, and he passed quietly away. His religious convictions had broadened greatly during his later years. He cared nothing latterly about denominational distinctions. He simply pleaded with the lads whom he still met in class every Sunday afternoon, "Let your creed make you a power for good among your fellows. : : : God set a Life before us—the life of Jesus. : : : I wish I could get you to throw overboard all schemes and plans and creeds, and come in touch with the living God." "I don't want you to change your religion," he said to a Roman Catholic boy; "I want your religion to change you." Living thus, he was ready both for life and death, and as he drew near his last day on earth "he saw only the outspread arms of the Everlasting Father and the welcome of a lifelong Friend."

HEALTH AS A NATIONAL ASSET.*

WHEN the student allows his imagination to ponder over man's mortality, he becomes aware of a something unrecognised in our common moods. For the most part, and this is a condition of healthy activity, the Present with its wealth of concrete interests is regarded as all important, as practically stable if not metaphysically unchanging. But there are other times when we discern this so enthralling Present, with its mighty leap of multitudinous life, as itself a moment surging to that Past which already includes so many epochs once equally full and equally engaging with our own. We are apt to reduce the rich complexity of human experience in a bygone age to some few prominent events, or some leading idea which we discover as regnant in its life. We crystallise the thought and forget the experience. When we look on our own age we reverse this. Yet our own age also is dominated by one insistent pre-occupation. As individuals and as communities, we have become aware of our own maladies, and bend our most passionate desire to the improvement of our health. When we and all our contemporaries are reduced to a single sentence in some future philosophical history, the reflection may be something after this fashion—an age which desired above all things to be healthy, and which by its inept social polity fostered and encouraged disease.

The concern of the time spirit for health may explain the splendid thoroughness of the ideal medical practice as it is expounded for us by Mr. Lionel Tayler. A general disregard for the laws of health resulting in social maladjustment forms the burden of his harsh and salutary indictment. On these two features only of Mr. Tayler's most instructive book is it possible to touch, and this all too briefly. We can but pass by the useful summary of the modern position on heredity with which the volume opens, and the confession of hope, a scientist's religious faith with which it closes.

Presumably we owe this book to the experience obtained and reflections suggested by Mr. Tayler's own practice. And the book does most interestingly describe how the doctor regards us when we enter his consulting room. At first blush it may come as a shock to learn that the question uppermost in our own minds on such an occasion is quite subordinate in his. We are consumed with worry as to what is the matter with us; he is asking, who is this ailing one, what his character, temperament, history, occupation, possibility, and destiny? Asking also where, how, with whom living? What influences are about the patient, in what manner does he respond to his environment? The determination of the precise disorder is only the final, and would seem to be the least important consideration. This sixth chapter is the one to which the general reader who has not at the outset any strong interest in social evolution, as a scientific study, will do well to turn in the first place. He is likely to be led on from the more personal to the larger aspects of the question.

Two points emerge from this preliminary view of a single chapter: in order to become minister of healing the medical man must possess a profound knowledge of human nature and of the environment in which men live. On the first point the cardinal doctrine would seem to be that "a-man-is-a-man" is only a partial truth. He is not merely a man, but a man of determined qualities which have to be discovered. A large section of Mr. Tayler's volume is devoted to a discussion of these different types or temperaments. We cannot now enter into the physiological question of the influence of the various glands on the different types of character, but must not forego a mention of the practical conclusion that the different temperaments are subject in different degrees to specific diseases, and that treatment and resultant quality of health are in part determined by the temperament of the patient.

The description of temperaments is extremely instructive, and is rendered the more interesting by the excellent illustrations prepared by Miss Minna Tayler. These faces are exaggerated types, not faces of actual individuals, but obtained by selection of features from many actual portraits and photographs. Being accentuated, they are strange, and some of them repulsive; at the same time it is not difficult to find resemblances between our friends and one or other of these type faces which succeed admirably in the author's aim of portraying the tremendous natural difference of man from man. There are several distinct types at a given time, yet they are not constant from age to age, but, like all transient beings, are liable to change, and one, not altogether lovely type, that of John Bull, is said to be gradually disappearing.

Now these different types of men are suited more or less for different environments, and different environments produce the commensurate type. The scum type, for example, the idle upper class, is adapted to the stall seats of a variety theatre, or those other worse haunts of which we hear from time to time. The slum type is fitted for the filthy tenement. But—and this is the stern, relentless refrain of the argument—not only are these types base, the environment is debasing. Not only does the condition suit the profligate rich man, but the condition that suits him destroys the man of finer character; not only is the slum suitable to a degraded form of life, it is deadly to higher forms. When children of nobler possibility are born, the tendency is for them to die, or at least for the nobler part of them to be submerged. Disease attacks not only those who are morally or physically below the standard, but also and impartially those who are above it. The social environment to-day is fatal to nobility of character. "There is something indescribably awful in this thought. Actually at this time . . . human beings who are failing in business, and dying from disease, because, and only because, they are nobler, more self-sacrificing, more intelligent, and more refined than their fellows," or, again, because they are "too human, too advanced for the brutal nature of their environment.".

Evil conditions make evil men. This is the conlusion to which modern science is driven. It was stated in very startling terms by the medical witnesses before the Physical Deterioration Committee, so much so that we are told that the bulk of undergrowth and of the diseases of malnutrition might be practically wiped out in a single generation. Society has precisely the stunted, unhealthy, degraded human refuse which it chooses and creates; when we choose to provide the conditions of healthy life we shall enjoy health, and not till then. This is a terrible indictment. Yet it is no whit exaggerated. Many lines of evidence converge to its support, whether in the form of immediate experience of the heroic and helpless wrestling of the poor with slum conditions which crush out hope—there is no sober hope in the slums—poison health and destroy life, or in shape such as this and other studies carried out by men of science, stated in language which may seem at first bald and severely cold, but which is soon found to be the expression of hot, noble indignation. This indignation is not a merely idle exercise if the evil which evokes it lies in our own power to remove, but may prove an instrument in the first task of reform, an arousing of the national conscience from complacency with which at present the evil is regarded.

Judging from the treatment in the present volume of the effect of industrial life on womanhood, we anticipate valuable results from Mr. Tayler's promised further work on the industrial environment in relation to the various temperamental types.

LIFE AND WORK IN THE EUPHRATES VALLEY.*

IN a chatty and interesting volume Mr. Geere tells of his life in the Euphrates Valley, and of the work of exploration in the camp of the American Expedition at Niffer, the ancient Nippur. A chapter or two is also devoted to an account of the author's work, under Professor Petrie's direction, at Oxyrhynchus and Deshasheh, at which latter place he superintended the excavation of the old cemetery. For the thoroughness and carefulness of Professor Petrie's methods he has nothing but praise.

No detail was too unimportant for attention; the position in which the bodies lay; . . . the condition of the grave—whether unopened or plundered in early times; the presence or absence of offerings and funeral objects—all these things were observed and carefully recorded.

Very different was the way in which the mounds of Nippur had been explored by the American Expedition previous to the arrival of Dr. Hilprecht. Trenches and shafts had been excavated here and there without system. The digging had been random, and the soil was often dumped on mounds not yet explored.

"Mounds so extensive and complex as those at Nippur," says Mr. Geere, "should be carefully 'peeled' layer by layer, each stratum being thoroughly examined and planned in turn, and then entirely removed in order to lay bare the lower one.'' Only thus carefully, indeed, could a mound like that covering the temple of Bel be explored, for this famous temple, after being covered again and again by new pavements and coatings of masonry, was finally converted into a fortress by the Parthians. The walls were cased with layers of very large bricks, raised and thickened and strengthened at intervals by circular towers. The lofty ziggurat was cased with burnt bricks; its upper platform, strengthened by great arms projecting about fifty feet from its principal sides, was covered with buildings for housing the garrison, and a well was sunk right through its solid mass to water level, thus converting it into an almost impregnable citadel. In a vault beneath a room in the outer wall was discovered, whilst Mr. Geere was at Nippur, the remains of two Parthian officers of high rank. Amongst many objects of gold, such as buttons, rings, and buckles, a coin of the Emperor Augustus was found, fixing the date of the burial after 41 A.D.

Beneath the remains of this Parthian fortress lie the structures of the native kings, dating back to a hoar antiquity. Ur Gur (2700 B.C.)—one of the chief builders of the ancient times—faced the ziggurat with burnt bricks, and laid a new pavement in the inner court, covering that of Naram Sin (3800 B.C.), which overlies yet earlier work of pre-Sargonic days. The work of Ur Gur was buried in its turn by Ur Ninib and others, followed by Ashurbanipal (668-626 B.C.).

Splendid indeed must the temple have been in those ancient days, and impressive the view from its lofty ziggurat over the fertile plain of Babylonia. Even now in the days of its ruin, and of the desolation of the country, Mr. Geere describes the view from its summit as charming. "It is worth a journey to the mounds," he exclaims, "for a sight of the country from Bint el Amir whether you greatly care for the ruins or not."

The charm of the East, that wonderland of vast solitudes and teeming towns, of excited crowds and leisurely restful life, so picturesque, so strange, so incomprehensible to the dweller in the West, has fallen upon the author of this book. Of Baghdad, whose very name calls up the magic of the Thousand and One Nights, or the brilliant half-fabulous, half-historical Arabian civilisation in the days of Haroun-er-Rashid, the contemporary of Charlemagne, he writes:—

> It is impossible to convey its charm by description, . . . it is the kind of place where anything might happen. You find it easy to believe in the jann and magicians of the old stories when you walk round the place; and as for the natives, they do firmly believe in such things still, and will tell you of seeing a jinnee as naturally as they will tell you of seeing a camel.

The fascination of Baghdad is the fascition of the past, of story and romance, of a life full of variety and colour, but, above all, the fascination of mystery.

Mr. Geere tells how he would watch the passers-by in the street for hours together with unflagging interest. He speaks of the alleys, shut in by high walls, that hide a mysterious life of which you get but a rare glimpse now and then; of the bazaars, thronged with busy life and full of colour, of the mosques filled with excited or fanatical worshippers; of the cafés where you find the native taking his ease, "making kaif," and chatting with his friends. His description of this strange and varied life; of his journeys to the mounds and adventures with the Arabs, of the workmen at the camp at Niffer, of the ceremonious entertainment of the explorers by an Arab sheikh; of his visit to the sacred places of the Shiahs, at Nijef, where is the tomb of Ali, the cousin and earliest convert of the Prophet, and at the equally venerated shrine of the murdered Hussein at Kerbellah; and of his journey along the banks of the Euphrates, are full of local colour and life. One realises more vividly after reading the book the features of that strange and far-off region, and the customs and ways of life of its people. One has also to revise one's ideas of the scenery of the ancient kingdoms of Shinar and Akkad, which one thought of as dreary and forbidding. Mr. Geere found it full of delicate colour, and felt the charm of its wide horizon and of its soft restful beauty.

He travelled home along the Euphrates Valley to Deir, past the weird, smoke-blackened town of Hit, with its bitumen springs and furnaces—a miniature Black Country in the East—along the river now fringed by the desert, and now running through fertile grounds; past the ruins of ancient towns and strong fortresses that had withstood the shock of Egyptian and Babylonian, Greek and Persian, Roman and Parthian, and now await the spade of the explorer; past many places full of beauty such as the country round the mouth of a tributary stream. This last, he says—

> Is a lovely spot, shut in by magnificent red and yellow cliffs, in which thousands of brilliant-hued pigeons have their nests, its water is singularly clear, and of a beautiful peacock blue. Its banks are of clean shingle, which gradually gives way to patches of bright green grass, and a few young palms serve to make the charm of the picture complete. Under any circumstances the creek would command admiration, but coming upon it as you do from the desert, it looks like a bit of fairyland.

The book is well illustrated, very readable, and can hardly fail to accomplish the the object the writer has aimed at, "to interest the reader in the life and scenery of the Euphrates."

"JESUS SAITH."

I.—INTRODUCTORY.

IN the course of a recent conversation between a liberal clergyman of the Church of England and the present writer the former referred to the severe shock with which he himself had realised years ago that we did not possess the ipsissima verba of Jesus. The words recalled the aphorism of some German theologian—surely calculated to fall upon a believer's ears with an even deeper shock—that "the materials for a 'Life of Christ' do not exist." Yet the smallest reflection should convince anyone that the observation just quoted strictly embodies the truth. The Gospels, on any theory whatsoever, are not "biographies"; even accepting them as they stand they form a singularly fragmentary record of that brief portion of the life of Jesus which was filled by his public ministry, one, or at the highest computation three,—years; while the application of modern critical principles forces us not only to reject many parts of the narratives as legendary, but throws doubt on much even that does not a priori strike the reader as unhistorical.

But if the chronicle of Christ's doings is thus incomplete and frequently doubtful, how much more incomplete is the record of his recorded sayings! Two hours would probably prove sufficient for a recital of all the utterances attributed to him by the Evangelists; while here again it must be admitted that some of these utterances may not be authentic, and the authenticity of a whole type or class—those peculiar to the Fourth Gospel—is open to serious question. Surely it has to be admitted that on the historical side our knowledge of Jesus is surprisingly meagre.

Without doubt it formed part of the Divine plan that we should judge Jesus—or, rather, should undergo his influence—less by reason of what he did, or by what he said, than by what he was, a point most ably brought out in Dr. Crooker's new volume "The Supremacy of Jesus"; yet we should be less than human could we forbear the wish that something more had been handed down concerning the earthly career of the Founder of our religion, or that some additional material might come to light, supplementing the scanty information in our possession. Might not such material be in existence, waiting merely to be discovered and to enrich our mental picture of the personality of Christ—telling us of some significant, but hitherto unrecorded incident, some words of his, not found in any of the four canonical narratives, but bearing the impress of genuineness? What would we not give, e.g., for the re-discovery of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which was in use among the Jewish Christian Churches as late as the end of the fourth century, and is assigned by Harnack to a date possibly earlier than Matthew, Luke, and John!

Such a find may or may not lie before some lucky explorer: so much is certain that any least ray of new light upon the life and teaching of Jesus would be eagerly welcomed by a world apparently never tired of facts and theories concerning the Son of Man; and hence the interest excited by the discoveries, first in 1897 and again last year, of two papyri, each containing a number of sayings ascribed to Jesus—some of them having parallels in our Gospels, while others were entirely "new." The main facts concerning these fragments are probably well known to many readers. They were found in the course of excavations carried on among the ruins of Oxyrhynchus, once an important city, which stood on the edge of the Libyan desert, 120 miles south of Cairo. Both appear to have been written in the course of the third century, and are thus older than any known existing copy of our Gospels; it is a peculiarity of both that each saying is prefaced by the words "Jesus Saith," thus distinctly affirming its authenticity; and of both may be said what the discoverers, Dr. Grenfell and Dr. Hunt, said of the first, viz., that "the primitive cast and setting of the sayings, the absence of any consistent tendency in favour of any particular sect, the wide divergences in the familiar sayings from the text of the Gospels, the striking character of those which are new," all combine to indicate a high antiquity for the collections from which these two odd leaves are fragments, preserved by a favouring chance.

Needless to say, the announcement of the results obtained by the fortunate explorers started a multitude of critical speculations. Scholars remembered the famous statement of Papias, that Matthew compiled the "logia" of Jesus in Hebrew—a compilation which may have formed the nucleus of our Gospel according to Matthew. Had these newly-found fragments any connection with the compilation ascribed to the Apostle? This is considered improbable. Were they excerpts from any lost Gospel such as that according to the Egyptians? Was the collection a free compilation from Gospels canonical and uncanonical? Such are some of the problems debated by students of Christian antiquities with zeal and ingenuity, if not with much prospect of arriving at solutions commanding general acceptance. To the Christian public, in the meantime, one question alone will appear of supreme interest—viz., Have we any reason for considering those of the sayings contained in the Oxyrhynchus papyri to which no parallel exists in our Gospels, as genuine utterances of Jesus? Do they tell us anything more about the mind of the Master?

Alas, that is the very question to which it is least possible to give a decisive or authoritative reply, nor is it easy to see whence we are to derive any criterion enabling us to decide it. To one reader such a saying will appear couched in the very style characteristic of Christ's undoubted deliverances: another may fail to see the resemblance which to the first one was so obvious—and who will be the third to say whether of the two is in the right? All we can do in such a case is to use the language of probability, and to state as a cautious opinion that this or that among the new sayings may well be authentic.

In the series of short studies of some of these alleged utterances of Christ's which this article prefaces, even this question will scarcely occupy us. For our purpose, which is not that of critics, it will be enough to know that as far back as the second century—within perhaps little more than a hundred years of Christ's death—Christians reverently read these words, and reverently attributed them, believing a still older tradition, to their Lord; enough for that same immediate purpose that we too should read and meditate on them, not as scholars, with a hypothesis to establish or controvert, but as men and women in search of spiritual sustenance, in want of the bread and water of life. If any of these "logoi" or "logia" find us, help us, nourish us, let us gratefully say, "Evermore give us this bread," and again, "Give us this water, that we thirst not." All else is, after all, of minor importance.

J. WARSCHAUER.

THE WATERS OF LIFE.

WHILE reading the beautiful story of Christ and the Samaritan woman and of their talk by the well, I have often been reminded of another well. Not in the parched plains of Palestine, but among the green fields and under the cloudy skies of Ireland, lying in a little dell among the Tipperary hills, little known and seldom visited, but hallowed by age and by religion. I saw it last in the mellow sunshine of a perfect autumn day. The dell is enclosed by beechwoods, each tree, then, a burning bush of intense colour in the golden light; but there is an opening to the West, giving a view of distant mountains and of a quiet river. In the green hollow stands an ancient ash tree, so old that only one bough still bears a few fading leaves, to remind one that it is still a living tree. The gnarled and knotted roots almost surround the well, a basin of limpid water, fed by springs rising in its clear depth and bubbling up to the surface under your eyes as you bend over. This is Patrick's Well, and with its waters tradition says the saint baptised the chiefs of the district, converted to the Christian faith by his teaching. He built a chapel close by, of which now only the four walls stand, and planted on the little mound by the well the stone cross, which is now half sunk in the soft ground. The autumn woods, the dying tree, the ruined chapel, and the ancient cross—all breathed a spirit of beauty and of worship, but of a beauty that fades, and a worship that passes away. This spot was held sacred ages before Patrick came to the valley; the tree was worshipped in a religion which has vanished as utterly as have the green leaves which the ash bore in those far-away summers. And that later religion, which supplanted the old heathen worship, and whose disciples raised the cross and built the chapel, is it not fading too? Where are now the throngs of pilgrims who once every Mayday morning made the circuit of well and chapel on bended knee, in honour of the Virgin Mother and St. Patrick? Where are now the votive offerings once made in the sure and certain hope of a speedy recovery from illness or rescue from tribulation? The time cometh and even now is, when not in this valley only shall men worship the Father. "The old order changes,"—that is the lesson of Patrick's Well.

And is not this lesson writ large in the religious history of the world?

> Our little systems have their day,
> They have their day and cease to be.

This is true not only of such great religions as those of ancient Greece and Rome, which once embodied the genuine faith of countless worshippers, and which have now passed away utterly, leaving but a few splendid ruins behind to tell of their former greatness; it is no less true that beliefs once deemed essential to the Christian religion itself are either tacitly abandoned or openly rejected. Consider for a moment what beliefs were once represented by such phrases as "justification by faith," "total depravity," "eternal punishment," "election"; or, to take an even more striking instance, compare the views of the authority and inspiration of the Bible held by the Christian churches of to-day with those which prevailed even a generation ago. You can see this even in the great Catholic Church, though discipline and the habit of obedience to authority often silence individual opinion, and it is only when an open controversy breaks out, such as that recently raging in France, that we discover what immense changes are really taking place in spite of the infallible authority of the Church. Catholic teachers have often boasted of the unchangeableness and fixity of the doctrines of their church, and compared them proudly with the ever-fluctuating views of the Protestant sects; but they can hardly continue to do so when a Catholic priest openly rejects the authority, not only of the Fourth Gospel, but also of the first three. No; the law of change and decay, which rules everywhere in the world, rules also in the Christian Churches, and the greatest ecclesiastical system ever built up by man will pass away as surely as the great world empires have passed.

I remember reading a glowing account of the glories of a certain Irish cathedral, written centuries ago by a monkish chronicler. The old monk winds up his account with a comparison between his own splendid cathedral, and a group of ruins on a hill near by, which are all that is left of a great heathen temple. He compares these piles of crumbling stone, standing forgotten and desolate in a wilderness, with the lofty walls and crowded aisles of the Christian church, and proudly boasts that these walls will stand for ever, and their glory will last undimmed by time, while the very existence of the heathen religion will have been forgotten, and the ruined temple will be regarded as a meaningless heap of stone, piled there by some chance or freak of nature. So thought the old monk. Alas for him, if in spirit he should revisit the spot he loved so much. He would find that time and the rough hand of man have left but a ruin of the cathedral he deemed imperishable, and, sadder still, he would find the crowd of pilgrims and of students gathering to the famous shrine and monastery represented by a few aged peasants of the neighbourhood, come to pay their vows at this spot from half-mechanical habit, and some chance tourist, who has heard of the ancient glory of the place. So passes the glory of the church, no less than the glory of the world, and even the religions of the world have their day and cease to be.

And is this all the lesson of Patrick's Well?

I only quoted half that line from Tennyson just now. True it is that the old order changes, but it only changes to yield place to new, and

God fulfils Himself in many ways,
Lest one good custom should corrupt the world.

There is a message of hope, as well as of sadness, in this lovely little scene of autumn woods, ruined shrine, and dying tree. For though the chapel which Patrick built, and the cross he reared are sunk into ruin, the well is there as clear and pure as on that day ages ago when he baptised his converts with its waters. Still the springs rise from the rocky depth, and bubble to the surface, as they have been doing all through the centuries, and though the work of man's hand is passing away, and the spot in which he worshipped is left desolate, still the living water, given by the Father of all, rises and flows away to the quiet river and so to the distant sea. "The water that I shall give shall become in him a well of water, springing into eternal life." In every human soul there is such a fount of living water. It may be only the feeblest jet, almost choked by the accumulated refuse of a life ill-spent; it may be a deep silent pool, in which the man's whole nature has its root, and which feeds his whole being, though its existence is not suspected by the careless eye; or it may be a beautiful fountain, rising fair and bright in the sunlight, so that all can see its flow and marvel at the spiritual loveliness of that soul. But it is always there, this well of living water, like that Heavenly word of which the Hebrew writer spoke, it is not far from us, that we should have to seek for it; it is not in the heaven above us, that we should have to go thither to bring it down, but it is very nigh unto us, in our very heart. It is the one thing which does not change or pass away. Our little systems may; they may become like broken cisterns, that can hold no water, but there is ever an influx into our hearts from the source of all light and all life, the God who will be worshipped in spirit and in truth. This living water is alone eternal and unchangeable; all the religions of this world are but the vessel swhich man has fashioned, and into which he pours water which God has given him. The forms of these alter from age to age, even as the forms of the vessels from which we drink alter; but the water is always flowing from the source. There is no religion, be it ever so strange to our thought and remote from our own belief, which has not met the need of some human soul, and been the expression of that soul's aspiration after the highest of which it could conceive. And there is no religion, however grand or however ancient, which will not pass away if it cease to meet that human need, or to embody truly that quest of the human for the Divine. But the religious spirit in man will never pass away; it is the one enduring reality, the unchanging substance behind and under all the changing accidents of form. The vessel may be shattered, but the spring remains; the form may change from age to age, but the spirit abides. DORA MELLONE.

BRAHMO-BOYS' SCHOOL IN CALCUTTA.

AN APPEAL.

THE Brahmo Somaj represents the Theistic Church in India. The progress and work of this movement—making headway against gross idolatry and superstition—during the last seventy-four years have been very considerable. The beneficial influence of the Brahmo Somaj is manifest all over India, and in spheres social, intellectual and religious. All this may not be unknown to the readers of this paper.

At present, the proper education of Brahmo-boys has become a question of momentous importance with those interested in the welfare of the Brahmo Somaj. The future of the Brahmo Somaj—indeed of the cause of Theism in India—depends on the satisfactory solution of this grave problem that engages the serious attention of every thoughtful member of the Brahmo community.

In the absence of any institution maintained expressly for the education of the Brahmo-boys—they had, hitherto, to study in the same school with boys who professed idolatry or no religion at all—and were often of indifferent morals. Unfortunately, the undenominational character of the public schools debars all religious training, and the laxity in this direction has often been sore regretted by many a parent.

In order to meet this long-felt want, some members of the Brahmo Somaj have started an institution called the "Brahmo-boys' Boarding and Day School"—where, alongside thorough general education, religious training is imparted to the boys. It has been calculated that in order to conduct the School efficiently a yearly expense of at least £400 is necessary. An institution conducted on a theistic basis, and receiving as students only the sons of the members of the Brahmo Somaj and sympathisers, cannot be expected to be self-supporting at once. Provision will therefore have to be made to maintain it for a least three years before the School can meet its own expenses. The difficulty now lies in the raising of funds, specially as wealthy people are few and far between in the Brahmo Somaj.

In the interest of the cause of Theism in India this earnest appeal for aid is made to the generous public, and specially to all sympathetic Unitarians and liberal Christians in Great Britain. Any contribution, however small, will be gratefully accepted.

Contributions may be forwarded through Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, Secretary British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Hall, Essex street, Strand, London W.C., or direct to Dr. J. N. MITRA, M.B. REMINISCENCES

OF RICHARD ACLAND ARMSTRONG.

LOOKING back over the vanished years, I recall the time when Mr. Armstrong began his ministry in the old High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham. On the first Sunday morning after his settlement he entered the pulpit, then approached by a door opening from the vestry—a young man, pale and slim, wearing, besides his gown, the white bands of a Presbyterian minister.

It was by no means an easy task that he attempted; but of his experiences and difficulties I must not speak; I can simply tell of his ministry as it appeared to me, one of the youths of his congregation.

Shortly after he commenced work, he held a week evening class for the study of the New Testament. It was not very largely attended, but he requested all present, who cared to do so, to write their recollection of what he had taught. Three persons responded—Charles and Herbert Perry, and myself.

We remained after the other members of the class, and went through our papers with him. Before long a fourth joined us for a while—Christopher J. Street.

From that time we took great interest in all that he told us, and followed his preaching with increasing care. For several years our chief pleasure was connected with the chapel and its institutions. I ought to mention that among those who shared our congregational pursuits was Lawrence Scott, our friendship with whom was afterwards to ripen into closest intimacy at Manchester New College.

When I call to mind those distant days, it always seems amazing to me that so few of our young people to-day seek the advantage and enjoyment to be found in the associations and themes of our places of worship.

Mr. Armstrong gave us, in his class, some outline of New Testament criticism, reverently and carefully, boldly facing the various problems, and teaching us to look for the foundation of religion elsewhere than in Biblical texts.

Our New Testament reading did not continue, I believe, more than two winters, for it became necessary to institute some other form of week evening meeting, but I remember that before the class dispersed, about Easter, its members were invited to attend a special communion service. It had by that time been determined that Charles Perry (afterwards, until his untimely death, minister of Hope-street Church) and I should enter M.N.C., and so that purpose being in view, Mr. Armstrong read classics with us. His influence upon us was exerted not only from the pulpit, but in close personal intercourse.

What we had gained from him we both realised when we entered upon our College life. He had quietly led us to such thoughts of God, and Christ, and earthly duty, that the transition from the old reliance upon the Word of Scripture to rationalism brought us no shock. He saved us from the periods of doubt and insecurity that so many had to pass painfully through, and we were grateful to him.

His ministry commenced when the results of Biblical criticism had passed from being the concern of scholars only to the reading members of congregations, and were assumed in pulpit teaching. To some persons, especially to those who were advanced in years, his exposition and preaching probably proved inconclusive, if not painful; but I can testify from personal knowledge that it was surprising how many of his older hearers were led to share his views, and consequently to strengthen his ministry.

For us, who were young, his teaching was a revelation. But it was not in matters affecting Biblical criticism, or the basal notions of religious belief, that he exercised his only influence.

He was radical in thought, and prepared to follow truth, when it was adequately attested truth, but he did not rush into change for the sake of novelty. Above all, he never forgot that he was a minister of religion. Wherever they might find him—in his own home, by the fireside of a friend, in controversy, on a secularist platform, or at a political meeting—his people might be sure that no word or act would bring discredit upon the High Pavement Chapel.

As I think of the past, I may truly say that it was this sufficiency for every occasion that won our respect, and endeared him to us. And we were influenced also by his judicious restraint. In the seventies a materialistic wave affected the country and was not without effect upon our churches, and many men discarded first one thing and then another to show their independence of tradition. He had too firm a belief, and too sure a reverence for all that was venerable, to yield to the prevalent temptation.

Although those who knew Mr. Armstrong intimately learned to understand and value his high qualities, he had a constitutional reserve, which prevented him from being appreciated on slight acquaintance.

But if the surface cordiality, which carries so many men to popularity, did not greatly aid him, he had one attribute which stood him in good stead. He possessed absolute sincerity. His word was his bond. If he expressed pleasure, or appeared to take interest, you might be assured of the reality of his sentiments.

And now that the years, all too few, of his crowded life are ended, and we shall see his face no more, can we still affirm that what we held him to be, in our youthful enthusiasm, he was right to the close? Were we justified in the estimate we formed of him?

Thankfully can we answer Yes.

He grew with time and stern demand, filled many functions, and rose to the position of an acknowledged leader amongst us; but his loyalty to truth remained, his strict mode of life, his evident sincerity, his reforming zeal, and his love of God.

Too soon, alas! he has gone from us, and I must sorrowfully confess that for me a place is vacant, which can never be filled again on earth.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THERE is a beautiful story in a book called "Philochristus," which is supposed to be told by one of the disciples who was with Jesus. It tells how the disciples were going out fishing on the Lake of Galilee, and how Jesus came to the shore of the lake and got into one of the boats and went out with them. "And Jesus mused and ceased not, while we rowed out into the deep and busied ourselves with casting our nets. But so it was that, as we rowed and drifted hither and thither in our fishing, we were carried very close to the coast, where the rocks came straight down to the sea after the manner of a wall; and suddenly we heard a piteous sound as of bleating. When we looked up we saw a lamb, which had strayed from the flock, and had come to stand upon a ledge in the rock, exceeding narrow, so that it could not go forward, neither knew it how to turn back; but there it stood, and bleated often and piteously, so that our hearts were sorry for the creature, and we would fain have helped it, but knew not how; for there was not space to land. But while we hung upon our oars not knowing what to do, Peter cried out, 'The shepherd cometh,' and presently we all discerned him, very high up, and clambering from rock to rock for to reach the lamb. And when we all shouted and beckoned to him he straightway understood us, and coming down, though with much ado, took the lamb on his shoulders, and bore it safely away. Hereat we were all well content; but when I looked on Jesus his face shone with an exceeding joy, too great, methought, for so small a matter, so that I marvelled. For there was no more in his countenance the look of one questioning, but rather of one gazing upon the glory of God. Then when we had hauled in the net he gave command that we should row back to Capernaum."

The story tells that Jesus had been troubled by seeing a very passionate and bad sort of man, and by seeing him hated and ill-treated by everyone; only one man spoke civilly and kindly to him, and as soon as he did so, Barachiah's insolent and angry temper sank down, and he behaved better. When Jesus saw the lamb and the shepherd he saw a parable, which gave him joy and comfort, and made his face brighten, "as of one gazing upon the glory of God." Perhaps the words of the Psalm came to him, "I have gone astray like a lost sheep; seek thy servant; for I do not forget thy commandment"; or perhaps he thought of Isaiah's words, "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned everyone to his own way"; or of the words of Ezekiel, "As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered, so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day." He thought of the cross and angry man, of whom everyone despaired; and of how, after some kind and gentle words, he turned to the kind man, and became gentler. And he saw that when the poor little lamb had run away from the flock, and got into danger, it cried for the shepherd, and then the shepherd came seeking it, and found and saved it.

And he knew that it is the same with all of us who have done wrong and gone astray like the lamb—the Shepherd seeks us too, and when we turn and cry for help, God, our Shepherd, comes; comes and gives us just the help we want. But till we turn and call to him we do not know that he is seeking us; he lets us learn by what we have to suffer; and till we have learnt, and long to go back and wander no more, he waits. So it was with the poor lad in the story of the Prodigal Son: when his sufferings had brought him to himself again he said, "I will arise and go to my Father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants." And when his father saw him he ran and fell on his neck and kissed him, and welcomed him back with great joy. That is a parable of what God does with us all.

Perhaps it may have been some little scene like that on the lake which put into Jesus' mind the parable of the lost sheep. sheep: Here it is:—

"What man of you, having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it? And when he hath found it he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing, and when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours, saying unto them, Rejoice with me, for I have found my sheep which was lost. I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons which need no repentance."

And as the hymn says:—

There is joy in heaven
When the sheep that went astray
Turns again to virtue's way.

In the land where Jesus lived the sheep were not driven by the shepherd, but he went before, and they followed him; they knew and loved and trusted him, and had no fear. In our country they are usually driven, but gently and carefully. But last summer in Scotland I met an old shepherd coming down the road with his dog, and all his sheep following him, just as in Palestine. I stopped to look at them, and said, "Your sheep follow you, then?" He answered, "Oh, aye! they know the good shepherd." I watched them as they trotted fearlessly down the road after him, and thought, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside the still waters. . . . I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

FROM LIFE TO LIFE.

THE record, which we publish this week, of the life of RICHARD ACLAND ARMSTRONG leaves many things of necessity unsaid, and attempts no estimate of his character or his achievements. It has simply tried to tell some of the chief things he did, and to give some impression of the strength and earnestness of his nature. The memorial services on Saturday and Sunday bore witness to the depth of his influence and the honour and affection with which he was regarded.

We have felt that it was a happy ending to such a life, though he had only passed his three score years, and the other ten at least we surely thought were yet to be. But we know his mind, that he was fearless and well content. In the mystery of the Divine Love he was willing to be wherever he might be led, and was ready for any call of the Unseen, as he was on the field of earthly duty. Indeed it was with the keenest interest and reverent expectation that he looked forward to what might be hereafter, the more so because he had so keen a delight in the sublimity and beauty of this world. That is an aspect of his life on which the memoir does not touch. But whoever had been with him on holiday, or heard him speak of the voyages he had made and countries he had visited, of Norway or Iceland, of Newfoundland or the St. Lawrence, of Palestine, where he once was among the lovely flowers, or any beautiful place nearer home, would realise how full of intense enjoyment his life had been, in spite of all its pain, and how good he found it to be alive in this universe of GOD. There was a merriment, a pleasure in innocent games, a humour, and with it all a wonderful depth of tenderness and affection, which few suspected who saw only the face of the stern fighter, or heard the measured but always strenuous voice in the day of strife. And all this was natural in him, as the innocence of childhood, because he did verily believe in GOD, and the sustaining, ever-present Love was a great reality in his life. Thus he looked forward, as a child of the Spirit, to new visions of beauty and delight, of wonder and awe, to fresh experiences of glorious life, deeper insight, fresh strength and opportunity for service, the communion of more perfect love. And for him there could be no shadow of death, save only the sorrowful shadows of earthly separations. Yet these also were brought to rest, and touched with a secret tender light, within the enfolding care of the Father's perfect love.

He was not tired of life—but simply ready, if it was to be so. He was indeed looking forward with eager interest to more work here, and to ever-growing happiness and peace in the circle of his friends. To one he wrote, within the last few days of conscious life:—

I feel pretty confident of showing vigour and life again before long. And all the kindness that surrounds me is a mighty help. I believe in my heart that I have better and deeper preaching to do than I have hitherto managed. One's insight into and sense of the reality of life seems to deepen with the years. Ah, yes! Better and deeper preaching he will do. Of the new service to which he goes we cannot speak, but better and deeper preaching he now does and shall do in the hearts of many friends, sustaining them, making clearer things that were difficult, in the happiness of a constant affection, in the quiet watches of a hidden fellowship, and giving of his strength that many a one shall do better and braver work, because he has lived to encourage, to believe in, and to love his friends.

Many friends in distant lands are grieving with us now, and joining in our tribute of gratitude, honour, and affection. The last number of the Hervorming, the organ of our brethren in Holland in announcing Mr. ARMSTRONG's death, speaks with warm sympathy of our loss, which is theirs also, for they held him in high honour. His presence at the annual meeting of the Protestantenbond at Utrecht during the South African War, and his address on that occasion, drew them to him with a special sympathy. From the editor of the Hervorming, and from Professor OORT, of Leiden, and Mr. HUGENHOLTZ, of Amsterdam, we have also received personal messages of warm sympathy.

From Denmark also comes a voice, wishing to join in the tribute of sorrow and gratitude. Miss WESTENHOLZ writes on behalf of the Copenhagen congregation, to whom Mr. ARMSTRONG was from the first a faithful and helpful friend. And she adds:—

Everyone knows how strong, how fearless, how righteous, and truth-loving Mr. Armstrong was, but only to the stumbling, frail, and weak, was it given to realise how full of understanding, how tender and forbearing he was. Whenever his name is mentioned among them they will raise their voice "and call him blessed."

And in another letter to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie she writes:—

His wisdom, his goodness, his strength, his beautiful helpfulness have supported us in the most wonderful way. The mere knowledge that he was there within our reach has been a great comfort. No one can lose more in him than we do. I feel deeply grateful that I have known him, his influence will live with me, and make—please God—a stronger, better labourer of me than I should have been if he had not crossed my path.

And we, in our churches, who have lost so much in his departure, are we simply to mourn the leader who is gone, or shall we not rather gird up our strength, and determine that where we are now set to serve it shall be seen that he has not spoken and lived in vain?

These verses of a hymn, written by the Rev. W. Gaskell, on the death of a minister in the service of the Manchester Domestic Mission, were sung at the Memorial services on Saturday and Sunday, and surely never with more perfect fitness.

Calmly, calmly lay him down,
He hath fought a noble fight
He hath battled for the right,
He hath won the fadeless crown.

Memories, all too bright for tears,
Crowd around us from the past:
He was faithful to the last,
Faithful through the toilsome years.

All that makes for human good,
Freedom, righteousness, and truth,—
These, the objects of his youth,
Unto age he still pursued.

Strong and gentle was his soul,
And it had a glorious might:
Clouded minds it filled with light,
Wounded spirits it made whole.

Calmly, calmly lay him down:
He hath fought a noble fight,
He hath battled for the right,
He hath won the fadeless crown.

At a meeting of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association held at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the following resolution, moved from the Chair by Mr. David Martineau, in the absence of the President, and seconded by Mr. Stanton W. Preston, was unanimously passed:—

"That this Committee has heard with profound grief of the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, a Past-President of the Association, and for many years a wise and faithful ally in its work at home and abroad. To the invaluable services rendered by him as Minister, Counsellor, and Leader, he added specially those of a Writer and Lecturer unsurpassed among us for clear, scholarly, and convincing argument on behalf of the principles for which the Association stands. In the hour of our sorrow we are thankful that, though death has deprived us of the living voice that appealed so strongly to our minds and hearts, he has left an imperishable legacy not only in his writings, but also in the memory of his unselfish and untiring devotion to human needs, his unswerving fidelity to conscience, and his constant trust in the living God.

"Desiring thus to place on record our deep sense of the worth of our beloved Colleague, we would also respectfully tender to his widow and family our sincere sympathy in their bereavement."

In Memoriam

RICHARD ACLAND ARMSTRONG.

THE life of which some record is to be attempted here was from the days of early manhood strenuous in purpose and happy in manifold achievement. Nurtured in a home familiar with the high aims of a generous humanity, a lofty standard of duty and self-sacrifice, the calls to service of a new generation found a ready spirit, eager to be doing, and not afraid to suffer for the sake of truth and righteousness or in any helpful ministry of human needs. Looking back now on little more than sixty years, one sees the growth of a strong and noble nature, the unfolding of powers dedicated to the highest service, and, after many tasks fearlessly accomplished, the rich harvest of a soul happy in a great wealth of affection and a calmness of faith, for which that divine peace, which we call death, could be indeed nothing but a covered way,

Which opens into light.

Richard Acland Armstrong was born Feb. 5, 1843, at Clifton, Bristol, the son of a Unitarian minister, who was formerly a clergyman, but had left the Church for conscience' sake. The Rev. George Armstrong, his father, was of a Leinster family, and was born at Drogheda in 1792. After graduation at Trinity College, Dublin, he was ordained in 1815 a clergyman in the Church of Ireland, and resided for some years in Dublin. In 1824, although already troubled by doctrinal difficulties and scruples on the subject of subscription, he accepted the incumbency of Bangor, Co. Down. But he was not destined to remain long in that country parsonage. His doubts became more insistent, and finally, in 1826, after reading some essays and sermons of Channing's, he decided that he must leave the Church. He then lived for some years in retirement, entering into correspondence with Channing and with leading English Unitarians, and notably with Blanco White, whom his example and clear insight into the demands of consistency impelled to the momentous step of leaving the household of Archbishop Whately. In 1838, two years after his first wife's death, the Rev. George Armstrong became minister of Lewin's Mead, in Bristol, for the first two years as co-pastor with Dr. Lant Carpenter, and afterwards alone. In the year following his settlement he preached the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Little Portland-street Chapel, his subject being "The Simplicity of Godliness." Next year he married, as his second wife, Miss Frances Acland, of a well-known West of England family, and their home became a centre of beneficent influence and eager interest in the cause of freedom and enlightenment, especially devoted to the cause of anti-slavery in America.

Such was the atmosphere in which their son Richard and his three sisters grew up. The boy was sent first to Dr. Wreford's school in Bristol, and afterwards to Mr. Malleson's, at Hove. In 1857, when he was fourteen, his father died, but his home remained at Clifton until the end of his college course.

At College.

In 1860 Richard Armstrong went up to London and entered University Hall as a student of Manchester New College. Among his fellow-students who became life-long friends were Enfield Dowson, Edwin Odgers, Ambrose Blatchford, Estlin Carpenter, Philip Wicksteed, and David and John Stirling Ainsworth. In 1863 he took his B.A. degree with honours in Latin and Philosophy, and then followed the three years' theological course under the quickening influence of J. J. Tayler and James Martineau. For the last two years of his course he was a Hibbert Scholar, and then, in the autumn of 1866, he settled, as minister of the second Non-subscribing Church at Banbridge, co. Down, by a curious coincidence in the very county which had been the scene, forty years earlier, of his father's renunciation of his brilliant prospects in the Church.

Of the earnest purpose with which Richard Armstrong left college and entered upon the ministry, we may be well assured from the whole tenor of his after years of service; and there is one record of intimate experience, which we cannot be mistaken in connecting with himself and that period of his life. In his essay on "God and the Soul," published in 1896, he wrote in the chapter on "God Revealed as Love":—

> I knew a man some thirty years ago who was troubled in spirit through grievous things, and the world seemed dark to him and almost without God. And in his care and pain he went out at night on to a lonely common and stood beside a great stone quarry. And the stars were in the heavens, and in their eternal silence looked down upon him. And there and then he knew that God was with him, and felt that living touch of God upon his spirit. And rarely since then has he felt God quite so near. But the memory of that moment of vision has remained with him always, and it has made him more sure of God than any argument; nor when he has recalled that moment, has he been able to doubt that that was a true revelation of the Eternal to him in his weakness and his need.

So from the first, as he took up his life-work, he had that deep assurance of the Divine Love in his heart, and as the years advanced he grew in power to vindicate the truth of his great thoughts of God, and became the teacher and helper of many in their need.

In Ireland.

His first ministerial charge was only brief. He was at Banbridge hardly longer than his father was at Bangor, but he learnt much in those two years. He was twenty-three when he settled in Ireland, and in the following year he had the happiness of taking his wife, Clara, daughter of the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, to share his new home.

At Banbridge he had his first experience of a public debate under somewhat exciting circumstances, for he had ten Orthodox parsons arrayed against him in defence of the authority of the Bible, in a hall supposed to seat 400, into which over 700 were crowded. The debate began at 7.30 and lasted until 2.15 a.m., when, as has been told once before in these columns (September 28, 1889) the majority declared a glorious victory for "the ten," and carried off the chief of them in triumph on the shoulders of an Orangeman on the one side and a Catholic chimney-sweep on the other. On another occasion the young heretic, who believed in freedom and in neither Protestant nor Catholic ascendency, had his windows smashed by an Orange mob, and altogether he learnt lessons in toleration and equity which served him in good stead in after years. When, in 1868, Gladstone moved his resolution on Irish disestablishment in the House of Commons, it was supported by only one petition from an Irish Protestant ecclesiastical body, the Antrim Presbytery, to which Banbridge belonged, and it was Armstrong who moved its adoption at the meeting of the Presbytery.

At the beginning of 1869 Armstrong accepted a Hibbert Fellowship, and was contemplating a period of further study, when, in the August of that same year, another call came to him, to succeed the Rev. P. W. Clayden as minister of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, and this he was unable to refuse.

At Nottingham.

Mr. Armstrong's ministry at Nottingham lasted nearly fifteen years. There his four sons were born, and his only daughter died. His mother also came from Clifton with her daughters, to live there, and in her old age had the happiness of seeing her son in that position of great influence, and being near him until her death brought the second great sorrow of those years.

The High Pavement congregation was one of the most influential in our whole community, and held a very high place in the town. The connection of the Taylers, Enfields, Pagets, and others of kindred spirit with the congregation, gave it a character of its own, and most precious of all to the young minister was the presence and the constant friendship of Mrs. Turner, Dr. Martineau's cousin, widow of the Rev. Henry Turner, whose early death, as he related long afterwards, had been the turning-point in his religious life, calling the young engineer to devote himself to the ministry of religion.

Mr. Armstrong was twenty-six when he went to Nottingham. He quickly made his mark as a strong preacher, and in the social and public life of the town. Of what he was to some of the young men in the congregation the Rev. F. W. Stanley tells in another column. Another friend, who grew up under his influence in those days, speaks of the impression made by his deep moral earnestness. As a religious teacher of the young, his striking characteristics were the spirit of reverence, devotion, awe, and his "constructive method," an example of which may be seen in those "Lessons in Religion" published in the first two numbers of Teachers' Notes, October, 1877, and January, 1878, and afterwards issued as a little book by the Sunday School Association. The friend who refers to his experience in this matter says it was only incidentally that his teaching of the young proved destructive of "creeds outworn," simply by passing them by and setting thought upon a higher plane. Thus he found afterwards, having relatives both in the Church of England and the Church of Rome, and being brought into close contact with what was most winning in both, "music, colour, emotion, and artistic ceremony, and kindly talk from genial clerics of culture, sympathy and social position," yet, "when it came to the real pith of the matter, the deep grave sincere religious influence of Mr. Armstrong's words and manner, and the high aim of his teaching of the positive and constructive side easily outweighed them all."

He was not able to take regular part in Sunday-school work, though it was a constant and deep interest to him, and he was devoted in his week-night teaching, and in the earnestness with which he endeavoured to lead up the young people to special services of dedication and entrance upon full church membership. He was the mainstay of the Young Men's Debating Society, and impressed upon them his high ideals in political and social life and interest in noble literature.

As a preacher he was quickly recognised as a man of power, and his congregation determined that he should have a larger opportunity. So in October, 1874, the foundation-stone of the present noble church was laid, and the dear old chapel, which was hidden away from the street, was superseded by a Gothic building designed to seat 900 people, standing clear on the High Pavement, for every passer-by to see. The new building was dedicated in April, 1876, when the sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles Beard on "The House of God." Dr. Martineau was there, and spoke at the evening meeting, recalling the memories of his early association with Nottingham, above alluded to. On the following Sunday Mr. Armstrong preached his opening sermons, on "Man's Need," and "God's Love," the need being the increase in us of true religion, which "must not satisfy the suffering heart alone, or recommend itself only to the thinking head; it must nerve the hand for noble toil, it must make holy all our activities, it must fashion out a will at one with righteousness." And in "God's Love" he found the perfecting of such religion.

"God is Love." For me that is enough. It is all in all that I desire. When once I realise its force, it comprises all that in my most exacting moments I ask of destiny. It fills my heart with peace that rises often to rejoicing triumph. It explains to my head, so far as it can be explained, the riddle of the great and everlasting universe. It gives to my will, whenever in my soul I realise its meaning, the power to do the right, come what temptation may. It is to my whole manhood, and to every part thereof, joy, and confidence, and strength.

So he was testing the supreme truth on which his ministry rested to the end, and with growing insight and thankful trust. In the strength of it he engaged, in September, 1878, in a two nights' public debate with Charles Bradlaugh, who was ten years his senior, on "Is it Reasonable to Worship God?" in which at the outset he said that it was as though he were called upon to prove that his dearest friend was worthy to be loved. The debate was, of course, simply a demonstration of the two irreconcilable positions, but it was exceptional from the perfect temper maintained throughout, and Mr. Bradlaugh wrote of it to his daughter, after the first night, as the pleasantest in which he had ever been engaged. A verbatim report was afterwards published by the Freethought Publishing Company, with a preface by Mr. Armstrong, and it was translated into Dutch by a Liberal Protestant minister.

This was the most conspicuous of Mr. Armstrong's public vindications of his faith; but he was in constant touch with the secularists of the town, and his strong, fearless thought and perfect fairness, together with his devoted public work, gained for him their warm admiration and a ready hearing. At one time he would go down after his Sunday evening service into the Market-place and speak from their platform on the religious aspects of life.

The record of Mr. Armstrong's work as social reformer in Nottingham and afterwards in Liverpool, would be of the deepest interest, if it could be adequately written. At Nottingham, by his unobtrusive, but powerful, influence he raised the whole organisation of the Liberal party to a higher level. "He, more than anyone," so a friend with intimate knowledge testifies, "created a wide popular democratic organisation in place of the previous management by little cliques," and made it "clean, honest, high-minded, so that any self-respecting man or woman could enter and take part." (One instance of this influence was the breaking up of the system of ward committee meetings held in public-houses, with the accompaniment of drink, and transference of the meetings to school-rooms, &c.) "In a thousand ways he raised the tone and methods of the party and of public life and the administration of town council, guardians, school board, and parliamentary representation. Always taking a leading but unostentatious part in the work, deferring to others in business matters, but always quietly saying the word in committee or in public needed to keep down the base in man and teach high thought."

He was a leader in the cause of temperance and social purity, and fearless sermons of his against betting, bribery, drink and kindred evils stirred public opinion profoundly, and, in a printed form, had a very wide circulation. Such preaching doubtless drove some members from the chapel, who could not bear that a man should prophesy anything but smooth things; but, added to his platform and other work, it gained for him a high place of honour and influence in the life of the town. Education was always a great interest of his, and he took an active part in establishing and fostering the University extension movement, out of which grew the present fine University College.

While his influence grew in Nottingham it was also widely felt in our churches throughout the country, and he took his place in the front rank of our ministry. In 1873 he preached the annual sermon for the London Domestic Mission, and in 1880 for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. In the previous year he had been called to the Chair of the Sunday-School Association. In 1876 he stood by Harry Rawson and Lindsey Aspland, supporting their motion for the publication of Theodore Parker's works by our Association, and constantly at the Whitsuntide meetings and in the administration of his own District Association made his power felt as a clear-sighted and determined upholder of broad liberal principles, and a living religious faith. When, in 1887, the ten lectures on "Positive Aspects of Unitarian Christianity" were given in London, the first lecture, on "The Affirmation of God," was assigned to him, and in the following year, at the first meeting of the National Conference in Liverpool, he read a paper entitled, "By what practical means can our Churches best enlarge and extend their religious influence?" and answered that, in the first place, the great need was not for more machinery, but for deeper inward religious life.

To the Nottingham period belongs his translation from the Dutch of Knappert's manual of "The Religion of Israel," and the little volume on "Latter Day Teachers," published in 1881, being Sunday evening lectures on John Stuart Mill, Matthew Arnold, Theodore Parker, Tyndall, and on Farrar's "Life of Christ" and of "Paul." These are examples of one aspect of his preaching which attracted great numbers of hearers.

In 1880, after the cessation of the Theological Review, Mr. Armstrong established the Modern Review as a quarterly, in which, among other things, his article on "Overstrain in Education" appeared. This was reprinted by Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., for distribution among members of the House of Commons, and had a very wide influence. But Mr. Armstrong had undertaken too great a burden of work. After the first two years he passed on the editorship of the Modern to the late Robert Crompton Jones, and two years later, feeling that a change was necessary, if the efficiency of his work was to be maintained, he left Nottingham for Liverpool. There, as minister of Hope-street Church, he succeeded his old pupil, Charles Perry, whose untimely death had cut short a career of great promise. It was with great pain that Mr. Armstrong severed his connection with Nottingham, preaching his farewell sermons on March 30, 1884; but the ties of affection which bound him to the congregation remained unbroken to the end. Only last year he took part in the dedication of the memorial window to Mr. Clayden in the High Pavement Chapel, and in the autumn his friends were delighted once more to attend a course of lectures by him, those six week-night lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," which he gave at Northampton and Nottingham on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

At Liverpool.

On Sunday, April 20, 1884, Mr. Armstrong preached his first sermon as minister of Hope-street Church, being then forty-one years of age. On the following Thursday evening a welcome soiree was held, under the chairmanship of Mr. William Bowring, who now, in this year of bereavement, is again chairman of the congregation.

Of the twenty crowded years of Mr. Armstrong's Liverpool ministry, it is impossible to speak here with any completeness. His has been the longest ministry in Hope-street Church, which was first consecrated by the ministry for eight years of James Martineau. One of his first duties was to publish a volume of sermons by his predecessor, with a memoir, which he could write with intimate knowledge, and later in the year a smaller volume of Mr. Perry's practical sermons, under the title, "Spiritual Perspective."

The mere list of Mr. Armstrong's own books shows how rich was the harvest of those years. In 1886 his little book on "Man's Knowledge of God" was published, and a second revised edition two years later. This book worked out, for the instruction of young people, the main lines of his teaching on the fundamental truths of religion, first sketched in the "Lessons in Religion" of 1877; and again ten years later, in 1896, he completed his work by that essay on "God and the Soul," which will remain, we believe, his chief contribution to the religious thought of his day. Both works were very warmly received, and have been of inestimable service. They were reviewed in highly appreciative terms by the Spectator, and from Cardinal Newman, to whom he had sent a copy of "Man's Knowledge of God," Mr. Armstrong received a charming letter of thanks, recognising the service he had rendered to fundamental religious truth, in spite of what to the aged Cardinal, appeared painful error. "God and the Soul" has been very widely read in India as well as in this country, and only last year the popular sixpenny edition, with a new preface, was issued.

In 1888, on the appearance of Dr. Martineau's "Study of Religion," Mr. Armstrong wrote in THE INQUIRER a series of articles on that great work, which were afterwards republished in 1900 as one of Clarke's "Small Books on Great Subjects." In 1888 appeared also his "Pulpit Studies from Robert Elsmere."

In 1895 he wrote the Life of Dr. Crosskey, and after this books and booklets came in rapid succession:—

1896.—"God and the Soul" (second edition 1898).
1897.—Essex Hall Lecture on "The Significance of the Teaching of Jesus.
1898.—"Faith and Doubt in the Century's Poets," a volume of lectures, part of the fruit of his regular ministry.
1899.—"Back to Jesus," an Appeal to Evangelical Christians.
1901.—"Makers of the Nineteenth Century," a volume of lectures on leading men, and especially religious thinkers, ranging from Carlyle to Martineau.
1903.—"Come to me, O ye Children," a volume of Sunday addresses.
1904.—"The Trinity and the Incarnation," a study of doctrine both in its early formation and its modern developments.

In addition to these books should be mentioned the volumes of the "Liverpool Pulpit," begun in 1892, which he edited for three years in cordial co-operation with the present Dean of Ely and the Rev. C. F. Aked, and for a year, with the Rev. R. Veitch in Dr. Stubbs' place, when he had left Liverpool. Then followed for three years a monthly issue of Mr. Armstrong's own sermons, as "Sermons for the Day," a publication resumed in 1902, and continued to the present time, the January number for this year containing that address on "Christianity and the State" given in the Liverpool Institute, Nov. 20, which was his last and one of his finest utterances at a religious service.

In 1885 Mr. Armstrong was the preacher at the second meeting of the National Conference of our churches, held in Birmingham, as on another occasion, having been invited to visit the States, he preached the sermon at the National Conference of our American brethren at Saratoga. At both meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Religious Thinkers and Workers, in London, 1901, and at Amsterdam, 1903, he was one of the readers of papers, his subject being "Religious Thought in England at the Close of the Nineteenth Century," and "The Conception of God as the Soul of all Souls." And earlier in 1903, when the National Conference celebrated its majority by meeting again in Liverpool, he gave one of the devotional addresses. In his Conference sermon in 1885 he declared that our ideal of religious fellowship was of a church essentially free and catholic, and on this he dwelt again in a sermon to his own people on the Sunday after the 1903 Conference in the following passage:—

We are in spirit and in fact, if not in outward organisation, one Free Catholic Church—the name which best of any ever suggested describes the true ideal of our Churchmanship—Free, each preacher and each worshipper before God and man to think his thought and speak his word and do his stroke as the divinely given essence of his inmost personality shall constrain him; Catholic, all-embracing in sympathy, by a sentiment going down deeper than all creeds, opinions, and intellectual divergencies;—a Free Catholic Church with a great and divine mission in these times of compromise and paltering with truth, a great mission entrusted to us by God to strike for sincerity and truthfulness in religion above all else, sincerity and truth brought to bear on the world's sorrows and sins, weaknesses and blind perversities, that so we too may do our part towards bringing the blessed Kingdom of Heaven and God to earth and man.

At that time he was still President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, having been appointed in 1902. His presidential address, before laying down the office, concluded with these words:—

Whether it be or be not a convenient arrangement that this Association should listen to the appeal of churches that come to it soliciting financial aid is proper matter for unbiassed deliberation. But this at least is certain, that its response to such appeal can never endanger the freedom of any church, a freedom for which, by its tradition, its history, its fundamental and enduring principle, it is at least as jealous as any individual whatsoever in the Free Catholic Churches of Great Britain.

A signal mark of the confidence reposed in his leadership was the offer through him, by an anonymous friend, of an annual subscription of £1,000 to the funds of the Association, provided that other supporters would give an additional £2,000 for the extension of the work, and this was happily achieved.

In Liverpool, as in Nottingham, Mr. Armstrong was undaunted in his efforts for moral and social reform, and by his personal influence became one of the chief powers making for righteousness in the city. What he did for temperance, for education, for the missions to the poor, for the rights of women, and in many other efforts of progress and reform cannot be recorded here, but one signal instance must not be passed over. After years of patient "vigilance" work he startled the city in 1890 by his pamphlet on "The Deadly Shame of Liverpool," followed in 1892 by a second pamphlet, "Two Years Ago and Now: An Appeal to the Municipal Electors," in which he dared to force upon public attention the disgraceful facts as to profligacy, and its close connection with the abuses of the drink traffic, tolerated at that time by the Watch Committee and the magistrates. Thus he worked mightily for reforms and a nobler standard of purity, and as to the result we refer our readers to the quotation from a leading article in the Liverpool Daily Post in Mr. Hargrove's memorial sermon. What it must have cost Mr. Armstrong to write and publish these pamphlets, what it did cost him in the alienation of friends, those will best understand who know the silent martyrdom endured by workers in this cause.

With years so filled with strenuous and often painful work, with more than one congregational episode, it would be idle to deny, most trying to a man of his affectionate and sensitive nature, it was no wonder that his strength should be worn away. So it came that in 1903, after several warnings of failing health, he felt no longer equal to the duties of his post; but when he spoke of resignation his congregation gave him a colleague, the Rev. H. D. Roberts, whose friendship and support were a great gladness to the last months of his life.

The memorial sermon preached at Hope-street on Sunday evening by Mr. Roberts will, doubtless, be placed complete in the hands of his congregation. It is for them, rather than for a wider public; but one passage we are glad to be able to reproduce here. Mr. Roberts is speaking of the relation of co-pastor in which he stood to Mr. Armstrong—

His inner sweetness, his greatness of soul, showed always in his relation to me. With all his great powers and his wide experience, all his insight and accumulated knowledge, he never failed to place his junior on an absolute equality with himself; scrupulously consulting with him, asking his judgment, discussing and weighing his opinion, with a consideration and delicacy which was almost too fastidious.

One of the happiest pictures I have of him is of his sitting in my study—he came to me on Tuesdays—with a rather far-off gaze out of the window, and often a gently humorous, half-indulgent smile, as he listened to a junior whose suggestions may at times have savoured of a zeal not according to knowledge. And then would come the clear, lucid putting of the issues, and the summing up of the consequences. And always there were ripe words, and friendly talk, and encouragement, and a markedly growing sympathy with all life. A mellowing gentleness has increased in him of late. "Ever a fighter"—yes. And yet, it has seemed to me that there has sunk into his soul, more and more deeply, the conviction that love is the only thing that greatly matters. "I see things so differently from what I used to do," he said to me once, when we were talking of what had looked an unfriendly act. "No bitterness is worth while."

Beneath his quiet exterior was a great power to love; and a craving for love; a great capability of awaking love in those who were able to pierce through his natural reserve, and see him as he was. For "the fighter" was ever diffident. And, indeed, he had won much. He had outlived hostility. Almost in spite of themselves men had come to realise that here was a great and a good man, and, at last, had come to honour him greatly. And he knew their respect, and rejoiced in it. For me, I feel that to have joined in work with such a man is like a decoration; and I am thankful I did not wait till he was gone from our sight before knowing it and realising it to the full.

Though the end was so near, his last year was full of happy activities. He had been appointed one of the Visitors of Manchester College, Oxford, and rejoiced greatly in that honour. At the end of the session in June he gave the address to the students, and also the welcome into the ministry at the valedictory service, with special pleasure extending the welcome to a woman, Miss Gertrud von Petzold (for the first time in the history of the college and of our community of churches in this country) who had completed her course, and was about to enter upon a pastoral charge. Earlier in the year he had been with friends in Denmark, encouraging the little congregation at Copenhagen, and visiting on behalf of the Unitarian Association the new Liberal Church at Christiania. Then, in the autumn, came the course of lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism," to which reference has been already made, and the popular Sunday evening services in the Liverpool Institute, in which he took part with his colleague in the exposition of "Religion without Dogma." After that, and after a sharp attack of illness, he wrote that touching letter of exhortation to his fellow-trustees of Manchester College, gathered at the special meeting at Oxford in November, which it was a sore disappointment to him to be unable to attend; and from Llandudno, where he had gone to recuperate, he wrote his last public letter, which appeared in the Liverpool Daily Post of December 12, a vigorous letter on the subject of the unemployed, calling to mind what had been done in 1894 by the Commission formed with the sanction of the Council when his friend, Mr. William Bowring, was Lord Mayor, and pointing the moral of the neglect of its report, in face of the present need. It was happiest so, that he should be working to the end, and that days of unclouded happiness in the home gathering of Christmas should be followed swiftly by his most peaceful passing "into the world of light." From Sunday morning, New Year's Day, as we recorded last week, he lay in calm unconsciousness to the end, which came a little before seven o'clock on the morning of Wednesday, January 4. A month later he would have been sixty-two years of age.

"Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God."—What, then, is this purity of heart to which so supreme a blessing is here promised? Assuredly it is nothing feeble or effeminate. It does not imply any ignoring of the evil in the world, or any shrinking from that great battle with the evil to which we are all called. It means first and chiefly a state of heart from which all shadow of self-seeking is cast out; a heart free of all sensual clog and cloy; a heart free to reflect the absolute reality of things without disturbance or distortion.—R. A. Armstrong.

MEMORIAL SERVICES.

THE memorial service held in Hope-street Church on Saturday, prior to cremation, was very largely attended, the church being completely filled. Among those present, in addition to the members of the family and a large number of brother ministers and members of the Liverpool and neighbouring congregations, were representatives of many public bodies and philanthropic societies, including the Lord Mayor (Mr. John Lea) in his official capacity.

The service was conducted by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, who gave the address printed in full below. The hymns were "O God, our help in ages past," "With silence only as their benediction," and "Calmly, calmly lay him down," than which no hymn could have been more perfectly appropriate to the occasion. At the Anfield Crematorium, the Rev. H. D. Roberts concluded the committal service, which was quite private, only Mr. Armstrong's three sons, who are in the country, and another relative being present. At the close of the service in Hope-street Church, Chopin's Funeral March was played.

On Sunday morning the memorial service in Hope-street Church was conducted by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, the lessons being read by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers; and many members of the Ullet-road congregation were present, their church being closed for that purpose. The Rev. Charles Hargrove preached the memorial sermon, which will be found following Mr. Carpenter's address. In the evening the service was conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, and the Rev. H. D. Roberts was the preacher. One beautiful passage from his sermon will be found in the memoir.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS.

BY THE REV. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

WE meet this day under the shadow of a great grief, for the parting hour can never be other than full of pain; and the arrest of life, which carries the poignancy of bereavement into the home, and fills this church with a sense of inexpressible loss, touches a yet wider community with solemn thoughts of the unseen, and bids us all "watch," for we "know not the hour." If ever a teacher lived to whom life was so visibly a trust that no summons could take him by surprise, or find a duty neglected or a service postponed, it surely was the friend to whom we bid our farewells now. "No man liveth to himself," said the Apostle Paul, "and no man dieth to himself. Whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's." In that conviction the great champion of freedom by the Spirit knew how to rejoice and to suffer, to hunger and to abound, content if only he might do the Master's work, borne up by one impassioned faith in God above all, through all, and in all—God creating and sustaining, God quickening us and claiming us, God prompting and rebuking, God judging and redeeming, God cheering and comforting, encouraging and guiding, ever leading us onward with discipline and love in the great process of the training of His sons, "till we all come to the fulness of the stature of the perfect man." That was also the faith of Richard Acland Armstrong. This was the gospel he proclaimed; this was his message to his fellow-men; on this his life was reared; by this his whole being was penetrated; for this he has gone in and out among you for twenty years; to make this prevail as a constant moral power in the heart of this great city and the councils of this realm was his perpetual aspiration; and in this, as I believe, he begins to find new meanings of beauty, new joys of vision, new privileges of service, new rapture of insight, and fulness of love, in the land which to us indeed is silent, but to him becomes vocal with innumerable harmonies of prayer and praise.

He was pledged as it were by hereditary descent to that unswerving sincerity which was one of the chief notes of his whole character. His father had withdrawn from the ministry of the Church of England, because he could no longer conscientiously repeat its creeds. And the son held this freedom as a precious heritage which he would neither surrender himself nor curtail for others. Trained at Manchester New College, London, he gained from its Principal, the beloved John James Tayler, a true comprehension of liberty, a breadth of sympathy, a grace of trust. To Dr. Martineau he owed his scheme of thought, the intellectual fabric of his religion, something also, perhaps, of his ethical grasp and intensity. But his moral force, though it may have been partly evoked by his teacher, was in truth the rare endowment of his own spirit. At first, indeed, we hardly knew that it was there. There was a gaiety and blytheness about him which passed away as he grappled with the needs around, and only reappeared in after days at rare moments of release from care. But he belonged to the ranks of the "twice-born." He issued from the class-room a different being, with reserves of inward strength, whose very existence few suspected, for he made no display, assumed no superiority, and hardly disclosed the things that lay nearest to his heart. The years of his first pastorate at Banbridge, in North Ireland, were few; but they sufficed to test his mettle, and showed him a man of absolute moral fearlessness, who would yield to no clamour and cared only for the right. When he undertook the ministry of the High Pavement Chapel in Nottingham, the nobility of his manhood was at once revealed. Of the little group of his fellow-students, none (said the one who knew him best, a few months back) so fully realised the promise and the purpose of his early years; none so conspicuously sought to shape his life by the measure of the truth he strove to teach.

That truth was, indeed, all summed up for him in one word—God. That immense affirmation he made with every power of his being—mind, conscience, and affection. To uphold it against misunderstanding and attack, he gave years of laborious study. He knew its might to sustain the human spirit, and in an age when faith and unfaith met in deadly conflict, he sought to penetrate to the very roots of both. He studied the literature of belief on one side, and doubt on the other. He was at home with the poets and philosophers of the last century. He learned to grasp the arguments of the men of science or the men of reason, who denied what he held dear. He faced them fearlessly. As he had stood up alone against ten Irish clergymen and ministers to discuss the authority of the Bible, so did he meet the champion of Atheism, whose integrity and earnestness he respected; and if neither convinced the other, yet the minister of religion, at least, left with his antagonist the memory of a brave and resolute spirit, who would listen to all honest pleas, and refused to none the name of brother. On this deep faith he rested as on a rock. A generation ago we were not all used to a type of Theism in which the historic manifestations of our religion seemed to have but slight authority. To some his teachings appeared dangerous; others thought that he made light of Jesus. We understand one another better now; and no teacher of our little band has shown a tenderer reverence, a more winning discipleship, to the "Great Chief of faithful souls" than he. But he would impose his own convictions upon none. An ardent Unitarian, he served as President of its chief association, and only last autumn accepted an important lectureship in its service, which enabled him to address large audiences of thoughtful men and women, and brought him the joy of truthful speech on those bases of belief which none could expound so well as he. But while he was an uncompromising advocate of an interpretation of Christianity the reverse of orthodox, he was yet convinced that there might be aspects of truth which he could not adequately present; and he opened this pulpit to teachers who could enforce the claims of other churches, and deal with forms of experience the reality of which he did not deny because he did not happen to have shared them. Rare is that combination of tenacity and openness. But his respect for others was one of the elemental forces of his religion. Were not they, too, children of the great Father, like himself? And this faith was not the product of a careless or easy-going optimism. When he spoke words of cheer to others, they knew that he, too, was acquainted with grief. He had stood beside the grave of a child. Slow disease had laid its grip on the partner of his life and home. He was not daunted; he made no claim for personal happiness. The visions of beauty spread out before him among the mountains or by the ocean which he loved, brought him their messages, though he must listen to them often alone. It never occurred to him to question that God is good, because all things were not arranged for his convenience. So he preached, grave, earnest, resolute, with a deliberate clearness both of utterance and expression. It was not easy to converse with him upon these themes. But in the sanctuary there was no reserve. I know not whether he was what men call eloquent, but his words were real. Behind them lay a weight of character, a force of being, more potent even than the fairest speech. Few were my own opportunities to hear him, but I trust that I may never lose the memory—not of the argument, for I have long forgotten it—but of the spiritual impression, of a sermon preached many years ago at Oxford, on "the High and Lofty One, inhabiting eternity."

And that God is also holy. What did that mighty fact involve? Why, that man should be holy, too. Into this plea he threw all the intensity of his nature. It pervaded his whole idea of every form of common effort and of social life. It animated the administration of his home. It was the aim of the Church, the College, the Sunday-school, the Mission. But he claimed for it a wider field than the professed organisations of religion. He urged that the same standards should also rule the conduct of the citizen and the statesman. He has himself recorded in burning words the impression which the sights of Liverpool, as he saw them twenty years ago, produced upon him. Patiently he studied and observed; and he demanded that the magistrates upon the bench, the councillors charged with civic business, the politicians concerned with the affairs of the nation, and the simple voter who stood behind them all, should all aim at one end, to make the kingdom of heaven also a kingdom of earth. Not for him were prudent evasions or shifty compromises. No matter how unpopular it might be at the moment, he would tear away the flimsy veils of excuse or concealment. Partizans might deplore tactical errors. Even friends might be sceptical about his facts. He never faltered. The massive moral force of his appeal could not be broken or diverted; and the changed conditions of the streets of Liverpool this day bear witness, as to many other noble and devoted efforts, so also to his untiring love of temperance and purity.

And now his work upon this side the grave is closed. God called him, and he went with willing heart; he did not ask for life and uselessness. And beyond? Ah, that, he told us, lies beyond human power to prove. But there are things which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, which yet are not all mere dreams of love and trust, the visions of the spirit, where hope may be, as he said, a more divine training for character than sight. To the fulfilment of that hope we now commit him, within the care of the Father to whose service he had given all his powers. There, surely, are more truth for the mind, and higher righteousness for the conscience, and diviner beauty and love for the affections. There, as we climb npon the "upward way," the burden of error and weakness and sin falls behind; there, in the courses of redeeming Providence infirmities of temper and frailties of will are healed; and there in the fulness of God's purpose our manhood shall be at last complete. In the region of solved problems, and achieved endeavour, and satisfied aspiration, we shall know even as we are known, and, knowing, for ever give thanks and adore.

Great and marvellous are thy works, O Lord God Almighty:
Just and true are all thy ways, O thou King of saints.

MEMORIAL SERMON.

BY THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.

Fight the good fight of the faith, lay hold on the life eternal, whereunto thou wast called, and didst confess the good confession in the sight of many witnesses.

1 TIMOTHY vi. 12.

HAVING referred to the true nature of heroism and the part every man was called to play in the battle of life, Mr. Hargrove turned to the special subject of his sermon, and spoke as follows:—

We are gathered this day to do honour to a comrade fallen on the field; a hero, truly, if a right to the mighty title be won by strenuous effort, by undaunted courage, by life-long fidelity, by signal service. He was doubly pledged: as a man, for God claims all men for his servants, and would use them as his fellow workers, and none may lawfully excuse himself on the ground that he is only a layman; and as a minister, who had deliberately chosen to devote his life to the cause of religion. Among his Unitarian brethren of the same sacred calling, true men and good, there was none found more capable and more faithful, and it was therefore and for no other reason that he was chosen for the highest position it is in our power to offer. He was for a year the commander-in-chief among us, who, stern individualists that we are, from the highest to the lowest, recognising no authority over opinion or conscience, yet willingly follow the leader who approves himself by his gifts and conduct. In the long list of those who have held the office of President of our Association, men distinguished among us for wealth, or learning, or zeal, or ability, there is not one who better deserved the honour, or was more cordially welcomed to it than Richard Armstrong. He was not rich, a poor man, indeed, by comparison with perhaps any one of his predecessors, but his spiritual influence brought such increase of subscriptions to the Association as it had never had before—proof at least how deeply he was trusted.

He was a Unitarian—that was the regiment to which he belonged in the great army of God, the Church universal—a Unitarian by birth and by conviction. And he was never ashamed of his colours, was always as ready to avow the unpopular beliefs and disbeliefs peculiar to his own denomination as he was to maintain the principles common to all good men. Faithful servant of the body to which he belonged, he was as far as could be from the sectarianism with which we are too apt to reproach ourselves. Unitarians were not for him the Church of God, nor Unitarian doctrines The Truth. Proud of his own regiment, he did not slander the army, as if none were true but those who gathered to his flag. Yet his catholicity never degenerated to indifference. He was ever ready to give a reason for the faith that was in him, though, as in those youthful days of storm and stress in Ulster, he might be outnumbered by ten to one, and all the popular enthusiasm be on the other side.

He was allied with men of every church and of no church when the fight was against the world, "against the principalities, against the powers, against world-rulers of that darkness" which envelops so many of the dwellers on earth. I would not quote here the partial testimony of a denominational organ, but I cannot refrain from repeating what was written the day after his death in one of the principal journals of this great city.

"Stern he was indeed; clear and determined against moral wrong and intellectual fallacy. But his sense of humanity was fraught with appreciation of all that was good in his fellow men. It was a fine thing in him that he was the fiercest against those enemies of society who make it their meretricious business to encourage and live by vice, whether in intemperance or licentiousness. Without underrating the contribution of any ally of Mr. Armstrong to the public good, we are of opinion that he and Dr. Lundie rendered pre-eminent and unprecedented service first in arousing the members of his own sacred profession in all denominations, and afterwards the Borough Bench, to a sense of the necessity and the practicability of reforming licensing practice and of putting down flagrant resorts of immorality. In both these regions of social evil a sense of despair, assisted by flippant dislike of any crusade against free living, protected what the authorities of the city were bound to suppress. Liverpool has been greatly reformed, the Bench has risen in honour and utility, largely because Richard Acland Armstrong resolved with God's help to purge our worst offences against the Christian social code!"* These are not the words of a blind partisan, nor the praise which is so generously given to the dead to make up for opposition or neglect of him in life. I repeat them here because I believe them to be a truthful statement of facts to which all Liverpool can bear witness, and because I am proud to belong to a ministry which can produce such men as this. I feel small when I measure myself beside him and my work by his, yet I know that the principles which he held in common with his brethren of the Unitarian ministry inspired the motive and supplied strength to him in the fight. As the historic signal, "England expects that every man will do his duty," is more or less explicitly in the mind of every Englishman engaged in fighting his country's foes, and makes of one man a hero, of common men brave soldiers, and even of cowards men constant to their post—so does the conviction in which we are united that salvation is here and now to be won, and God's kingdom to be fought for as well as prayed for animate us all and prompt to such service as we are competent each of us to render.

And though he would ally himself with faithful men of all churches and of no church against the common foes, he was as ready to take up the word against a good bishop or a good secularist, wherever they challenged him by some expression of what he deemed bigotry or falsehood. No sympathy which he felt towards them in respect of political or social movements could silence him when he felt called upon to speak for truth or justice. He was never wanting in giving honour to whom honour was due, but respect for persons never restrained his public censure of the false or wrong.

And within the bounds of his own religious community, where all are free and as an inevitable consequence opinions are many and diverse, he had his say in every controversy which arose, and seldom did his word lack trenchant vigour. He did not ask on which side his own special friends took their stand, they might agree with him or disagree; his business to urge to the best of his ability what to him seemed to be right, regardless of human considerations,

He was not always in the right. He would himself have scorned the foolish flattery which could tell him that he was. He was a man, and therefore liable to err, and at times no doubt he was mistaken. But what is to be sought on every question of doctrine or politics or conduct is not uniformity of reply, still less submission to the authority of any great thinker or worker, but the fullest, clearest statemant of opinion on every side; and the men who states his own case without fear or favour does a service to the truth, even though it should happen that he is in the wrong, which himself will be the first when convinced to admit and to regret.

So was he ever fighting, never an enemy of any man. Always to the fore, but never pushing another back, never exalting himself at the expense of others or contending for pre-eminence; striving to do his own, but whether better than others could do, or not as good, a matter of indifference.

It was inevitable that he should sometimes give offence, alienate friends, expose himself to dislike and contradiction; and I know how much it pained him in more than one instance. But is not woe pronounced upon those of whom all men shall speak well? For the life of the true man is "warfare upon earth," and there can be no war without wounds given and received, often "in the house of friends."* True, our contention is for principles, but principles are in men, and you can't attack falsehood and error and wrong except as they exist in living men; so you must needs attack the man himself, though it be with the utmost goodwill towards him. It's good to have no enemies, no unkindly critics; but he must be a poor fighter who finds himself so situated.

To me oftentimes it has seemed as if the soul of some martyr of old had come again to earth and taken up its fleshly abode in our brother's body: as if still defiant of wrong, still full of faith, still ready for sacrifice as in the former life, but chastened and enlarged by the experience of intervening centuries, he had moulded the features in the course of years to express kindliness of heart and a lovable humour as readily as grim determination to do, and, if need be, to suffer. I have pictured him to myself walking with firm step to the place of execution, hands bound behind him, the mob jeering as he passed, never hesitating, though a word of dubious compromise might save his life. But we are not called to such trials of our constancy to-day, and he was the last man to indulge in dreams of what he would have done if he had lived in other times and been subjected to proofs of severer kind. He was a man of his own time, and if it was a time ill suited for the display of all the heroic quality in him, he was yet faithful to the duties it imposed upon him, and bravely faced difficulties and troubles which were not less real because they demanded no extraordinary effort of force or patience. And none prized more highly, none took fuller advantage of the freedom, and the light which this our time has brought to the world. His soul responsive to every whisper of inspiration, his mind receptive of every new suggestion of truth, he stood foot advanced, shoulders set back, head raised heavenward, a soldier pioneer, ready to advance, explore, conquer, and prepare the way of the Lord, make clearer the path for the onward march of humanity to the high calling of God in the perfect man, Christ Jesus.

He was an Englishman, and, as he himself said in the last sermon he preached and published—his apologia, as it may now be taken, against those who accused him of intruding upon them with politics they disliked—he had "a keener sensitiveness than most men, and what some will call exaggerated or distorted, that we are all bound up with the nation, that its virtues are our virtues, it sins our sins, its greatness and its littlenesses ours." So he concluded, "I have no claim to exemption because I am a minister; first of all, I am an English citizen, and I am bound to think out my political principles, and bound to stand to my principles, and do what in me lies by voice and vote that those principles, which to me are sacred, shall prevail in the counsels of the State." So his politics were a part of his nature, he felt himself to be one of "so many organic cells" which constitute "that great individuality the Nation." It was neither for play nor praise nor profit he was a politician, but out of a deep conviction. It was not for a party he strove, but for God. As one best competent to speak on this aspect of his work wrote in yesterday's paper:—"Though a strong Liberal in politics, his main idea was to do what was just and true, whether it affected the interests of his party or not."

He was a citizen of this noble city, and verily here, in the sight of many witnesses, did he make good confession of the faith in him that the city's shame was his, the city's vices his; his the responsibility, to be limited only by his capacity to bring about reform.

He was a minister of religion, minister to this congregation. How deep his sense of the sacredness of his calling, of the strictness of his obligation towards those who waited upon his word, he expressed more than once in the solemn and stirring addresses which he gave at Oxford to students preparing for the ministry. It is you only, my friends of Hope-street, you who of the public are the chief mourners to-day, who can tell how conscientiously he acted up to the high ideal which he set before him.

I have known him for more than thirty years, but for the most part as it were at a distance. Some of you who have known him more intimately, some few who have known him longer may complain—why has no mention been made of this talent which was conspicuous in him, of this great work he started or accomplished, of this quality which distinguished him? Partly, I answer because I don't know all, partly because time would not suffice to tell all I do know. I am not concerned here to recount his life or to make his panegyric. I am content if only I have succeeded in holding him up before you as one for whom to thank God and one whose memory you should cherish with love and pride.

Thank God! "Oh," it is tempting to murmur, "what a pity his frame was not stronger, his years prolonged to a venerable old age!" There is no gift we receive which might not by possibility be something yet more. Not to what might have been, but to what has been given should we look; and surely this gift to us, his brethren and his friends, is a right noble one. A long life, if it be measured, not by count of years, but by amount of energy, a life strenuous, intense, participating of all the fulness of human endowment and opportunity.

Had I the art to move you to tears, I would not make use of it to-day. Weep for the oppressed and the oppressor, for the wicked and the weak, for the broken-hearted and the hard-hearted, for "the dead in trespasses and sins," but for such an one as he let the voice of praise and thanksgiving accompany his departure. Hail to thee, hero brother, champion of God and right; out of sight, but in memory, in honour, in love, it may be in spirit-presence yet very near. Hail and fare thee well for ever. Amen.

Ullet-road, Liverpool.

At Ullet-road Church, which had been closed in the morning, a memorial service was held on Sunday evening, when the Rev. J. Collins Odgers preached a sermon on "The Reward of Faithfulness." Mr. Armstrong, the preacher said, was conspicuous for his faithfulness—faithfulness to what he felt to be the eternal right; faithfulness to what he regarded as the fundamental truths and principles of the religion he professed. He was never known to shirk a duty, or to seek a way out of a painful task, save by its proper and complete performance. If a certain course of action approved itself to his reason and his conscience, then nothing daunted him, neither weariness of body, nor personal discomfort, nor the alienation of friends, from taking that course, and following it to the very end. To that faithfulness to high ideals he added a rare generosity to opponents and warm attachment to his friends. Mr. Odgers spoke of his own friendship with Mr. Armstrong from their college days long ago, which, in spite of difference of age and standing in the college, had been a comradeship never since impaired. And it was Mr. Armstrong who had strongly urged him to come to Liverpool, on whom he had been counting as friend and helper in his work. Now he had the memory of his example, who had passed on to larger responsibilities, higher service, deeper joy, and more perfect peace. Surely his glad song of triumph should silence the accents of their grief.

Nottingham.

At Nottingham the memorial service in the High Pavement Chapel on Sunday morning was deeply affecting, especially to the many old friends who had grown up there under Mr. Armstrong's ministry. The same hymns were sung as at the funeral service in Hope-street Church; the anthem was "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace," and at the close Chopin's funeral march was played, while the congregation stood in reverent silence.

The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas preached from Hebrews vi. 12, 18, 19 pts., "That ye be not sluggish, but imitators of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises : : : entering into that which is within the veil," and the sermon was devoted entirely to Mr. Armstrong's memory. No congregation, the preacher said, save only that of Hope-street Church, was so closely bound to him in friendship and veneration as that congregation of the High Pavement Chapel, and no body of people ought to be more reverently thankful for the witness of his brave life or feel his death with greater grief. Many had personal and private reasons to cherish his memory dearly for acts of secret good, and as a congregation they had special cause to honour his life and to lament his death. On their behalf he had poured freely of the great freshness of his opening manhood, on them he had spread the glow of his earlier years and the radiance of his dawning hopes, and among them he had laboured with unsparing energy and with yearly increasing influence.

Perhaps the most conspicuous, but not the most deeply characteristic, note of his life was a certain sternness of sincerity. It would be hard to find, even among his enemies—and he had enemies—one who would hint that he swerved a hair's breadth from the absolute pitch of sincerity. In matters of conviction, in matters of conduct where great principles were at stake, he was as granite and iron. This also distinguished his thought. His scheme of philosophy seemed hewn of rock, fashioned into clean-cut massive blocks, that needed no mortar of the fluid and the vague to fit them firmly into a solid structure. Yet few men had so little dogmatism with so much conviction. It was not dogmatism, but a deep distrust of indefiniteness, a profound hatred of intellectual evasion that made him appear sometimes as if he had permitted his passion for lucidity to become a personal tyranny.

He was a man of extreme, one might almost say morbid, sensitiveness. We accustomed ourselves to look upon him as a fighter. He was, indeed, a glorious, a prophetic fighter; but he never fought for the romantic love of fighting, but always in obedience to some heroic call. He was built in the heroic, not romantic, mould. He did not fight from sheer gaiety of heart or look upon the world as a meadow made for tournaments. His were real battles, often against fatal odds, under a sense of tragedy, and on the losing side and always with good reasons for taking up arms. He wanted to have his friends with him, touching him at all points and supporting him: only the most intimate knew at what cost he braced himself to face their disapproval or blame. Some people found him reserved and unapproachable. He was dumb not from lack but from excess of feeling where a less sympathetic nature would flow into easy speech. Many a young minister would not venture that day to say how much encouragement and personal help he owed to him to whom we looked not as to a mere veteran in the same campaign, but as to a father—a right reverend father in God.

But the essential man was deeper than any of these characteristics. He was rooted and grounded in God, and the fibres of his soul groped about eternity. We remembered his grave, deliberate eloquence, his fire of holy passion, his white flame of moral indignation, his withering scorn of low aim and finesse. "But if," said the preacher, "I had to say one thing, and only one thing, of him, I should say not that he was a great preacher, a great reformer, a great thinker, still less a great Rationalist. This one thing I would say: he was a great mystic—a mystic of the Puritan type, of the type of Luther, Cromwell, George Fox."

His life was an encouragement to all, but especially to the young to trust in the kindlier, wiser heart of humanity, and to believe that the shallow judgment of the hour will always be erased like a blunder, and corrected by the deeper judgment of the years. Unto God, the High and lofty One, that inhabiteth Eternity, whose name is Holy, they would re-consecrate themselves that hour with deep thanksgiving for the strong and noble life of this great servant of God.

Leeds.

Preaching at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, on Sunday morning, on "The Essence of Nonconformity," the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield, said:—

The absence of your own minister to-day, and my presence in this pulpit, are due to the fact that we have lost by death this week one of the strong and stalwart leaders of our advance-guard in the person of Richard Acland Armstrong. Such straight and strenuous lives as his are seldom lived even among those who pride themselves on a religion which places character before creed and tests faith by its works. True Nonconformist was he, refusing to bow the knee to any fashionable Baal, loyal at all cost to the divinity enshrined within his own soul. Interpreting the ministry of religion as a call to prophesy, he fearlessly spoke the word of the Lord as it was delivered to him, and gladly suffered the consequences, often painful enough, of faithful speech. No one was ever left in doubt as to his attitude on any moral question, and those who knew his intense conscientiousness could readily anticipate the stand he would make at any particular crisis. A life so purposeful, so humanitarian, so manifold, can only be purchased at a great cost, but it is of the kind that loses its soul to save it, and save many others along with it, and is not such a sacrifice of self worth while? Doubtless, a few more years might have been added to his earthly term if he had thought less of the concerns of others, and more of his own health and welfare, as the world regards it. But humanity is richer because he gave himself for his brethren. He was one of those persistent reformers and indefatigable toilers who believed in the better days yet to be, and meant to hasten them as far as might be. He preferred to wear out rather than to rust out. May God grant us more like him! We can ill spare from our sparse ranks so vigorous a personality and so strong a leader. A call comes to the younger men to show a sincerity no less real, and a thoroughness no less complete. The world's life goes on, though one by one its individual lives pass on to the mystic realms of service of which we can only dream. The torch is handed on from one to another, and the call to service in the great Master's cause is passed down the ranks from the highest to the lowest, from the eldest even to the youngest. See we to it that, as the standard-bearers fall, there are ready volunteers to take the place of honour, which may also be the place of danger, and that the faith which we love shall suffer no slight through any lack of faithfulness on our part, however humble our place and our task may be.

You are not simply a reservoir into which so much truth, goodness, greatness is to be poured, there to remain for ever. You are a channel through which God is transmitting His life and love to other men. That you are, or you are nothing.—J. F. DUTTON.

Kilburn, Lewisham and Plumstead Church Building Funds.

AN APPEAL FOR £7,500.

THE Committee of the London District Unitarian Society urgently appeal to their fellow members of the Unitarian body on behalf of these three energetic and progressive congregations.

Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead have already amply vindicated their right to exist, and are deserving of our most generous support.

Church buildings have now become essential to secure their position, and ensure their continued progress. Excellent freehold sites have been secured, and in the case of Kilburn and Plumstead wholly paid for. A church building at Lewisham will save the congregation a yearly outlay of £70 for hire of a chapel.

Energetic ministers are in charge of the congregations.

This appeal is warmly commended by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on behalf of the Committee.

HOWARD CHATFEILD CLARKE, President.

Contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Hon. Treasurers of the Appeal Fund.

DAVID MARTINEAU, ESQ., J.P., 4, South Road, Clapham Park.
THOS. H. TERRY, 89, Tierney Road, Streatham.

CADBURY'S COCOA

THE ABSOLUTELY PURE COCOA

IS A FOOD-BEVERAGE THAT SUSTAINS THE SYSTEM IN STRENGTH AND HARDIHOOD, AND KEEPS THE BRAIN CLEAR AND ALERT FOR ALL EMERGENCIES.

"HEALTH" says:—"Cadbury's Cocoa has in a remarkable degree those natural elements of sustenance which give the system endurance and hardihood, building up muscle and bodily vigour."

N.B.—Cocoa is strongest when pure, but if treated with alkali a dark coloured article is produced, which appears stronger to the eye. Some doctors consider this addition of alkali to be injurious; it also destroys the delicate flavour. This can be detected by comparing the scent when a tin of Cadbury's Pure Cocoa and a tin of alkalied cocoa are freshly opened.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE concluding letter from the Rev. Charles Hargrove, telling of his return home by way of America, after the completion of his mission to Australasia, which we had hoped to publish last week, has been delayed by causes which our readers will understand. Its appearance next week will come aptly just before the welcome to be given to Mr. Hargrove at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, the 31st inst.

PROFESSOR JEAN RÉVILLE'S articles on the Religious Situation in France, of which the second appears in our present issue, were written, of course, before the crisis which has led to M. Combes' resignation; but the articles are none the less valuable, as showing how the Protestant Churches will be affected by the impending separation of Church and State.

ANOTHER utterance from the Archbishop of Canterbury on the Education Act! Speaking at Sevenoaks on Monday, he declared his belief that the Act would be worked henceforth with smoothness and success. At the same time he warned Churchmen that they must still put their hands into their pockets in order to maintain their school-building as required by the statute. The "intolerable burden" is not all lifted from their shoulders by any means. Had the Archbishop inquired at the offices of the Education Committee of the London County Council, he might have been supplied with some important materials for his speech; but probably the managers of the "non-provided" schools will learn the bad news soon enough.

DURING recent months a careful survey has been made of the buildings hitherto used as "Voluntary Schools." It was, indeed, notorious that, while some of them were well-built and equipped, a large proportion were not so. The full report of the Council's officers is not yet issued, but already it is known that something like half a million sterling will be required in order to bring these old and insanitary buildings up to the standard. Where the privately appointed managerial majorities will get this sum from is a problem. The bishops asked for £30,000 some time ago in order to secure their schools against the danger of being closed. The response was of the slightest, and it augurs ill for the success of an appeal for hundreds of thousands of pounds—especially now the education rate is going up beyond all records.

WHILE the optimist of Lambeth is pleasing his imagination with the prospect of a smooth and successful administration of the Act, Dr. Clifford is preparing to go to prison in protest against it. He has made over all his goods to his wife, and the next distraint for rates having failed he must, in the ordinary course, be committed to prison. The Archbishop will, no doubt, consider all this as at best very quixotic, and at worst but one dodge the more on the part of an astute political adversary. Whatever estimate he places upon it, he cannot ignore—we should think—the effect such a committal must have upon many minds, and the obstacles it will strengthen against the "smooth" working of the Act. Meanwhile it may be noticed that among Church managers themselves there is growing a sore feeling in consequence of the evident intention of the Education Department to limit their religious propaganda among the children within reasonable bounds. They want to be free, but still to be publicly supported. No; there is more trouble ahead.

AN important part in the religious and social life of St. Pancras is played by the reconstituted Whitefield's Tabernacle in Tottenham Court-road, under the direction of the Rev. Silvester Horne. The presence of Sir Oliver Lodge, Principal of Birmingham University, at the large Sunday afternoon gathering of men, is evidence of this, and it also serves to explain the fact that Sir Oliver was announced to speak on Social Reform. It is unnecessary to say that the address was marked by the breadth and charm we expect in his utterances. Particularly timely was the reminder that the "struggle for existence" formula is at best a one-sided one.

You sometimes hear it said that the whip of starvation is necessary for progress. I believe that to be profoundly untrue. It is sometimes preached that the struggle for existence ought to continue, or the human race will become decadent. I say no. The struggle for bare existence has done its work in the past. It is now our duty to supersede it.

Among various questions dealt with, in accordance with this leading principle of social progress, we find that of the unemployed, which is to be remedied by an enlarged and improved power of consumption. As to poor relief, Sir Oliver Lodge advocated relief to prevent destitution as superior to the present poor law system of relief of destitution.

THE Examiner contains an interesting account of country holiday work for the waifs and strays of Paris. This movement is more familiar in our own country than in France, though we must not forget the excellent work done by a combination of philanthropists and the municipal authorities in connection with the schools. In bulk it is less than our own, in quality it is superior, the children being accompanied by teachers, since a leading idea of the holiday is to serve as an education in gracious manners. But there is ample room for many efforts. The work of M. le Pasteur Migot and his wife is carried on in connection with their evangelical mission in the Quartier St. Antoine, a miserable district with conditions strikingly similar to those with which our own domestic missionaries are familiar. The same overcrowding and gloom and exorbitant tax of disease is everywhere the concomitant of the splendour of our own cities. The fresh air mission is an idea of Madame Migot's, one not carried out without difficulty, but which has succeeded through grim determination not to be stopped by the barrier of hardly begged francs. At Trilport, an hour's railway journey from the capital, they found "a delightful house in a nice garden standing high above the river Marne," and purchased it. Here the children lived out their short holidays, and hence returned with a new joy in their lives. One pleasant addition to the scheme is found in the allotment of six of the beds for the use of tired mothers, a convalescent home where they might recover from the insidious disease known as Paris, or known to ourselves as London, the Paris or the London of the poor.

The First Garden City, Limited, and the Country Gentleman, Limited, propose to hold an exhibition at the Garden City Estate, near Hitchin, next summer, to help to solve the rural housing problem. The scope of the exhibition will include improvement in the designs for cottages, the perfecting of internal conveniences and sanitary arrangements, and an effort to find a cheaper and more suitable style of cottage furniture. It is stated that the cottages exhibited are not to cost more than £150 each, and that substantial prizes will be offered for the best. The Garden City Company will provide the site for the erection and exhibition of these specimen cottages. Considering the ugly, inconvenient, and often unhealthy types of cottages that are built in town and country, the complaint that it does not pay to erect labourers' cottages in the country, and the overcrowding and insanitary home conditions which often counterbalance the advantages of country air for the peasants and their families, this exhibition should be of great value as a help to the improvement of the conditions of life in rural England, and not without significance for town building.

Another exhibition, having in view the improvement of towns and cities is being arranged by the Manchester University Settlement to be held at Ancoats Hall, the home of the Settlement, in the midst of one of the most crowded and ugly districts of the city. It is to show what might be made of our towns and cities, and will especially include those things which are desirable for the sake of health and beauty. While it may be an opportunity for those who are already intent on solving the housing problem and the problem of the laying out of a city to bring together many appliances and plans and of interesting other well-disposed persons in their efforts, it is designed also to give the people of the congested district of Ancoats an idea of what is possible in place of the sordid conditions in which they dwell, and to give them an idea what to ask for and work for.

What a capital illustration the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine affords of the doctrine which some Wesleyans used to take the trouble to deny—the doctrine of final perseverance. For 127 years it has held on its righteous way. And it is yet alive: looks sprightlier, friendlier, more social, less stodgy and starched and self-complacent than it did in our early days, when it was thick and stiff, and contained one steel-plate engraving of a Wesleyan minister, and such long biographical recitals of Wesleyan ministers' doings that a Methodist friend remarked that they gave the best suggestion of what a dull, hopeless existence must be endured by the unhappy souls in eternal torment. No such suggestion will arise from the present issue. It has five pages of Hugh Price Hughes; but so energetic and variable a man is well worth so much; and that story of how, after he had been failing, he seemed to gain once more his wonted vigour, and preached one evening with the old enthusiasm—and died next day—draws us towards him. It was the right kind of passing away for such a storm of a man. Surely Wesleyans may well be proud of the vital tenacity and the capacity for continuous development which are illustrated by the new series of this old magazine.

The January British Friend contains a report concerning the attendance at the Sunday morning meetings for worship of the Society of Friends in Great Britain, a census having been taken, by order of the yearly meeting, on four Sundays in October last. The evening attendance is to be dealt with in the next issue. The result (excluding a few mission meetings) shows a total average attendance as follows:—Men, 4,523; women, 4,522; children, 2,645; total, 11,690. The number of names on the books (of members and habitual attenders not in membership) being 24,764, the attendance works out as 47 per cent. It is noteworthy that the number of men and women in attendance is almost precisely equal. Only two meetings show an average attendance of over 200, and in these there are large boarding-schools. Twenty other separate congregations have an attendance of from 100 to 200; the rest of the 343 meetings sending returns are smaller. It is remarked that, with the Friends' method of worship, congregations of less than 100 often thrive better than larger ones, the sense of responsibility for the service of the meeting being more evenly distributed. The percentage of attendance is found to be as a rule higher in the country districts than in the great towns.

In 1901 a Bill was introduced into Parliament authorising the construction of a railway through the Pass of Aberglaslyn. To appease opposition the promoters undertook to carry the railway up the Pass in a tunnel. They now want to shorten the tunnel, and make a way through cuttings to be concealed by artificial "rustic walls" made "to resemble nature as much as possible." The undertaking by means of which they got their Bill passed, the company now seeks to evade by concessions from the Light Railway Commissioners. There are no towns to be served by this railway, and the most valuable commercial asset of the district, its beautiful scenery, will be damaged. The lover of scenery is opposed to it. It is not only the wealthy traveller, but the humble holiday-seeker, in whose interest it is sometimes affirmed that such schemes are carried out, who sees that the very thing he wants for rest and delight is being taken from him.

The series of Unitarian services at Cambridge is to be resumed for the present term. The services are to be held at 11.30 on Sunday mornings. A list of well-known special preachers is announced, beginning with Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas on Sunday, January 22.

Have faith in the child as capable of knowing and loving the good and the true, as having a conscience to take the side of duty, as open to ingenuous motives for well-doing, as created for knowledge, wisdom, piety, and disinterested love.—Channing.

THE LAST PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE REV. R. A. ARMSTRONG.

Many friends will be thankful to know of the beautiful photographs of Mr. Armstrong, taken some few years ago by Mr. Julius Kay, of Southport. They preserve for us vividly the familiar features and an admirable impression of the man as he was latterly in his full strength, before there was any sign of failing health.

The photographs, as will be seen from the advertisement in another column, are to be had in three sizes, and we have before us proofs of three different portraits. One is simply of the head and shoulders, almost full face, with a touch of light on the streak of silver in his hair. The other two show nearly the whole figure, sitting at ease in a study chair, the hands clasped over a book on his knee, and we have rarely, if ever, seen happier pictures of anyone secured in photographs. As one looks into the face, he seems to be sitting there in the most natural way, for a friendly talk. In one the expression is more serious, in the other (which has an aspidistra in the picture) there is the light of a dawning smile. In both, the eyes look straight into yours.

It is very difficult to decide which is absolutely the best, but for ourselves we should choose this last, which in the "panel" size makes a very beautiful portrait, and a picture which any friend would delight to have upon his study walls.

The great end in religious instruction, whether in the Sunday-school or family, is, not to stamp our minds irresistibly on the young, but to stir up their own; not to make them see with our eyes, but to look inquiringly and steadily with their own; not to give them a definite amount of knowledge, but to inspire a fervent love of truth; not to form an outward regularity, but to touch inward springs; not to burden the memory, but to quicken and strengthen the power of thought; not to bind them by ineradicable prejudices to our particular sect or peculiar notions, but to prepare them for impartial, conscientious judging of whatever subjects may, in the course of Providence, be offered to their decision; not to impose religion upon them in the form of arbitrary rules, which rest on no foundation but our own word and will, but to awaken the conscience, the moral discernment, so that they may discern and approve for themselves what is everlastingly right and good; not to tell them that God is good, but to help them to see and feel His love in all that He does within and around them; not to tell them of the dignity of Christ, but to open their inward eyes to the beauty and greatness of his character, and to enkindle aspirations after a kindred virtue. In a word, the great object of all schools is to awaken intellectual and moral life in the child. Life is the great thing to be sought in a human being. Hitherto, most religions and governments have been very much contrivances for extinguishing life in the human soul. Thanks to God, we live to see the dawning of a better day.—Channing.

THE RELIGIOUS SITUATION IN FRANCE.

II.

I TRIED last week to explain why the movement for the separation between the State and the official churches in France has grown so mighty in the last year. It is clear that the whole question was set up only by the conflicts between the Government of the French Republic and the Roman Court. So one may easily understand that the Bill for separation is exclusively inspired by considerations concerning the Roman Church. The legislator aims at crushing the power of that Church, and will prevent it from becoming mightier than it is under the régime of the bond with the State. The centralised Roman Catholic organisation, with its strong discipline and its spirit of passive obedience, is indeed a very powerful and dangerous one, when it has no counterpoise in other ecclesiastical organisations, as happens in other countries. The Protestants in France are no more than from six to seven hundred thousand in a population of thirty-eight millions. They cannot be a sufficient counterpoise. The best reason for maintaining the Concordat is just that it is not possible to escape the danger of the clercal power without keeping it in the bonds of a contract with the civil power. Otherwise, if you wish to apply the same regulations to such a unique clerical society as to all other associations, you are obliged to submit these others to restrictive rules, which are equal to the suppression of liberty.

And this is just the case with the Bill of the Government. It is not possible to have a different law for the Protestant Churches than for the Roman Catholic, and, as it is necessary to hold the latter in submission, the Protestant Churches must be treated in the same manner, although they are not dangerous at all to the State. A sketch of the Bill will show how hardly the churches are dealt with. All salaries of priests or ministers paid by the State or by the cities are naturally suppressed. Slight annuities are granted only to those who are more than forty years old, and who have been in active service for more than fifteen years (varying according to age and services from £36 to £15); the others will receive nothing. The buildings belonging to the nation, and cathedrals, churches, chapels, &c., are left only during two years free of cost to the religious associations, which will be formed in place of the actual parishes; afterwards they will be let out for religious services or for any other object. All personal or real estate of the different churches will be granted to the free religious associations for ten years without charge, but at the end of that time the grant will have to be renewed, the public authority judging if the renewal may be accorded or not. All properties which were given by the State will return to the State, and all goods and chattels which were given to the churches for charitable purposes will be placed in the hands of public charitable institutions of undenominational character. The State or the departments or the communes are authorised to let out the religious buildings which they possess to the free religious associations, but the heavy repairs will be at the charge of the tenants, and if they do not execute them the public authority will be allowed to deduct the costs from the reserves of the association.

No stranger will be admitted to the office of priest, or minister, or trustee. The associations may not collect money elsewhere than in the buildings, where they celebrate their cult, and they will not be authorised to raise their reserve funds to more than the third part of their annual revenue (!). The local associations may not unite themselves beyond the boundaries of a department. No religious ceremony, except for funerals, will be allowed out of the buildings of the associations. Every association must give notice of the premises and the hours of its meetings and services, and mention the name of the ministers who are in charge. As often as there is to be a service not foreseen in the notice, and whenever another minister preaches, a new notice will be necessary.

A long list of articles runs over all kind of penalties, which will affect all those who may violate any one of the aforesaid prescriptions.

We Protestants are generally not hostile to the principle of separation, although we know that it will be very difficult for us to preserve all our churches. But we cannot accept such terrible conditions, which are unrighteous and tyrannical. And whilst the Catholics remain quiet, preparing in secret the ways to outflank the future law, we are organising public and legal protests against most of the articles of the Bill. The Conseil central des Eglises Réformées (a body of notable Protestants with consultative power, the members of which are chosen by the Government), the Commission fratenelle, i.e., the reunion of the orthodox Commission Permanente and of the Délégation Libérale, the Committee of the Lutheran Church, have all demanded great changes in the Bill, on the ground that the existence of the Protestant Churches in France would be seriously threatened, if its provisions were maintained.

Their grievances are the same. They protest against the forfeit of the estate of the churches, which will be granted only for ten years, and becomes the property of the State, even when it has been constituted by gifts of the faithful alone. They ask better conditions for the ministers, who generally are married and have children; they have studied in universities relying on the engagements of the State, which required some degree before they could be appointed as ministers in the official church, and now they are bereft of the salary that was promised to them, and left with such small annuities that it will be impossible for them to feed their family; part of them even with nothing.

They protest also against the interdict as to gathering money for the churches only in the religious buildings, and against the limitation of the reserve funds to such a degree that it will be impossible to provide for any exceptional expenses. They claim the right of maintaining their Presbyterian organisation without being bound to the limits of a department, for such is since the sixteenth century their constitution, and now it will be more necessary than ever, for the little country churches will be unable to supply their own wants if they are not associated with the churches of the large cities, who may grant them subsidies.

We know that these requests have made some impression upon the members of the committee which has to report on the Bill. They are not ill affected to the Protestants. They have already admitted some amendments. The most important is that the free religious associations might be authorised to unite within the boundaries of the present ecclesiastical circumscription. But we think that these words are not clear enough, because it would be easy to infer that they do not authorise any union of churches beyond the limits of a consistoire. There has been no national general synod since 1872; a badly affected Government might perhaps maintain that the union of Protestant Churches over the whole country under the administration of a general synod does not agree with any present ecclesiastical circumscription.

This whole article is to be changed. It has been elaborated against the Catholic Church to prevent its mighty centralised organisation, and, in fact, it is grievous only for the Protestants. The Roman Court would easily get over it; in Rome they fear above all the constitution of a French national Catholic Church with an independent financial system. If the local Catholic associations, which will have to be formed after the separation, are not allowed to unite themselves in one general ecclesiastical body over the whole country, they will have their central office, and especially their central treasury, in Rome, and so the French priesthood will be more than ever before in absolute dependence on the Roman power. That is just what they want in Rome.

As long as the discussion of separation between State and Churches is only theoretical it is easy to agree. The trouble begins as soon as you try to determine the ways and means of applying the principle in a country where there are no precedents of free churches or organised dissenters, and where the religious mentality is made up of Catholic education without any sense or experience of spiritual liberty. The Radicals and the Socialists demand the separation, not really for the sake of freedom of conscience—this is as complete as possible since the establishment of the present Republic—but because they want to weaken the Roman Church. So they have no use for a separation that would not be aimed against the Church. And, on the other hand, a Republic, which boasts always of the principles of liberty, equality, and fraternity, is not suited for an intolerant policy as well as the absolute monarchy of Louis XIV.

So I should not be very much astonished if we still had some time to wait before the bond between the State and the churches is broken. If the Roman Court does not again provoke public opinion by some imprudent manifesto, which would let loose a general movement of opposition against the Church, it will perhaps be impossible to get a majority in Parliament, not for separation in itself, but for this particular mode of separation. A member of Parliament said some days ago, "The separation will be Liberal or will not be." I am afraid that in the presence of the mighty Roman Church it cannot be Liberal.

In our Protestant papers there have been for many months long articles about what will have to be done after the separation. The Moderates urge all the Protestants to remain together in one and the same organisation. They think the best would be to maintain, in the form of free associations, the same circumscriptions which now officially exist: the local congregation, a set of local congregations making up a "consistoire," and the consistoires uniting in a general synod. In a Roman Catholic country, where Protestants are but a small minority, it would indeed be much wiser to be united, instead of divided into rival churches. It seems to me, however, very likely that we shall not be able to realise such unity. It does not exist now; officially in relation to the State there is but one Reformed Church, and one Lutheran Church, but, in fact, as I have already told the readers of THE INQUIRER, there is at least in the Reformed Church one organisation for the orthodox and another for the Liberals. Most of the consistoires, indeed, would like this division to be done away with, but hitherto they could not accomplish it because an intolerant minority would leave the united church, and create a new division just at the moment when the others would fancy themselves to have established a united church.

Now if things are so under present conditions how much more will they be so when resources will have to be supplied by voluntary gifts? I cannot imagine the intolerant orthodox people subscribing for a united church, where Liberals would be admitted and partly provided by their money. We ought not to forget that the majority of the rich Protestant families belong to this intolerant minority. They will surely keep aloof. Will it be a great misfortune for us Liberals?

JEAN RÉVILLE.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON'S FAITHLESS FEAR.

ON Sunday evening the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, preaching at the Free Christian Church, Croydon, drew attention to a remarkable utterance of the Bishop of London's concerning the bodily resurrection of Christ. The Bishop, it appears, not long ago told a congregation in Westminster Abbey that he apprehended the worst evils to society if that event were to be generally disbelieved. His words (as quoted by the publishers of the book referred to by the Bishop) were as follows:—

> I wonder whether any of you have read that remarkable work of fiction entitled "When it was Dark"? It paints, in wonderful colours, what it seems to me the world would be if for six months, as in the story it is supposed to be the case, owing to a gigantic fraud, the Resurrection might be supposed never to have occurred, and as you feel the darkness creeping round the world and see how woman in a moment loses the best friend she ever had, and crime and violence increase in every part of the world—when you see how darkness settles down upon the human spirit, where it sat for six months, and regarded the Christian record as a fable, then you quit with something like adequate thanksgiving, and thank God it is light, because of the awful darkness when it was dark.

What sort of book is it that obtained this episcopal advertisement?

It is described by the publishers as "The most daring and sensational novel of the century," and it has been "praised and recommended" (though in what terms we are not told) by the Dean of Durham, the Bishop of Exeter, and the Rev. R. J. Campbell. But more illuminating is the quotation from Father Ignatius, who says:—

> I found it most interesting. . . . I think the story may do much good. It gives a true picture of the plots and objects of the "Higher Critics."

The book is, however, not commended by anyone as a model of grammatical accuracy, which it certainly is not—(vide "between you and I," "different to those," "it's her," &c.). Names are wrongly spelled (e.g., Humphrey Ward, Romane's), and among other indications of the author's erudition we find him speaking of an "auto de fe," of a journey of Jesus with his disciples from Jerusalem to Nazareth, and of a certain Biblical book called "Revelations." To do him justice, however, it ought to be said that the author has evidently done his best to get up his subject, and it is probably his misfortune rather than lack of diligence in unfamiliar fields which led him to devise the singular German name "Schmöulder."

But such literary defects are insignificant compared with his ignorance of "the Unitarians," who are made to furnish the villain of the piece. Apparently they are mostly rich Jews who have slightly 'verted. The arch-conspirator is a millionaire of this type. They hail with delight the opportunity to announce lectures on "The Downfall of Christianity." And, O sancta simplicitas! they are credited with having three great chapels, attended by sumptuous carriage-folk, all situated on the vicar's way home from his church to his vicarage, a distance of one mile. Whether Father Ignatius is right as to the "plots and objects" of the "Higher Critics" depends on the possibility of his knowing more about them than most people. The author of the book seems to know some who are not "plotters," but his main story concerns one who, while standing pre-eminent as a British Museum expert in archæology, and as a writer on Biblical subjects, is really steeped in the grossest sensuality. This man, born of the author's fertile imagination, sells himself to the millionaire Jew-Unitarian, and—so easy is it, in novels—himself cuts an inscription in Greek uncials on a slab which he gets buried among the tombs north of Jerusalem. This inscription it is that brings the "Darkness" over the world. It is to the effect that Joseph of Arimathea, by whom it purports to be, removed the body of Jesus from its first tomb, and laid it elsewhere. The consequences of the discovery of the inscription are dire. The funds fall. Trade decays. Wars break out. Women are brutally treated; reverence for their chastity disappears. Slavery is considered acceptable. Churches are emptied. Only those horrid "great Unitarian chapels" flourish—for a while. Of course the fraud is found out; villany is properly punished, and the world breathes again and goes on trying to be Christian as before.

Apparently, then, the good Bishop believes that if that one miracle be doubted there is no hope of men living decent lives, or of women being respected. He ignores the fact that a great many good people have existed before the days of Christ and since, who have found undoubted incentives to morality and piety, independently of this particular event. The book itself suggests that among the Methodists, even "when it was dark," there survived such a spiritual consciousness of "the living Christ" that the fate of the body buried by Joseph had no baneful effect on their religious life. But the High Anglicans, it is clear, are so bound up with this story, that if it fails them they cannot see any hope of morality in this world. Such a fear is its own condemnation. That a Bishop's conviction of the spiritual meaning and vitality of the world seems to hang upon so slender a materialist thread is surely most pitiful.

The incident shows clearly that there is a feverish anxiety about, and certain well-known extravagances are ready to show themselves as consequent upon it. Not only is there, apparently, a surprising willingness to swallow the egregiously coloured bait provided by this "thrilling" story-teller, and an alacrity in accepting as correct his preposterous picture of "the Unitarians" and "Higher Critics" generally; the book honestly, if "half in jest," accepts the propriety of "stern measures sometimes," though "not for all heretics, you know—only the dangerous ones," and it unreservedly commends the policy (adopted "when it was dark" by the Roman Catholic rulers) of forbidding members to read about the supposed discovery, or even to speak about it. This, according to the hero of the piece, is a "very fine spectacle." Thus, as in the old days of Smithfield fires, the offspring of these weak fears and wild imaginings is persecution for God's sake, and humanity kept stupidly ignorant so that it may not be damned.

The situation revealed is one that calls for renewed devotion on the part of all to whom the interests of a free spiritual religion are dear. The party that is represented by the Bishop is conspicuous not only for its attention to religious ceremony, but for its zeal in many good practical works. It would ill become us to deride their fears and fancies without emulating their diligence and self-dedication.

BETWEEN the two functions of a Christian Church—to testify to spiritual truth, and to lead the spiritual life—there is an organic connection which it is fatal to dissolve. Without the rich store of inward experiences which conscience gathers on the field of action and sympathy gleans from sorrowful realities, the conditions are not present for dealing with religious problems; and the keenest intellect will think about them more helplessly than a child. The very materials for their solution largely lie in a certain form of character and fulness of affection which are secured, not by power of thought, but by devotion of heart and sacrifice of will.—JAMES MARTINEAU.

LITERATURE.

A WOMAN'S VIEW.*

THE women who express themselves in literature have commonly been in revolt against society. So much is this the case that when we open a book with the name of an authoress on the title-page, we do so with at least a half-framed expectation of finding the dominant note of the writer one of protest. The expectation is, of course, not always fulfilled, and in the nature of things is perhaps unreasonable because the feminine influence is naturally conservative in its working rather than revolutionary. At the same time, and from historical circumstances, the women who write have more often concealed this native force under the forms at any rate of opposition. The explanation is very simple. Our social arrangements have been one sidedly masculine. The man's view of things has been, if not exclusively, yet unduly regarded. Women have had to fight for receognition of their due claims. They have been obliged to make good their position in the world of letters, or science, or industry. They still struggle for equal opportunities in politics and government. This attitude of opposition into which they have been forced has helped to render them keen and, it may be, exaggerated critics. This particular struggle for existence is gradually passing away; few intelligent persons would now be found outside the House of Commons to contest those rights. One fortunate result of this discovery that the intellectual world is not entirely masculine is discovered in such a book as this by Mrs. Gossman. It has become possible—nay, entirely natural and easy—for women to write or lecture without being first stung to revolt by the obscurantist unwillingness to consider their thought on its merits. Many pioneers have toiled and suffered to secure a freedom which it will soon be incredible was ever withheld. To these pioneers Mrs. Gossman pays the meed of gratitude. Her own aim is not protest, but a spiritual interpretation of the complex facts of human life. The result is a book full of wise suggestiveness for many classes of readers. Those the bent of whose nature is rebellion will be recalled to a reverence and admiration of all good order, which they sometimes over-hastily forget in the struggle against bad order. Those who are first facing life and its problems for themselves will find their loyalty refined by the insight afforded into life as it might be, into the beautiful possibilities of human society. Others who are already too prone to accept the world as it is might be confirmed in unstable optimism; but the fault would be more in themselves than in the book

Mrs. Gossman has indeed a strong bias towards accepting things as they are. She concedes, I think, in too unqualified a manner, the duty of keeping up an army; or the divine authority of a majority—a majority, be it said, of men to the exclusion of women, for she confines the function of this half of the race to the domestic sphere. But though particular judgments may seem to this or that reader unnecessarily or even perversely conservative, this does not seriously impair the value of the general thought. The other side has been considered. Take the second chapter—e.g., entitled, "In Conformity and Protest." Now, opinions differ, and will always vary widely, as to when and to what extent one or other attitude is called for; and the decision is forced upon the individual conscience, sternly and solemnly pressed home. There is a time for protest, we are told, and woe betide him or her who weakly conforms where the leading of the Inward Light is to non-conformity. Only the spirit of revolt must in no wise be marred by personal bitterness, but should proceed, unflinchingly, if generously, from vision of some fairer principle of cosmic righteousness.

This volume may be described as an attempt to enunciate the laws under which personal claims and social needs may be harmonised in such a way as will not ultimately curb the individual's right enjoyment of life, but, on the other hand, will enhance it. We are far here from the anarchic conception of life, the notion of a pristine liberty that had necessarily to be given up when men came to live in community. On the contrary, the regulations, the apparent restrictions of, let us say, the home, are here regarded as the vehicle of a larger as well as a more sacred freedom. What is the right function of the wife-art-mistress of the home, as she is nobly named? It seems overstrictly confined. Thus, when we read: "in marketing for her household a woman finds practical satisfaction of those sympathies which deal with communal life," we may doubt the sufficiency of the interest. To be first a helpmeet to a mother, then to a husband, is not, as seems here to be assumed, an adequate mould into which to pour powers of normal womanhood. Probably also the dominant relation of dependence on a "masculine authority" is not good either for man or wife; but it is only necessary to read the charming passage beginning on page 185 to discern the large sphere of spiritual life embraced in the conception of the home as there portrayed. The value of the general thought is in a large measure independent of particular agreement or disagreement.

A very high and a perfectly realisable idea of commercial life is unfolded. The man of commerce is an art-master; work is a sacrament; subordination to superiors is an enfranchisement for those who serve; to obey lawful authority is to co-operate in the world's upbuilding. "Good workmanship . . . presupposes or proves a certain amount of moral stability." The men of commerce and industry are spoken of generally as "our suppliers." Thus is every particular occupation, even such as entail hard or irksome toil, brought into relation with the inspiring whole of human life. The little things are "hitched on" to the stars. No subject, e.g., could well be more repulsive to simple human minds than the ordinary scholastic discussion of the laws of Demand and Supply. Ruskin has taught us a sufficient intolerance of the economists. But Mrs. Gossman's treatment of the subject is of another order—reminiscent a little, as is much of her book, of the great artist-economist of the nineteenth century. "The Christ-enthusiasm, or its equivalent, says 'Demand' for human order and welfare, for righteousness, not for self alone; 'Supply' for exactly the same end. 'This is the demand and supply to keep right the markets of the world.'"

How true and wise is this, and yet this is the place for a word of warning, the only "protest," to use a word running through the volume, which I feel impelled to make. There is an inclination, especially evident in this section on commerce, to overlook the distinction between the ideal and the actual. The tendency is, however, not confined to any one part, and it seems to weaken the force and even to obscure the clearness of the exposition. Industry should be executed and controlled by "helpful artists," but very often it is not. The commercial order is far too often dis-order. And surely in the actual world of to-day the quest for the highest does often lead to personal loss and suffering which might have been avoided by keeping to the lower aim. It is good and helpful to have the ideal of what the business world should be kept before us, but this helpful process is not assisted by slurring over the ugly qualities so widely prevalent in that world as it is. Here the last victory of the spirit will be won. From the days of the Niblungs the "hoard" has been a menace and a peril to peace and friendship and life: it is so still. In the interests of the ideal to which Mrs. Gossman looks, we should avoid the danger in reading this book of confounding the actual with the ideal. The danger exists, and it is accentuated by a too-frequent use of the present indicative for the prophetic future tense.

But if in this book we find the tendency to mistake sometimes what ought to be for what is, yet even this error is clearly less fatal than the far more prevalent tendency of idle minds to mistake what is for what ought to be. I think my criticism is valid, and, if so, it is serious; but I am again reminded that, though a mistake may obscure, it does not destroy the value of this book. The danger I detect is one to which idealists are always prone; yet it is idealists who create the world.

Love, loyalty, obedience—these be good words, yet out of these our author will build a world, a fairly ordered world which may be accepted with joyous enthusiasm. And surely these are the elements of spiritual cosmos. How Mrs. Gossman combines them, develops them, applies them to the familiar images of the things we handle day by day must be learnt from her own pages. Two or three out of many quotations may suggest the world instinct that reigns. Our world is "a majestic Order whose awful grandeur and delicate adjustment our highest faculties but dimly apprehend. . . . We therefore dare to embrace all the natural life of man, past and present, in the clasp of spiritual unity. . . . Through order and right life the fresh winds, the firm earth, the daily food, can become holy sacraments by which we perceive God. . . . The man who is doing his best to be good is beset on all sides by suggestions and inspirations towards right methods; is led into beautiful and health-giving ways of working." The world, in spite of all seeming, is cosmos, not chaos; men, in spite of all seeming, are good, not evil. The right, the reasonable life, is therefore the life of faith. But this great good is not a thing given without condition. On all sides it calls for the best from us, that best in turn goes to fashion a larger good. This is conduct: side by side with, rather interpenetrating, this world of the practical, is the other world of glowing vision in which we create the good simply by discerning it.

BOARDING-OUT OF CHILDREN.

SIR,—I regret that absence from home delayed my seeing THE INQUIRER for December 31, or I would sooner have asked your permission to state in reference to the "Note" on boarding-out that the report of its failure is happily erroneous.

There are two forms of boarding-out—one "within the union," which has existed intermittingly for centuries, and until recently was classified simply as out-relief; and the other "without the union" (enabling the children to be sent to any place in England), authorised by a Special Order containing rules for safeguarding the children, and utilising the proffered aid of voluntary certified committees in their general supervision. This was issued in November, 1870, when Mr. (now Viscount) Goschen was President of the then-called Poor Law Board, and signified his interest in the movement by drafting the Order himself. During 1871 thirty committees were formed. The Local Government Board for 1880-1 records 535 "undertakings" with foster-parents, implying in perhaps several cases a plurality of children placed under their care. A table of boarding-out published ten years later allots a column to each class of children:—those within the union, for whose management an Order had been issued in 1889 and who for some years past have been reported on apart from out-relief; and those under the Order of 1870. Guardians were becoming more alive to the advantages of the system then organised, but many Boards of late years have preferred to keep the children within the union, and though not required to invoke the aid of a committee, they now frequently invite voluntary help in this form, whereby their wards are freed to a great extent from contact with pauperism. The table gives the yearly number of each class. The "without the union," after considerable fluctuations during intervening years, were four less in 1904 than in 1894; but those "within" had nearly doubled. A combined return on both classes, occupying a third column, shows an uninterrupted increase throughout the decade, from 5,465 in 1894 to 8,372 in 1904.*

Although the children under the Order of 1870 have not continuously increased of late years, and some of the certified committees † prescribed by the regulations of the Local Government Board have recently broken up under circumstances that are transitory, there is no ground for attributing their dissolution to any lack of kind and competent men and women. The experience of various charitable associations which board-out largely, markedly the Waifs and Strays and Dr. Barnardo's, testifies that such is the fact, and proves equally that an abundance of excellent homes and foster-parents are to be had. Meanwhile the health, happiness, and conduct of the little boarders, whether placed out by Boards of Guardians or voluntary societies or private persons, reveal the excellence and success of the influences under which they grow up.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

WE must be content with the briefest notes on this month's reviews. The Independent Review, which completes this month its fourth volume of four monthly numbers, opens with "Notes on Current Events," and among a number of valuable articles we would call special attention to one by Mr. H. W. Massingham on "The Struggle in France," and another by Mr. C. F. G. Masterman on "The Problem of the Unemployed." Mr. C. R. Buxton writes on "One View of Christian Faith," declaring that the Christian has always been, whatever the doctrinal tests of his time, a man permeated with the spirit of Christ, and "Back to Christ," he says, must be the watchword of the Christianity of the future, for not in Church or Bible, but in him only is the Word of God to be found.

In the Contemporary Mr. Richard Heath writes on "France and Rome." France, he says, cannot yet come to the ideal of a Free Church in a Free State; but "welcome Herod and Pontius Pilate," he concludes, "if they will only break with the Scribes and Pharisees, and act simply and sincerely on the principles of this world's justice." Professor Vernon Bartlett writes on "The Oxyrhynchus 'sayings of Jesus,'" as Professor Kirsopp Lake, of Leiden, does in the new Hibbert, and there is an article by Mr. George Barlow on "The Dual Nature of Deity," who sees in the record that Jesus wept, a visible outcome of "the mystery of the Divine Feminine in God."

The Nineteenth Century and After has a notable article by Mr. Keir Hardie, M.P., on "Dealing with the Unemployed: A Hint from the Past," while Mr. Charles Macpherson writes on "The Church Crisis in Scotland." Mr. Joseph Kidd's brief article on "The Cause and Prevention of Appendicitis" should be noted.

The Monthly Review has a fully illustrated article by Mr. D. G. Hogarth on "Cyrenaica."

In the World's Work and Play Mr. Hall Caine writes on "Religion in Novels," and there are some very interesting illustrations of "London's New Electric Railways," and also of the Zambesi river, spanned by "The most Wonderful Bridge in the World."

"JESUS SAITH."

II.—THE REAL PRESENCE.

Jesus saith, Wherever there are two, they are not without God, and wherever there is one alone, I say, I am with him. Raise the stone, and there thou shalt find Me; cleave the wood, and there am I.

IN form, these words are doubtless intended to carry one step farther the speculative identification of Jesus with God begun in the Fourth Gospel; in essence, they are as certainly a declaration of the basal fact of all religion—the presence of God with man. It is this fact of which man needs most to be assured, this sense of communion with God which is the goal of all religious striving; it is because God meant us to have and enjoy this sense that we are not at one even with ourselves until at one with Him. Considered under its most important aspect, man's whole history resolves itself into a passionate pilgrimage after God—a quest often pathetically misdirected, but ever ennobled by its aim. Let the prophet pour tempestuous scorn upon the heathen worshipping dumb stone or hewn trunk of a tree: nevertheless, raise that stone, and there we shall find Him who made it to be; cleave the wood, and there is He who caused it to grow; behind the poorest symbol stands the august Truth which it symbolises.

And every shrine and temple raised of old was no less the outcome of man's unquenchable desire to find the deity. What determined the choice of plot where this or that sanctuary was situate? Perhaps the remembrance of some longing, passionate, God-intoxicated soul, who, on such a lonely hilltop, remote from the dusty plain, had with startling clearness grown conscious of the Divine presence, and thence concluded that there He was to be found—that His house, and those the gates of heaven; perhaps the pious awe of some wayfarers passing through a glade, where the very rustle of the wind amongst the branches seemed to whisper some word of mystery from worlds not realised; perhaps the very brooding silence of some wide expanse of illimitable earth and sky proclaiming the message, "God is here." And not all delusion, surely, any of it—nay, delusion only where and in so far as the assurance of God's presence here, in this one place, led men to infer and insist upon His absence from all others.

But from every such mistaken endeavour to make sure of God by limiting His presence, the soul of man makes from time to time a mighty rebound, takes a leap for life towards a larger and worthier faith. Has the hierarchy unyieldingly asserted that they who would meet their Maker face to face, must do so in the licensed premises of their particular tabernacle? The more surely will the soul cry out sooner or later, "Behold, heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain Thee; how much less this house!" Do contending religionists acridly dispute whether access to the Highest is to be had here or there, and over their bitter quarrel as to the means lose sight of the end? Presently the essential spiritual nature of man finds utterance in the momentous words, "The hour cometh when neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem shall ye worship the Father, but in spirit and in truth." Has public worship degenerated anywhere into a thing of lifeless routine and vain repetition, the ceremonious recital of creeds discredited? A still, small voice will make itself heard in the individual believer's soul, calling him away from where the multitude make hollow professions, and assuring him that "wherever there are but two, they are not without God; yea, wherever there is one alone, I say, I am with him."

Have we not to re-learn the lesson how to be alone with God, do we even sufficiently realise what it is to be alone? Solitude is not a physical circumstance or condition; we may have it—and shudder—in the midst of crowded thoroughfares, jostling against dense masses of unheeding humanity; and we may have it not, in the stillness of the night watches, our pillow dank, our temples fevered, our brain on fire with memories, temptings, regrets, till the very air is a-quiver with the ghosts we have called up but cannot lay. So, to be alone with God is not an end for whose achievement all there is needed is that there should be nobody by; but requires preparation, training, a developed faculty for putting away at will the thousand trivialities, perplexities, worries of the passing hour. It is only a discipline of mind and soul which will enable us to make a stillness within us and around, such as will help us to feel the encompassing presence of the Most High. In a frivolous, disorganised mind there never is any room for God; and the great desideratum of our religious life to-day, the secret we require to re-discover, is how to wait upon the Lord, to be alone in such manner as to have the Great Companion nigh.

Raise the stone, and there thou shalt find me; cleave the wood, and there am I. It sounds far-away and paradoxical and yet deals with—indeed, points to—the near-to-hand and commonplace. To find the Divine Presence, which perhaps eluded our eyes while we steadily looked into distant heavens, we must turn to the humble sanctities of "the common round, the daily task," in deeds of simple kindness such as he bade us do, and showed us the way to do, to whom God was the ever-near, the ever-comforting Father. Raising the stone, cleaving the wood, these are not cryptic symbols with esoteric meanings, but specimen illustrations of very ordinary toil, very unexciting duty, such as we are called upon, every one of us, to perform on the scene of our daily activities; and it is in these that God will let Himself be found, in these that He is verily present. He whose very being transcends our thought, has not given the revelation of Himself to be the portion of the wise and learned, but has graciously granted it to the humble and pure in heart.

"Child of the earth, wouldest thou see and know Me?" saith the Lord; "gaze not across the sundering wave, marvelling how thou canst reach, or up into the azure, wondering how thou mayest attain unto Me; but look close by thy side; render the toll of human duty, perform the sacrifices of human love, and know that there, in these, AM I."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"A BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE."

How the children love their picture-books! How they turn over, again and again, the pages that have been so often turned over before, and each time find new pleasure in the pictures, copies, very many of them, of what they see almost every day, at home, among their companions, or on their walks through the fields and lanes.

On some of the pages there may be pictures of far-off countries, of the hot African desert, and two or three great camels crossing the sandy plain, with their gay burden of men, in brightly coloured dress, and the goods they hope to sell at some place further on. Or, perhaps, of the far-away Northern lands, where few men have ever been, and where the white bear is roaming over the large tracts of snow, or the great seals are stretching themselves, half upon the frozen bank, and half in the icy water. But somehow, the children care most for the pictures in their books of what they know best. They like to have pictures of places they have seen, hanging upon the walls of their nursery or of their own little sleeping-rooms.

How pleasant to wake up and see the early morning sun streaming on to the little painting of the lane with its tall hedges and its broad grassy borders where you and your companions have spent many a happy time, gathering flowers or picking blackberries. Or, upon the photograph of the beautiful cathedral you were taken to see, and which seemed to you so wonderfully grand and beautiful that you like to have a remembrance of it close at hand. And men and women have always been like the children, in their love of pictures and picture-making. Even in very early times, some thousands of years ago, when the people who were then living upon the earth knew how to do very little, they used such power as they had of drawing in copying what they saw around them, and roughly drawn pictures of animals have been found upon the very simple tools of these early dwellers upon the earth.

Some of the oldest nations, in the East, used pictures instead of letters and words; instead of writing the word sun, or the word mountain, with letters, as we do, they drew a picture of the sun or of a mountain.

Before printing was discovered, and for some time afterwards, when books were very scarce, and there were very few Bibles—so few that the great Bible belonging to a church was often chained to the reading-desk, to keep it safe—great and famous painters made large pictures upon the walls of the churches, telling—

". . . . that sweet story of old,
When Jesus was here among men."

And from these great pictures the sacred Gospel narrative could be read, as in a book, by thousands.

I wonder if you have ever thought about a great picture-book that each one of us possesses—the children and the grown-up people too. I call it a picture-book, because in many ways it is so like one, but in other ways it is unlike; it has no binding, like the books upon your shelves, and you cannot turn over its pages with your hands, yet its pictures are as real to you and as brightly painted as any of those in your most treasured books.

A "Book of Remembrance" it is, and the pictures upon its large pages are your remembrances of all that you did, and all that you saw, each day of your lives; it is your power of remembering that makes you see them so clearly, a picture, perhaps, of what you were doing yesterday, the games you were playing, and the companions who were playing with you. Or another picture, in this "Book of Remembrance," of some day, longer ago, when you went to see the little girl who was ill, and feeling lonely in the hospital; you took out of your basket, and laid before her, upon the white cot-cover, the beautiful red roses you had brought, and the sad, pale little face looked brighter for a moment.

You see these pictures, do you not, just as clearly as those of any of your favourites in the "Blue Fairy Book" or that of Peter Rabbit starting off, in spite of his mother's warning, straight to Mr. McGregor's garden?

Now, as this great picture-book is full of your remembrances of each day, there will be much of God's painting in it, for He orders your lives, as He knows to be best; but He also gives to each one of you a power that is called will, and this will makes you able to choose for yourselves in many things what you will do, so you too put in many of the colours.

Many of the pictures will be wholly bright and sunny, remembrances of days, full to overflowing, of happiness, and on which you passed on, as it were, some of your own joy to those about you, making their remembrances bright also. There will be some dark pictures too, for with none of us can sunny days always stay; a picture perhaps of a day when you were asked to bear patiently something that you did not like, or to try to do bravely what seemed hard to you to do; but there might be some sunshine too, in that picture, if on that day you had fixed with yourself to bear as cheerfully as you could the thing you did not like, or had put your will into the doing of the difficult thing, so that before the sun went down you had conquered it.

Yet there may be wholly sorrowful pictures in the great book, of days when by some unkindness you had grieved those who love and care for you, whom you should have tried to make so happy. Sad pictures these, for your book! Sad remembrances for you! You would like to be able to take them out of your picture-book, out of your remembrance, but that cannot be.

Or of other days when your will was not strong enough to make you choose what was right, and you said or did the untrue thing. These pictures will always look sad and dark to you.

The pictures of your lives are all painted in this "Book of Remembrance"; you cannot help their being there, but you can try to paint bright and beautiful pictures in it, by doing your best to be good and kind, and true, in all the many small things that make up the life of each day, and by using your eyes to see and enjoy the beautiful things around you in the world; so making this great picture-book of life one of your most precious possessions, giving you "gladness in remembrance" while days shall last.

FOUNDATIONS OF OUR STRENGTH.

"WITH GOD" is the one sole foundation of our strength, but in the manifold relations of our life we are with Him, and He with us, so that there are different lines of security to be drawn, and wherever there is the stress of duty or trial there also we come to feel the solid ground on which we rest. We are strong when we are with Him, and know in whom we trust. From every side that one supreme and all-embracing truth is made clear to us, and so we can speak of the foundations of our strength, and see where in one place and another we must deepen the roots of our hold upon the Eternal.

A sure foundation we discover in utter loyalty to truth, another when we understand all that obligation means, and feel that in righteousness there is indeed the strength of the Eternal; yet another in that perfect trust that love is greatest of all, and that in very truth GOD is love.

The man who gives himself in utter self-forgetfulness to the service of truth has in that very act, in that quiet, reverent, steadfast disposition of his life, found at once a strength not his own. He may not at once realise its full significance, but he has in fact given himself to GOD. He is to see things as they are, and the whole order of the universe, which cannot be separated from the deep things of the spirit, becomes a growing testimony to the unity of all life in GOD. There opens to him that great argument, as it is in Dr. MARTINEAU'S "Study of Religion" of GOD as Cause, which Mr. ARMSTRONG also followed in his Essay towards fundamental religion, "GOD and the Soul," in the chapter on "GOD revealed as Power." The conviction that the whole order of the world is of GOD, and that even amid the darkest and most terrible things, the often heart-breaking mysteries of pain and evil, there is a Divine answer to every question of the human heart and conscience, gives a strength for faithfulness and endurance and the helpfulness of self-forgetting love, which, when it is found, a man knows to belong to the sure foundation of a true life.

And as with truth, so with righteousness, in the simplest things of daily duty, in the long endurance of a faithful witness, in the passionate surrender even unto death of the patriot and martyr, the man has hold upon the unseen things which are eternal, he is on the side of life, he is in GOD'S hand. Not the lurid flames nor the shadows gathering about a lonely or derided death can disturb his confidence. Even in despair at the failure of his present effort, he is victorious over the world, and rests in the Eternal Strength. So the prophet of righteousness speaks the word of the living GOD, and he who acknowledges the obligation of obedience is of the same true brotherhood and is nurtured in the same fearless strength.

But these great gifts of truth and righteousness, with the inspiration they furnish to mankind, are perfected in love. The beginning and the end of life is in its fellowship, in which we are permitted to be with one another and with the Supreme Giver of all good. As we reverence truth and righteousness we come also to love their Divine beauty, and in that communion into which they draw the faithful soul, we enter into the knowledge of the love of GOD. As a child with its father, our communion leads to perfect love, to strength and peace and joy unspeakable. All that is precious in human fellowship belongs to the love which makes us what we are, or points the way to what we ought to be; and the more we enter into the knowledge of the true life with GOD, the more clear does it become to us that His love is all in all. So we come to the quietness and strength and gladness of a true communion, and see what prayer ought to be, whether in secret or in the fellowship of common worship; and the whole meaning of our Christian discipleship becomes clear, as the learning with JESUS to trust in the FATHER'S perfect love, and to live as His children in the world.

In speaking last week of Mr. ARMSTRONG we showed how from the beginning of his ministry that deep conviction of the Divine Love was the constant source of his strength. There are many other passages, besides those which we quoted, which we should be glad at this time to recall. There is the sermon on "The Soul's Converse with GOD," preached before the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, and published years afterwards (in 1897) in the second volume of Sermons for the Day, and passages of the lectures in "Faith and Doubt in the Century's Poets," especially in those on TENNYSON and BROWNING, both men who lived in the Divine presence, with knowledge of the perfect Love, BROWNING particularly a man of triumphant faith. But we will quote here only two more passages from "GOD and the Soul." And first the concluding passage of the book, telling of what JESUS was to him, as Teacher and Helper in the true life of religion:—

> The religious life is the life in which a man knows GOD as the ever-present Father, hears and obeys his living voice in conscience, and holds intimate communion with him in prayer. But though that life be open to us all, yet our realisation of the GOD-presence is apt to faint and fail, and in the tumult of human affairs we are apt to lose living touch with the Heavenly Father. Then is it a help beyond expression to lift up our eyes and behold the face of him, the great Teacher, or to listen to the words that fall from his gentle lips. For then we see and know the life of the human child with GOD in its fullest realisation. It is not because Jesus has told me so that I believe that the Eternal GOD is my Heavenly Father, but because GOD himself has told me so in the hours of rapt communion. But when I lose my way in life, and through the dimness of my spiritual vision know not how it behoves a child of GOD to acquit himself in this turmoil of strife and struggle, then, if I look up into the face of JESUS, I see the answer to my bewilderments, and my heart goes out to the Brother who, of all whom I have ever known, helps me the most and leads me the truest way.

And in the chapter on "GOD revealed as Love," after speaking of the reality of the love in which we are permitted to rest as hildren of GOD, he shows in these concluding words what prayer must be to us:—

> The difference in our praying will not be that it will be less vital or less real for our modern knowledge, but that it will pass from petition into communion; that it will be a seeking not of gifts, but of consciousness of the GOD-presence. And as consciousness thereof is won, the intellectual life will be cleared, the moral life will receive the sap of a new vigour, the emotional life will pass out of anxiety and trouble into peace and a quiet, abiding joy, till all our worship merges in thanksgiving.

We are thankful now to be able to recall such teaching of one who for so many years was a leader and encourager of our best life. And as we remember what he said of the inward sources of our strength, it is well also to bear in mind what such living faith meant in practical service. If we share in that true spirit, it will be that we also may be loyal friends, patient workers for the common good, faithful citizens and patriots, in the service of all pure and honourable ends striving for the ideal of a true human brotherhood and the kingdom of GOD on earth. Then will the great communion of the seen and the unseen be rich for us in holy thought and a love not bounded by any mortal limitation. The life of active service and abiding love will be strong and calm, because it rests in the FATHER'S care and the strength of the Eternal.

YOU will never lose God so long as you are throwing your whole strength against the evil within you and toward the highest fidelity you know.—G. S. Merriam.

THREE STAGES OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN APOLOGETIC

IN THE LIGHT OF THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

BY PROFESSOR PAUL WERNLE, of Basel.*

IF we examine the primitive Christian writings in order to find a reply to the question, How is the truth of Christianity demonstrated in them? we meet with three essentially different answers. The first is: Jesus and the Apostles worked miracles and experienced miracles. The second: Every Christian is a miracle, emerging as something entirely new and supernatural out of a world that is corrupt and estranged from God. The third: The Founder of Christianity has summed up and completed all the elements of Divine truth that had been apprehended and were in existence in the world before his time.

The first of these modes of demonstration I call the popular apologetic. It is the oldest, the basis of all others, it may be traced in nearly all the Christian Scriptures, and it has remained popular down to the present time. It starts from the broad basis of that antique religious conception which sees the surest sign of the Divine in the miraculous, the extraordinary, the mysterious. According to the synoptic tradition, Jesus occasionally employed this method of proof, as when he sees in the casting out of the demons the dawn of the kingdom of God, points the doubting Baptist to his miracles, and justifies by miracle the power to forgive sins. But above all the earlier disciples and evangelists employed this proof from miracles to demonstrate the Messiahship of Jesus on the principle laid down in John vii. 31: "When the Messiah comes, will he do more signs than this man hath done?" The whole presentation of Jesus in the Gospels, from the oldest traceable down to John, is shaped by this argument from miracles. In John this is emphatically the case, even those who are unwilling must believe in Jesus for the sake of the ἔργα.

The proof from prophecy is merely a special kind of the proof by miracle. Only a God is able so to foretell the future, and, when foretold, to bring about such a fulfilment as took place in the life of Jesus down to the smallest details. The proof from miracle, however, was not limited to the life of Jesus. The Apostles perform and experience more miracles than Jesus himself; in their miracles they have the mark of their divine mission, as Paul himself admits in his dispute with his opponents. Not, indeed, as though Christianity would stand or fall with these miracles of the Apostles, but it is one of the badges of honour of its confessors that the miracles had not ceased with the death of the founder, but accompany the mission in all its paths. And the miracles of the Apostolic age are shaped into a direct proof of the truth of Christianity by the circumstance that they take place in the name of Jesus, and thus bear witness to the divine power of his person and of his cause.

The occurrence of large numbers of miracles in the primitive Christian literature shows us how attractive this kind of proof was considered by the writers of these works, and how great the receptivity of the people of that age was for miracles. Traces of any opposition to this method of proof are relatively rare, and when they are found, they have nothing to do with modern criticism of the miraculous. We know that the miracle of the resurrection of Jesus and that of his supernatural birth, early met with energetic opposition, which found expression in odious travesties of these reports. The apologetic, founded on miracles, of the synoptic tradition does not seem to have attained its object everywhere, otherwise one scarcely understands why it was supplemented by the gigantic miracles of the Fourth Gospel, nor, on the other hand, why Mark strives to present the miracles of Jesus as secret and not at all intended for publicity. These isolated exceptions do not diminish the general validity of the proof by miracle. This apologetic was endangered, however, by objections arising out of the very circle of ideas on which it was founded. The working of miracles was not after all a privilege of the Christians, for were there not, besides the Christian miracle-workers, Jewish, Samaritan, and heathen exorcists and thaumaturgists in abundance? And the miracles of the Christians were capable of different interpretations: they might be explained by opponents as due to the agency of demons, and this just on the supposition of their reality. Nor was it only the opponents who explained the miracles of Jesus and his disciples by an alliance with Beelzebub, but the Christians themselves were convinced that demoniacal miracles would be seen in the near future in the deeds of the Antichrist or of the false Messiahs, and hence their warnings against false miracles. Lastly there arose a peculiar difficulty for this apologetic, from the circumstance that the magical name of Jesus was early used by men who were not members of the Christian society, sometimes with a good, sometimes with a very bad result. For us to-day, these difficulties of the proof by miracle are at least as instructive as the efficacy which was nevertheless ascribed to it, and which it also possessed. For they show the extremely close connection that subsisted between Christianity and the religions of antiquity, which everywhere gave rise to the same conceptions and the same methods of apologetic. And it will be recognised at once that it would be a most risky undertaking to prove the superiority of Christianity over all other religions by means of elements which every living religion of antiquity boasted of possessing.

Now, it is remarkable how Paul's apologetic starts from this proof by miracle in order to transform it into an original apologetic system. In the domain of the marvellous he is as much at home as any Christian before him, but in everything, and so also in this, he employs his great talent in the cause of simplicity and inwardness. No doubt, when he speaks of the demonstration of spirit and of power, i.e., the proof by miracle, he has in mind those marvellous occurrences which took place at Corinth in consequence of his preaching: healings, miraculous powers, speaking with tongues, prophetic utterances. Yet these were not for him the principal thing, which was the complete miracle which the Christian experiences at his conversion in his whole being and permanently retains as the energy of a new life. His own experience enabled him, better than any other, to understand Christianity as something new, opposed to all that had gone before it, a new creation lifting Christianity entirely out of the history of religion, thus making it simply miraculous. This new apologetic is presented in three simple, weighty theses: (i) Pessimism: The word of the fall of all mankind into sin and death, of the complete moral and intellectual impotence of man, of the wrath of God, which drives mankind into ever greater ruin and despair. (ii) The one great redemptive miracle of the Son of God: how into this lost and fallen world the Son of God descends from heaven in order to take upon himself, in expiation, our bodily existence and our death, but then immediately by his resurrection to open the world of the redeemed. Thus, instead of all the various miracle-stories we have the one comprehensive miracle of a celestial person and his work. (iii) The ever-new miracle of the conversion of believers, in whose hearts faith is miraculously engendered, and at once unfolds a new life, the fruit of the Spirit, a life which, in physical and moral, intellectual and religious aspects, bears the seal of its Divine origin—the miraculous—in its newness and its unexampled vigour. "If any man is in Christ, he is a new creature," that is to say, a miracle, and a miracle in the substance as well as in the form of his life. Here it becomes clear how the proof by miracle of the primitive Christian society was adopted by Paul, and yet applied in a surprisingly new and original way. In the enthusiastic vigour of his love, his joy, purity, patience, and his happiness in God, every Christian has in himself the proof that God has taken him out of the kingdom of Satan into the kingdom of God—a method of proof that is able to give confidence and comfort after any physical signs have gradually vanished.

Being the offspring of the antique, and particularly of the popular, though purified and systematised, order of ideas, this Pauline apologetic had little or nothing to do with the modern misgiving, whether all these moods and experiences really defy all attempts to understand them as due to natural causes to such degree that they can only be regarded as miracles. On the other hand, the force of contradictory facts gave rise to considerable difficulties. The magnificent thesis: "Every Christian a miracle, and therefore a proof in himself," is a creed which was itself supported by enthusiasm, and already in Paul's time soared far beyond reality. Or were really all the believers in Christ at Corinth such men of the spirit, as Paul understood the words to imply? It is a characteristic both of the sober veracity of the Apostle and of the firmness of his faith that on one occasion he denies the attribute of spiritual to the same Corinthians whom at another time he exhorts to prove in themselves that Christ Jesus lives in them. That he himself earnestly laboured with this problem is as evident as that he did not always give one and the same answer to the question. On the one hand, he sees in the shadows and imperfections of the Christians the after-effects of the old man and of the innate carnal nature, which are for the Christian the strongest incitement by severe self-discipline and moral endeavour to pursue the ideal, and ardently to long for the hour of release, for then only that which is perfect, the complete miracle, will come, though already now at times the spirit assures us that we are children of God. On the other hand, amid all the waverings and depressions of his subjective consciousness, he clings all the more firmly to the objective comfort contained once for all in the expiatory death and the miraculous resurrection of the Son of God. In these two branches the Pauline theology unites the Augustinian and the Lutheran tendencies in itself. In any case, it is an apologetic full of the mightiest problems, the importance of which must be the more acutely felt the more the enthusiasm and the great experience recede into the background, and in consequence Christians and non-Christians, the kingdom of grace and the kingdom of sin, draw nearer together, till at last none can draw the boundary line between them.

The great historic significance of the Pauline apology lies in the fact that by it Christianity was moved far away from all other religions, that it presented itself simply as the true religion, thrusting all other forms of religion from it as mere attempts and errors, that have scarcely a right to the name of religion, even though the idea of a divine education of mankind recognises in them a certain quite subordinate value. It is throughout a polemical apologetic, seeking everywhere not affinities but contrasts, in order to bring about the victory of its own characteristics. The continuation of this very conflict, however, inevitably suggested to the Christian missionaries and apologists that on the opposite side a valuable ally was to be found in the truths that were present there. Supported by these, they might the more vigorously attack what was false in the hostile position. The third and last form of primitive Christian apologetic thus starts from the conceptions of the Logos and of the Natural Law, borrowed from popular Greek philosophy. Now not merely the perverse and sinful side of human nature, but by preference that which, in spite of all corruption, has remained normal and sound is joyfully taken up as finding its synthesis and completion in Christianity. The Logos in every human being and in the great world is the same Logos in which Christians believe. At the same time the superiority of Christianity is maintained by the idea of the incarnation of the Logos in Jesus, which is the expression not only of totality as opposed to imperfection, but especially of fully revealed certainty as opposed to all groping and seeking.

With the Gospel of John this apologetic clearly and consciously makes its entrance into Christian literature, and this Gospel shows that the three kinds of apologetic which have been pointed out at first only lie one over the other like steps, and the last form by no means supplants the earlier ones. The lowest step is the proof by miracle and prophecy, in which this book surpasses all its predecessors. Then—and this is the chief part—the apologetic of contrast in the Pauline sense, the doctrine of the lost, sinful world, into which at a certain point in history the Son of God, as Redeemer and Reconciler, descends, in order that by faith in him the elect may attain to the new, wonderful life of the Spirit. Everywhere flesh and spirit, world and kingdom of Christ, are presented as sharply defined and hostile kingdoms. Lastly, though as a matter of form first, as preface for the educated, the Logos apologetic, which draws a line of communication with the earlier truths and extols Christianity as embodiment of the religion of reason. We are indeed compelled to speak of an apologetic preface by the consideration that the motive here hinted at, to present Christianity as the religion of reason, is in the sequel nowhere followed up; but, instead of this, following the Pauline tradition, the sharply contrasted supernatural, mysterious character of Christianity as shown in the personality of Jesus, is exposed. While the later Logos theology prefers to follow the ascent of the incarnate Logos to the Logos with God, the Fourth Gospel only starts from the Logos at all in order thus to find the way to Jesus, whose purpose is not to bring to light the truth that is immanent in men, but, on the contrary, to bring deliverance, spirit, eternal life.

It is scarcely necessary to point out that this apologetic, which makes its first appearance in the prologue to the Gospel of John, is the one which stands nearest to our modern, historical point of view; for it impels us to seek out and to appreciate the elements that are divine and akin to Christianity even in the non-Christian religions, it places Christianity and the other religions in the same category, and it works out the thought of a divine education of mankind in a more comprehensive and sympathetic way than was possible to the Pauline apologetic, which saw and emphasised above all the contrasts. But it is, after all, significant that in the course of history the Pauline thoughts in the Gospel of John have had at least as great an influence as the Logos idea, if not an even greater one. They give an expression—though perhaps in a temporary form—to a conviction to which one can never refuse an apologetic right, to the conviction, namely, that the chief strength of Christianity lies in the consciousness of its individuality and peculiarity, and that its efforts to understand and appreciate other religions can only then be successful when it has attained a clear conception of its own special calling and its peculiar gift.

I DO not think that so much harm is done by giving error to a child, as by giving truth in a lifeless form. What is the misery of the multitudes in Christian countries? Not that they disbelieve Christianity; not that they hold great errors; but that truth lies dead within them. They use the most sacred words without meaning. They hear of spiritual realities, awful enough to raise the dead, with utter unconcern; and one reason of this insensibility is, that teaching in early life was so mechanical, that religion was lodged in the memory and the unthinking belief, whilst the reason was not awakened nor the conscience nor the heart moved. —Channing.

THE REVIVAL IN WALES.

God has so arranged the chronometry of our spirits that there shall be thousands of silent moments between the striking hours.
MARTINEAU, Hours of Thought, vol. i. p. 12.

THE great religious awakening which is now sweeping with such force over my native Principality cannot but have arrested the attention and kindled an interest in the minds of many of our readers, so that a few lines of reflection, however inadequate, from one who labours in the midst of it may not be unacceptable. No pen, however, can give anything but a faint idea of the reality.

Questions many are asked about it—how easy it is to ask questions!—but they are not easily answered. Some who admit that the Divine Spirit is always present want to know the why and the wherefore of this revival just now. I may as well confess, before proceeding any further, that I write as one in full sympathy with the movement, so that the reader may, if he feels so inclined, make whatever discount he may think fit. But the question reminds me of those words of St. John (iii. 8), which Luther has described as the grandest verse of the Bible: "The wind bloweth where it listeth," &c. To my mind it is here now, at the fulness of time, the stroke of the hour, the springtide of the Spirit, "the ebb of the individual rivulet before the surges of the sea of life" (Emerson—"Oversoul"). It is certain that Buckle's theory, which seeks to explain everything by environment, making it a question merely of climate, air, food, aspects of nature, &c., cannot be deemed a satisfactory solution; no more can Carlyle's suggestion of great personalities, though doubtless in the great upheavals of society, whether political, social, or religious, the mighty movements of the race have been generally, though not always, identified with the name of some great man. By no stretch of imagination, however, can Evan Roberts be conceived of as a man of this type.

A word of retrospect may be useful. These movements seem normal in history, great Providential agencies in the ploughing up of the subsoil of humanity for future harvests of progress. With the Celtic temperament — especially Welsh — they have always been accompanied by great fervour of emotion, reminding one of the Pentecostal experiences recorded in Acts ii. They are subject to ebb and flow. Before the full tide comes there is a period of depression in the religious, social, and moral life of the community. Vicar Rees Prichard (1579-1644) complains sorely of the state of society in his day. Even the clergy were so absorbed in the pleasures of the chase and the attractions of the public-house that they remained untouched, though his preaching and the far-reaching influence of his poems warmed many a household to a nobler and better life. The revival of the seventeenth century found Wales given over to grossest vices, but left her morally uplifted and in possession of high ideals of which she has never since completely lost sight. The revival of the eighteenth century under Rowlands and Harris was contemporaneous with that of Whitefield and Wesley, in England; but while the latter crystallised into Arminianism under the organising power of Wesley, that in Wales gave rise to the Calvinistic Methodist denomination, to-day, perhaps, the most powerful and influential body in Wales. It was characterised by extreme Calvinistic doctrine—blood and fire and the terrors of the law being brought to bear on the people with such terrific force as to drive them into the "ark" for safety. But though many thousands joined the orthodox churches the movement had the opposite effect upon many, driving them further away—not a few finding their city of refuge among the Unitarians, thus materially strengthening our cause. The so-called "fire of Llangeitho"* failed completely to make its way into the "Black Spot," as our orthodox friends in compliment name that part of Cardiganshire where Unitarianism prevails. Still, in spite of its crude theology, this revival, in the words of Principal John Rhys, proved "the new birth of the people." The terrible visitation of cholera was, no doubt, a powerful factor in initiating and promoting the revival of 1849. Fear was an ever-present feeling and exercised a moderating effect upon people's minds, so that there was a noticeable absence of many of the convulsive manifestations of some former revivals. That of 1859 is described as the most wonderful of all the Welsh revivals, both in its physical manifestation and the extensive sweep of its power. Being the most recent it is the best known, many still surviving who came under its magic spell. It is estimated that 100,000 new members, a tenth of the population, were added to the churches. This access of fresh religious influence overflowed into every channel of the national life, up-lifting it socially and morally, politically and educationally.

Coincidently with this last, Wales experienced a great musical revival. In 1859, Ieuan Gwyllt's tune book was published and shortly after the tonic sol-fa system was introduced. These caught on, so that at nearly all the churches musical festivals were established, new hymn and tune books became necessary, and music became the great power we find it in all Welsh religious circles to-day. Seeing all this, it is not surprising that Dr. Joseph Barry should say the next revival would be a singing revival.

The revival of to-day has arrived in the fulness of time, following a period when vice in every Protean form and with siren voice was spreading its allurements on all sides. Life was becoming intensely secular and frivolous, churches were being honeycombed with moral abuses and general indifference; practical atheism and flaunting immorality were rampant through the land, when lo! this thing that Joel spoke about, bursts forth, and people are astonished, and call to mind these words of the old book: "This is the Lord's doing, it is marvellous in our sight."

Evan Roberts, the chief instrument in the present Diwygiad (the Welsh name = Reformation) is simply an ordinary young man of 26, of splendid health, ordinary stature, fair complexion, of moderate abilities, of limited education, who until recently had been earning his bread by the sweat of his brow; and only a few months ago, under a strong impulse, left his employment to go to school to prepare himself for the Christian ministry among the Calvinistic Methodists; but under the influence of what he considered the voice of conscience and the bidding of the Holy Spirit he has entered upon his present campaign. Emerson says, "When the Master of the Universe has points to carry in his government, He imprints his will in the structure of minds." Evan Roberts is not one of the mighty, but he is "hall-marked" for his present work, being evidently possessed of a power higher than intellect, than culture and rhetoric, which reveals itself in a simplicity and modesty and genuine enthusiasm which are extraordinarily winsome. Visitors want to know the secret of his success; he replies, "I have no secret; ask and ye shall receive." While others clamour as to the where and when of the revival, Evan Roberts disclaims all credit, he did not create it, but rather it was the revival that created him.

It is interesting to note the undenominationalism of the movement. Sects for the nonce are forgotten, and all co-operate for the common good. Even Unitarianism has come more or less under the spell. Note the theological attitude. The grand motive force is "The love of God constraineth us." Hell is gone. Evan Roberts does not preach hell—not able to believe in the larger hope, he cannot preach it. He is in a state of suspense, as probably would be found to be the case with most orthodox ministers, were they only as candid as Evan Roberts. One leader of thought has significantly said: The motive of terror is discarded, and it is now the love of God manifested in Jesus Christ. The old idea of the Atonement is also gone." Another point, Evan Roberts once censured his audience for singing and praying ever and anon about Jesus as Saviour. It was not enough to believe in him as Saviour, he must be accepted as king, demanding obedience to the laws of his kingdom. Hence the Diwygiad is intensely ethical. It is salvation from sin and not from hell.

Since Nov. 13, 1904, when Evan Roberts entered on his present campaign at Bryn Seion, Aberdare, 40,000 have been added to the Welsh churches—an indication this of a great stirring of the depths and a promise of great moral results in the future. What do we find? Police-court work becoming lighter, publicans complaining, Billingsgate held in check, even the horses puzzled, and families in the enjoyment of a peace they have never known before, &c.

Some of us feel that the criticisms have been sometimes unkind and uncalled for. Though it is confessed there are many things incidental to the revival that even its best friends regret, they are considered as more or less unavoidable, and due to the unbridling of the emotions. The rough stones blasted from the quarry need much trimming; and for these rough recruits a polishing time will follow, and, by and by, we may expect to see them all clothed and in their right mind.

My allotted space is at an end; but in conclusion I may be allowed to ask what are Unitarians going to do? Shall we remain unsympathetic critics and continue our present apathy and indifference? Shall we hitch our own wagon, or shall we run it into a siding, and therefrom watch the great chariot of progress marching on, leaving us behind?

Had Dr. Martineau been still among us, I believe he would have been in full sympathy. Here is an extract from a letter received by me in reply to one sent him by my congregation on the completion of his ninetieth year:—"For my part, I can never admit that in this prophetic fervour there is anything out of harmony with our simple faith. Nor can I help looking to you in the Principality who are so rich in lyric tradition to bring back the poetic fire which has been too much damped by too low a temperature of reason."

HUNGARY IN 1904.

As I try to take a retrospective view of the past year, I find myself constantly affronted by the disagreeable face of war. I need not speak of the Russo-Japanese war, most terrific in all its phases. We have had a good deal of it in our own territory, though, fortunately, without bloodshed. Our ally, Austria, gives us every reason to be on guard day and night, or else we shall be robbed of our most precious national rights, now more than a thousand years old. Think of the valiant fight of Kossuth and of the struggle of this nation then, and remember that the same thing is still going on, though under different watchwords and altered flags. But of the political situation of Hungary I intend to say a few words another time.

If I look back upon the life and work of the Unitarian Church I find a more pleasant view. I see hundreds of Unitarians, old and young, working openly for our noble cause. I know there are thousands who do the same in their own small circle. I could not find a single dying congregation, but my attention is constantly drawn to these new ones, which are putting their whole strength into the effort to secure for themselves an acceptable House of the Lord. There are five or six of this kind. Two of them are well known to you English Unitarians, since your British and Foreign Unitarian Association came to their aid. Füzesgyarmat, a large village near the Tisza river, is the one which has already erected a little church and received one thousand koronas from you. This is working with a full tide. The other in a populous town, Hodmezövázárhely, decided last year to build a new church. The town presented the site, a layman, Mr. Joseph Kovács, offered to give the bricks. The money has still to be got, but the collection is begun, and with good hopes. I am happy to note here that my old friend the Rev. C. J. Street, who visited us last summer, kindly sent the proceeds of his lectures on Hungary, and half of the amount, 53 koronas, was given to this. Not only the pecuniary aid, but the moral stimulus in such a friendly act of an English Unitarian congregation promotes the cause a great deal. The other half of Mr. Street's contribution was given to Szèkalyudvarhely, a goodly town in the very centre of our Unitarian congregation. Here we had a church and a large congregation in the time of the Reformation, but the church was seized about three hundred years ago and the members scattered. Lately some zealous Unitarians who hold offices in the town made up their minds to raise a fine building and a good congregation, and even the poorest offer their mite with pleasure. It is easy to comprehend that here, where sixty-five out of seventy thousand Unitarians are utterly poor, and can hardly give more than a penny or two, the required sum of 25,000 koronas is very slowly got together. Any good friends who read this letter and would contribute whetever they were able to give, would be helping a very noble cause. I am happy to say that the lord mayor of the town and county, a Roman Catholic, himself took the lead in arranging a concert for this same purpose, and with very good result.

Last year was a very bad agricultural year. Our good people are just now under great difficulties; but still I have heard of very little complaint from my pupils, who were all out in the congregations to help in the preaching at Christmas. Twenty-seven such young men, full of zeal and hope, create a very feeling, even there where there is depression. Let me say a few words more of this student-preaching. It is a very old custom of our congregations to invite students for the three great festivals to help the minister who has to preach six sermons on three consecutive days, since here in those parts of Transylvania, where Protestant customs prevail, we keep three days. The student preaches four, the minister the opening and closing sermons. In some of the congregations they pay the student from the treasury, but in about half of them the ministers and the more well-to-do members. In such congregations the student is expected to pay a visit at the private houses. Thus a student gets acquainted during his academical four years with a dozen congregations, which is of great advantage to a young man.

It will interest some readers of THE INQUIRER to know that at the festivals on the first day in each congregation they take the Lord's Supper. This is such a favourite custom here that all members of the family do their best to gather together to participate. I am informed that in one congregation 500, in the other 800, and in the largest of our congregations nearly 1,500 partook. This means each member of the congregation above thirteen years of age. In the larger congregations it takes full two hours to finish, since bread and wine are taken by each communicant from the hand of the minister, who goes round to them.

It may be gathered from the above that this year the number of our theological students is exceptionally large—25—of whom 12 entered this year. Applications from other denominations we receive frequently, but because those who would finish in our college would not get an invitation from a non-Unitarian congregation, they either join us when they enter, or attend only as irregular students. This year we have none, because we were well supplied, and could no more promise to give others a pulpit on the completion of their course. Just lately a minister of a Reformed Church applied for support on condition that most of the members of his congregation would follow him. The matter is left in his hand; we shall try to aid him, but under our circumstances it is extremely difficult, and, consequently, we lose several splendid chances of increasing our congregations.

You are aware that besides the theological college we have three high schools, the Koloszvár one a complete gymnasium, the others at Torda and at Keresztur of a secondary character. This year the Keresztur one we increased by a new course, which means that the students may now have six instead of five years. The Torda School is just now under the serious consideration of our Consistory, since the expenses are very large; a very large number of professors has to be kept, and their salary is very high as compared with the income of such schools where a fee is very little, or nothing at all in case of poverty.

I must now refer to the great festive meeting of the Francis David Association. The readers of THE INQUIRER have been informed from time to time of the work of this society, established twenty years ago. During that time it has become a great social factor in the Church and a highly respected moral and religious institution in the country. Everybody acknowledges that the religious activity of Kolozsvár and of this part of Hungary, and within the last three years of Budapest, owes a great deal to our Association. It has drawn together in our own house the most divergent thinkers and members of all the other denominations. We have had for lecturers, gentlemen from the Jewish and also from the Roman Catholic Churches, and from all the rest. People are accustomed now to a hearty reception in our midst, and they come with pleasure whenever a chance is offered to them. The Association publishes two papers, one for the general public and one for women. Young men and others have their separate centres of work. At the meeting we enjoyed most hearty words from different gentlemen. There we had the pleasure of listening to a Lutheran minister and a Jewish rabbi, who spoke in high terms of the work of the Association. Letters and telegrams came from far away places. Let us hope that the future will be still more useful, and let me return most hearty thanks to Mr. Bowie, who sent us a most welcome letter in the name of the B. and F. Unitarian Association.

May I just mention that the book of the Amsterdam International Council and also Dr. Martineau's "Five Points of Unitarianism" will be soon published in the Hungarian language, to the pleasure of a very large class of readers beyond our own circle. Last year we published Mr. Christopher Street's "A Rational View of the Bible," Professor Carpenter's "Jesus in the Gospels and in History." Both are most welcome, especially to university students.

Kolozsvár, January 7.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

FOR a fortnight in mid-winter, which includes Christmas and New Year, there are sounds of "revelry by night" in our Sunday-schools as well as in our homes. It is a period of respite from the common round of classes and lectures, and even the minister in the pulpit is expected to suspend any special effort he may be making to expound, for the benefit of inquirers, the general problems of religion or the points of his own faith. Lancashire folks can no more dispense with their Christmas parties than they can with their Whitsuntide trips or their August holidays. In most of our churches and schools, parents, teachers, and scholars join together in one large family circle, and engage in common enjoyment. It would be a revelation if some of our southern friends could pop in and see for themselves the elaborate arrangements that are made. No private party is organised in one's own house with more anxiety for its thorough success, and the result is that both old and young carry the pleasant memories of the congregational or school "Christmas party" with them through the whole year. It does all concerned a vast amount of good. It accentuates the feeling of comradeship, it brings new and old members into a genial atmosphere of mutual interest and enjoyment, and helps us to start the new year with all our little differences swept away; they have been laughed into oblivion.

However, our "quips and cranks and wanton wiles" are at last over. The costumes of Father Christmas, of the Carol Singers, of Old Father Time, and of the New Year are carefully folded up and replaced in the "property cupboard," in readiness for similar revelries twelve months hence. Let us hope in the meantime there may be few gaps made in our ranks, either by death or removal, and that with a large measure of health and strength and enthusiasm we may with more serious, intent strive to achieve some lasting spiritual benefit for ourselves and all our brethren whom our influence can reach.

A dark shadow has passed over us during this period of relaxation, which even our social functions have not wholly dispersed. At the end of the Old Year we received, with deep regret, the news that Mrs. James Worthington had passed away into the higher life. Her name was a household word with us. She was to us the very embodiment of sympathy and charity and modesty. We have read of saints in history, but their goodness seemed more or less unreal and exaggerated until we had the privilege of knowing a real living saint in the person of our departed friend. There was no branch of our work which did not receive encouragement and help from her. There are so many otherwise good people amongst us who withhold their sympathy and help from any effort with which they do not in every detail agree. Not so was it with Mrs. Worthington. She was never so presumptuous as to suppose that all was wrong which was not identical with her personal opinion. We had only to satisfy her that the aim was right, and that we were downright in earnest in our endeavours to attain to it, and although she might criticise our methods, and have doubts as to whether they were the best, she nevertheless supported us with princely generosity. There are not a few who just miss being great through their lack of this spirit. Magnanimity and suppression of self are indeed, saintly characteristics; and we naturally wonder when and where the star of her successor will arise.

Then, too, this shadow was deepened by the passing away of our friend and leader, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong; for Liverpool had no monopoly of his friendship or his influence. We were all looking eagerly forward to his lectures on Agnosticism and Theism, which he had arranged to deliver in this city next month, and I have good reason to know that the disappointment will be felt intensely by a considerable number of people who had faith that Mr. Armstrong could pour in light upon their darkness, and clear away some of their most serious and pressing doubts. We shall miss his sound judgment and virile advocacy of every good cause very much. We always knew just where he stood in any controversy; there was no beating about the bush. His opinion was expressed straight and unhesitatingly; and he was one of the best friends his brother ministers in need of a champion could have. Letters had been received from him not many days before he was fatally stricken, in which he expressed a hope that his health would permit of his fulfilling his engagements, and telling of the joy and inspiration his lecturing engagements in the Midlands had been to him. It is, therefore, not surprising that we enter upon the work of the new year with our spirits somewhat depressed; and yet these examples of pure and devout and useful life make us realise our own duties and responsibilities more than ever; and we pray that we may have strength to faithfully follow in their footsteps, and, according to our ability, continue their work.

Since I last wrote a temperance festival has been held in Lower Mosley-street schools, under the auspices of the Manchester District Sunday School Association. A large choir of children from the various schools were admirably trained to sing their special songs by the Rev. Cobden Smith. Other musical items were introduced by capable soloists; and our old and valued friend, Mr. George Smith, who in the old days was superintendent of Lower Mosley Street Schools, and who received much of his inspiration from Travers Madge, gave a stirring address, which will be long remembered by those who heard it. The cause of Temperance is growing in our schools, and the Association recognises that this is by no means the least important branch of its work.

The East Cheshire Christian Union Grand Bazaar has come and gone. Owing to bad times and other causes, the result was not so successful as was expected. It was hoped that £5,000 would be raised; but I understand that little more than half that sum has been realised. The Union covers a wide area, and, although Manchester seems to be the natural and most central rallying point for any great effort, yet in many cases the distance was too considerable to allow of many of the members attending the Bazaar. Manchester Unitarians supported the effort as well as might be expected under the circumstances; but, of course, the same enthusiasm could not be aroused amongst them as if the effort and need had been their own; and, moreover, the Manchester general public evinced little, if any, practical interest. It is not easy to raise large sums of money out of the rank and file in these times of bad trade; but it is to be hoped that our friends may not be discouraged though disappointed, and that in other ways the amount of money they require may be eventually obtained. At any rate, it may fairly be expected that this united effort will have done incalculable good in giving an impetus to local activities, and making all concerned feel that the cause they represent is larger than the individual churches, and that it is only by combination that their work can be fully accomplished. There has been much distress in these parts this winter; and all our civic and private resource and ingenuity has been required to tide us over a very trying period. We are assured that an improved state of affairs may be soon expected, and this will mean prosperity, not only for our families, but also for our institutions. The effort to raise funds for the jubilee scheme of the Unitarian Home Missionary College is still being prosecuted. Up to the present time £12,500 has been received or promised towards the £20,000 asked for; and this amount from about 700 people. Thus far the rank and file have not been seriously canvassed. The time has scarcely been opportune; but now that the New Year has come, steps are to be taken to gather in the smaller amounts which no doubt in the aggregate will total up to a considerable sum. Those living at a distance can scarcely realise what the College means to the churches of Lancashire and Cheshire. In these two counties alone there are ninety Unitarian congregations, in the life and work of which the college plays no small part. Not that it enters into any unsympathetic rivalry with Manchester College at Oxford, but that it does for the northern churches what would be impossible for the more distant college to do. There is every reason to believe that in the near future there will be a closer co-operation between the two institutions, and that they will supply each other's deficiencies; but this makes it all the more desirable that there should be a college residence here in Manchester, in order that the work may be done thoroughly and well. The house that has been bought is now undergoing renovation. The more one sees of it the more one is struck with its remarkable suitability both as regards structural arrangements and situation. It will be a delightfully eligible and phenomenally cheap collegiate residence, and the money asked for will create an endowment sufficient to remove all anxiety as to its adequate equipment and maintenance. If this should meet the eye of any friend who is going through his or her list of proposed benefactions for the current year, I have every confidence in asking that the U.H.M. College Jubilee Fund may have a place in the list. Its work in the past, and its ambitions for the future, are an ample warrant for a sympathetic and generous support.

I have little space left for further news, this time, although there are several items of interest to which I have not yet referred. They must have their turn in my next letter. One thing more I ought to mention, namely, the strong feeling there is in the minds of some that the present state of affairs in this district calls for the appointment of a superintendent missionary who should have oversight of the churches which are now without ministers. Heaton Moor, Oldham Road, and Higher Broughton are without settled ministers; and the services at the first and last of these places are being arranged by the officers of the Association, because the local conditions do not warrant the appointment of separate ministers. The folks at Oldham Road are anxious to again have a minister of their own, and are strenuously trying to pull themselves together with that end in view. Their perseverance and effort in the face of much discouragement are remarkable; still, like the others, they are dependent upon the Association for an annual grant. From many points of view it would be of considerable advantage to have a strong and capable man appointed as superintendent missionary to give help and counsel to all our assisted churches, and also to make the stronger churches feel that the cause as a whole is theirs, and that the more practical their sympathy the more likely the weaker ones are to grow vigorous and self-supporting. The problem will solve itself, in the natural order of things, during the next few months.

CHARLES ROPER.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdare: Highland-place.—The services on January 8 were conducted by Mr. Fred Duxbury, of Manchester, who on the following evening gave one of his popular recitals from the poets.

Ainsworth.—The Annual Congregational Meeting was held at the Presbyterian Chapel on Sunday, January 15, Mr. J. H. Hayes, the senior trustee, presiding. The various reports and balance-sheets in connection with chapel and school showed much life and activity, and each a balance in hand on the year's working. All the retiring officers were re-elected with the exception of the senior chapel warden—who also acts as secretary to the congregation—Mr. Joseph Tootill. After ten years of faithful service he declined re-election, and a very cordial vote of thanks was passed to him for the valuable services he has rendered during his term of office. Mr. Samuel Holt was elected as warden and secretary, and correspondents are asked to note that his address is "Meadow Cottage," Ainsworth, near Bolton. Mr. Walter Brooks was elected secretary to the renovation committee.

Birmingham: Hurst-street Mission.—The multifarious activities of this mission are well known, and during the past few weeks an immense amount of work has been done, in the clothing of destitute children, the distribution of home comforts, the organising of Christmas and New Year's meals, and other social functions in connection with various classes and societies' Special services have also been largely attended. The Rev. W. J. Clarke has stated that in spite of the temporary breakdown of his health at the beginning of last year, it had been the busiest and most useful year of any during the twenty years of his service. The Mission has just benefited to the extent of £50 under the will of the late Mrs. Charles Best, and £250 under the will of the late Mr. Frederick Ellis, both of Birmingham.

Bootle.—At the evening service in the Free Church, on Sunday, January 15, the Rev. J. Morley Mills referred to the great loss sustained in the passing away of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. The great purposes of his strenuous life—clear thinking, clean living, and reverent worship—were dwelt on; and the appeal which the circumstances of his death made to a deeper consecration on the part of his fellow-believers to the high and holy work yet to be done, was set before the congregation. The sermon was followed by the Dead March in Saul. The anthem, "Crossing the Bar," was rendered by the choir.

Dewsbury.—Mr. Fred. Clayton, of Leeds, presided at the annual children's party and prize-giving on Saturday, January 7, and the prizes were distributed by the Rev. John Ellis. Two heavily laden Christmas trees added to the pleasure of the evening.

Dover (Resignation).—The Rev. S. Burrows having resigned the Adrian-street pulpit, stating his decision to be irrevocable, a resolution was passed at a special meeting of the congregation, accepting the resignation with great regret, and offering to Mr. Burrows sincere thanks for past services. Mr. Burrows will close his twelve years' ministry on April 2, when he intends to reside near his aged mother, in Hastings, not seeking another pastorate for the present, but ready to take occasional duty.

London: Forest Gate.—On Sunday evening the Rev. H. W. Perris preached on "The Moral and Social Aspects of the Prevailing Distress," the text being the old question, "Who is my neighbour?" A pregnant inquiry, said the preacher, followed by a luminous exposition; and he quoted Dr. Freeman Clarke, to the effect that if he were driven to adopt a creed, it should be a first-hand one, compounded of two parables. "The Prodigal Son" would explain his theology; "The Good Samaritan" his morality. Very good; but a complicated civilisation, miscalled Christian, though really material and mechanical, stood in need of new watchwords, a more searching analysis of motives and methods. He then dealt with the actual causes of poverty, tracing the evils of economical inefficiency and helplessness to their roots in a social and governmental system devised mainly for the safe-guarding of privilege and property. Mr. Ruskin's division of society into "workers and wasters" was endorsed; the misuse of natural powers and products of human toil and skill to debase and destroy, instead of their right use for the common good, was shown to be the curse from which the people must be delivered, if despairing unbelief on the one hand, and hypocritical formalism on the other, were to give place to social harmony, wholesome living, and a divinely human outlook for the people at large.

London: Kentish Town.—In the interest of the Jubilee bazaar to be held next May a performance of Goldsmith's comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer," is to be given by members and friends of the church at the Cripplegate Institute on Monday evening, January 30. Great pains have been taken in the preparation of the piece, and it is hoped that it will receive such support as will render it a success, both from a dramatic and a monetary point of view. Cripplegate Institute is close to Aldersgate-street Station, and only a short distance from Broad-street, easy of access from any part of London.

London: Peckham.—A feeling of sadness has been occasioned in the Avondale-road Church by the early death of Mrs. Edgar Davies, who, like her bereaved husband, had been connected with the church since childhood, having been successively scholar and teacher in the Sunday-school and member of the church choir. The funeral at Forest-hill on the 13th inst., and the memorial service in the church on the 15th. were attended by a large number of sympathising friends, the Rev. G. Carter officiating on both occasions.

Midland Ministers' Meeting.—At the monthly meeting held in the vestry of the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, on Jan. 9, the Rev. I. Wrigley was elected secretary in place of the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, who has left the district. It was moved by Rev. J. C. Street, seconded by Rev. Joseph Wood, and carried in respectful silence by the ministers all standing:—"That we have heard with the deepest regret of the death of our honoured friend, Mr. Charles Harding, and respectfully tender to Mrs. Harding and the members of her family our sincere sympathy in their great and sorrowful bereavement." The Revs. J. W. Austin and J. C. Street moved and E. W. Lummis supported, a similar resolution of sympathy with Mrs. Armstrong and her family in their sad bereavement. On the motion of Messrs. Street and Higham the following resolution was passed unanimously:—"That this meeting rejoices at the assurances which have been given by leaders of the Liberal party, that they will use their influence to amend the Education Act of 1902, and trusts that they will insist that all secular education shall be placed under public control, and that religious education shall be provided by the religious denominations and their ministers outside the school arrangements." An invitation to hold the next meeting at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, was accepted. Messrs. T. Paxton, G. R. Phelps, J. E. Stronge, and W. C. Hall, were nominated for election as members of the meeting. Rev. Joseph Wood gave an address on "The Dead Hand and the Church Crisis in Scotland." The address led to an earnest and animated discussion, in which Messrs. Lloyd, Lummis, Voysey, and Shelley took part. The members were afterwards entertained to tea by the Vestry Committee.

Newport, I.W. (Resignation).—The Rev. Clement E. Pike, after a ministry of seven years, has resigned this pulpit to the great regret of the congregation, the resignation to take effect at the end of March.

Northampton.—On Sunday, Jan. 8, the Rev. Arthur Harvie read at the morning service in the Kettering-road Church a sermon by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, entitled "The Sympathy of God." In introducing the sermon Mr. Harvie spoke of Mr. Armstrong as not only a keen theologian, but a moral reformer, "anxious to establish in the inward parts of our great national life that regard for veracity which makes impurity and corruption impossible His was a strenuous life, dedicated to 'truth, to liberty, to religion,' and his memory will remain a continual inspiration and an incentive to high endeavour." Mr. Harvie also referred to the lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism" delivered in Northampton and Nottingham by Mr. Armstrong last autumn. At the close of the evening service a resolution conveying the sympathy of the congregation to Mrs. Armstrong and family was moved by Mr. John Sale (secretary of the church), and carried in silence.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—At the monthly meeting of the committee held last Monday evening at Newcastle deep regret and sorrow were expressed at the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. The secretary was directed to convey to Mrs. Armstrong and family the respectful and sincere condolences of the committee.

Pudsey.—As a mark of respect for the memory of the late Mr. John Pickles, of Bradford, the congregation of the Pudsey Unitarian Church held a special memorial service on Sunday evening last. The hymns and music were solemn and appropriate, and were sung by the choir and large congregation with much feeling. The choir rendered "Shepherd of Souls" (quartet from the "Sign of the Cross") very efficiently and sympathetically. The service was conducted by Mr. Fred. Clayton (Leeds), secretary of the Yorkshire Unitarian Lay Preachers' Union. Basing his address on the words, "I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith" (2 Tim. iv. 7), Mr. Clayton eulogised the pure life and noble character of Mr. Pickles, who for upwards of 40 years had worked in his Heavenly Father's vineyard, advocating the simple truths of which Unitarians were so proud and loved so dearly. His earnestness was always evident, and his services were acceptable, not only to the congregations of Pepperhill, Elland, and Pudsey, but wherever he laboured. He had truly fought a good fight for God and righteousness. The service concluded with the "Dead March."

Saffron Walden.—On Wednesday evening, January 11, the annual financial meeting was held in the General Baptist Chapel, and satisfactory accounts of the past year were presented. During the evening the meeting was addressed by Mr. Hugh Hockley, an old friend of the congregation, who emphasised the need for increased spiritual life in the churches. Afterwards, while he was with the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth in the chapel, Mr. Hockley was seized with apoplexy, and, being removed to his home, passed away on the following afternoon without recovering consciousness. For upwards of 25 years Mr. Hockley had been a friend of the church, where he has taken the services in Mr. Brinkworth's absence. For some years he had been deacon of Abbey-lane Congregational Church.

Sheffield (Upper Chapel).—On New Year's morning a service of self-dedication was conducted by Rev. C. J. Street, at which a welcome was given to the thirty-four new members who have joined the congregation during the year. Of these, eight are young people who have attended the minister's religious instruction class, ten others being already members of the congregation. The average attendance at the class has been over twenty.

South Shields.—The Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, President of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association, conducted special services in Unity Church on Sunday last. Great interest was taken in this visit, Mr. Lambelle being well known as one of the early pioneers of Unitarianism in this town, and a former minister of the church. His subjects were, in the morning, "Go up Higher," and in the evening, "The New Unitarianism."

Trebanos.—On Thursday afternoon, the 12th inst., the Pontardawe Women's Temperance Association held a social tea as a token of respect for Mrs. Jenkins, on her departure with her husband, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, for Hinckley. Since the inauguration of the association, Mrs. Jenkins has acted as hon. sec., and through her constant endeavour it is at present very flourishing. Tea was served in Soar (C. M.) vestry, and the meeting was afterwards held in the chapel, Mrs. D. G. Jones, wife of a C. M. minister, in the chair. Songs and recitations were given, and several ladies spoke in warm appreciation of the work done by Mrs. Jenkins. At the close a parting gift was made to her.

Kilburn, Lewisham and Plumstead Church Building Funds.

AN APPEAL FOR £7,500.

THE Committee of the London District Unitarian Society urgently appeal to their fellow members of the Unitarian body on behalf of these three energetic and progressive congregations:

Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead have already amply vindicated their right to exist, and are deserving of our most generous support.

Church buildings have now become essential to secure their position, and ensure their continued progress. Excellent freehold sites have been secured, and in the case of Kilburn and Plumstead wholly paid for. A church building at Lewisham will save the congregation a yearly outlay of £70 for hire of a chapel.

Energetic ministers are in charge of the congregations.

This appeal is warmly commended by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on behalf of the Committee.

HOWARD CHATFEILD CLARKE, President.

Contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Hon. Treasurers of the Appeal Fund.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Welcome Home Meeting to the Rev. Charles Hargrove at Essex Hall on Tuesday next is open not only to members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association but to any others who may desire to attend. The chair will be taken by the President, the Right Hon. William Kenrick, at 8 p.m. There will be a Conversazione from 7 to 8. We are desired to state that evening dress is "optional."

THE seventy-fifth anniversary of the Brahmo Samaj, which has been celebrated by an elaborate series of meetings in Calcutta, is to be observed in London also this (Saturday) evening, and to-morrow. The meetings are to be at Essex Hall, and an open invitation is given to all friends. On Saturday evening, after a short opening service at eight o'clock, Mr. B. C. Ghosh, M.A., is to open a debate on "The Relation of Religion to Morality." On Sunday morning, at 11.30, service will be conducted by Mr. V. A. Sukhtankar, B.A., of Manchester College, Oxford; and in the afternoon the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie will preside over a Conference, when Mr. B. C. Ghosh is to open with an address on "Unitarianism and the Brahmo Samaj." After tea, at four o'clock, there will be an hour's service, beginning at 4.30.

THIS week the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter has taken up his public lecturing for the present term, giving the first of the course of six lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," at Norwich on Tuesday, in the C.E.Y.M.S. Hall, Oxford-place, and at Hull on Wednesday, in the Royal Institution, Albion-place. His programme includes also two lectures on "How to Read the Gospels," to be given on Thursday evenings, at St. Helens, Jan. 26 and Feb. 2; at Chesterfield Feb. 9 and 16; and at Stourbridge Feb. 22 and Mar 2. So the six weeks are filled.

A CONFERENCE under the auspices of the National Unitarian Temperance Association is to be held at Stoke Newington Green Schoolhouse, on Saturday, February 4. Tea and coffee will be provided at 6 p.m., and at 7 the chair will be taken by Mr. T. Pallister Young, supported by the Revs. W. Wooding, H. Elvet Lewis (Congregational), J. Johnston (Congregational), and other friends. The subject of the Conference is "How to Run a Successful Temperance Society." Mr. Charles Wakely (Secretary U. K. B. of H. U.) is expected to take part.

MR. KIRKMAN GRAY'S article on the political situation in Russia, which we publish this week, was written before the tragic events of Sunday, and now it appears that the fires of revolution are suddenly kindled into lurid flame. Whether a cruel and remorseless bureaucracy will succeed for the present in crushing down the outbreak, it is too soon to say. As we write, St. Petersburg is in the hands of the military dictator, but demonstrations of the people are in progress in Moscow and other Russian cities; and the strikes of the workmen, met as they are by the governing powers, seem likely to draw all classes into active sympathy and a common effort of revolution.

FATHER GAPON, who organised the appeal of the workmen to the Tsar, warned him before Sunday's demonstration of what they intended in their peaceful gathering:—

> The whole people, trusting in you, has resolved to appear at the Winter Palace at two o'clock in the afternoon, in order to inform you of its needs. If, vacillating, you do not appear before the people, then you tear the moral bonds between you and the people. Trust in you will disappear, because innocent blood will flow between you and the people.

And that is what has happened. Ruthless slaughter of unarmed people—women and little children among the victims; the flames of a passionate indignation on the one side, and, so far as one can see, a brutal callousness and obstinate pride on the other—indifferent to the people's need. Out of such conditions comes revolution, and, amid all the confusion and suffering, we must hope that it is yet the dawning of a better day for the down-trodden people of Russia.

AN interesting course of four lectures on the Land Question was concluded by a summary and conference at the Friends' Meeting House, 12, Bishopsgate Without, on Monday, Jan. 23, in which Dr. Paton and others took part. The lectures had been arranged by a committee of the Quarterly Meeting, and were attended by an audience probably averaging some two or three hundred friends and others. While the Conference adopted no resolutions, the discussion which took place will doubtless awaken considerable interest in the taxation of ground values, and result in more serious study of the whole subject by members of the Quaker Society.

THE committee which organised the meetings is known as the "Poverty and Social Service," and is in itself significant of the increasing interest which is being taken by the Society as a body in the economic problems of modern life. We believe it owes its origin to the lectures given before London Friends by Mr. Seebohm Rowntree, under the auspices of a small council which has now become the Friends' Social Union. The latter has affiliated with it some thirty committees for social study and service in all parts of the country, and is issuing a series of leaflets for their use. These may be obtained from the organising secretary, Mr. Percy Alden, 39, Woburn-square, W.C.

THE report of the Lancashire Independent College records a year of successful work under the new principal, Dr. Adeney. This is no more than was expected by those who have been familiar with the work of Dr. Adeney, a learned article from whose pen appeared in the last issue of the Hibbert Journal. The College is in organic connection with the University of Manchester, and this fact, together with the traditions of the College, make it difficult and inadvisable to lower the intellectual stringency of the entrance examination. But in this connection the committee has had to face a thorny question. During the year a number of young men had applied to the principal for admission, who were not equal to the examination test. Some of these showed in other respects many qualifications for the work of the ministry. To meet the needs of such candidates it was decided to make some special regulations whereby they might have the benefit of being trained for the work, but yet in such a way that the ordinary scholastic requirements of the institution shall not be impaired.

THE Congregationalists of Johannesburg have their religious education quarrel. The Ordinance under which the schools are carried on provides for secular teaching coupled with the notorious "right of entry." The Evangelical churches are unwilling to avail themselves of the right, and are furious at its being exercised by Anglicans and Roman Catholics. The extract from the Congregational paper, the Outlook, show how apparently impossible it is for orthodox Dissenters to understand the opposition of Churchmen and Freethinkers—to mention no others—to their fondly named "undenominational" formula. "The Evangelical Churches," we read, "are as anxious to see every child brought up solely in the tenets of their particular creed as the Anglican and Roman Catholic Churches are. But the former recognise this as impracticable, and for the purpose of averting the danger of having pagan, godless schools such as we have at present, they are willing to sink their sectarian feelings and create a neutral zone of simple, honest agreement, which will be acceptable to all parties." Unfortunately no such "neutral zone" is discoverable, and certainly not that proposed by the Evangelicals of "Bible Lessons."

THE Co-operative Holidays Association had a considerable increase in the number of guests in the past season. The total of those who stayed a full week for the year ending with September was 7,733, an increase of 1,473 over the previous year. Next summer two new centres will be opened, one at Achill Island, the other at Sedbergh. The latter will be conducted as a cheap centre after the manner of that in the Vale of Newlands, near Keswick, where for little over a pound a week all expenses of board, residence and excursions may be met. The centre at Boscastle in Cornwall will probably be continued, and opportunity also given for a Swiss holiday.

THE experiment of a cheap holiday in the Lake District was very successful. An old mill in the Vale of Newlands was turned to use by the C.H.A. Guests did some part of the work for themselves and their companions, and the mountains and lakes being readily accessible there was no need to go to much expense over excursions. It is encouraging to find that another centre managed in like manner is desired.

We are very glad to note an article in this month's Westminster Review by Mr. Samuel Wellington, of Liscard, on "John Stuart Mill: The Saint of Rationalism." In the November number of the same review another article by Mr. Wellington on "Ebenezer Elliott and the Story of the Corn Laws" held the place of honour. Of Mill a very interesting account is given, his extraordinary education, and in spite of it, the birth of feeling in him, and the great influence of Wordsworth. His relations with Carlyle and Sterling are described, and with Mrs. Taylor. The noble traits in Mill's character are well brought out, and their triumph over the narrow philosophy of his bringing up.

AT a meeting of the Committee of the National Conference held in Manchester on Jan. 19, a letter was read from Principal Rainy acknowledging the resolution of sympathy, passed at a previous meeting, with the United Free Church of Scotland. "In returning sincere thanks," Dr. Rainy wrote, "I may say that expressions of sympathy have been extraordinarily numerous and have been greatly valued." The Committee passed the following memorial resolution:—

The Committee of the National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other non-subscribing or kindred congregations desires to record its warm affection and deep respect for the late Rev. Richard Acland Armstrong, B.A.

He was the founder of the Conference, for by his influence and on his motion, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association appointed the Committee which led to its first Assembly at Liverpool in 1882, and he was preacher at its second meeting at Birmingham in 1885.

He was an untiring and fearless advocate of the principles of the Churches of which it is constituted, and always manifested an earnest interest and sympathy with its proceedings by wise counsel and sturdy effort which will be sorely missed at its future gatherings.

The Committee wishes also to express its heartfelt sympathy with his mourning widow and family in the irreparable loss which they have sustained.

IT will be seen from an advertisement in another column that Messrs. Wharmby & Thompson offer photographs of Mr. Armstrong considerably later in date than those by Mr. Julius Kay, of which we wrote last week. Copies of these also can be seen at Essex Hall. One sees at once that they are later. They are photographs of an older man, no longer in his full strength.

THE Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of Glasgow, is to preach on Sunday evening at the Brixton Congregational Church, the Rev. Bernard Snell's. On Tuesday evening, Dr. Hunter will lecture on "Frederick Denison Maurice," at Belmont Hall, Grafton-square, Clapham, S.W., in aid of the funds of the Wheatsheaf Hall, South Lambeth. (Tickets, 1s.)

AFTER six weeks at Palermo Mr. and Mrs. Farrington have moved their sunny quarters, and friends will now find them for a time at the Hotel Victoria, Taormina, Sicily.

THE way into all spiritual attainment lies partly through understanding that settled order of cause and effect under which God has placed man.—G. S. Merriam.

FOLLOWING Jesus does not mean the belief of a creed, but the culture of the understanding and the hallowing of the spiritual faculties. The spirit of Jesus dissolves all ceremonialism, dogmatism, and sacerdotalism, and sets the soul free to grow according to its purest intuitions. "Consider the lilies, how they grow," and then let the soul, as naturally and beautifully, absorb the Divine nourishment.—Alexander Webster.

THE SCOTTISH CHURCH CRISIS.

THE January Hibbert Journal opens with two articles on the affairs of the Free Church in Scotland. Mr. A. Taylor Innes writes on the legal aspect of the question, arguing that from the first the Free Church intended to keep the way open for re-union with other bodies, and that the Confession of Faith has always been open to revision. The judgment of the House of Lords last August took a different view, and the attitude of the Free Church towards its heretics from 1843 until very recently would certainly not lead any observer to conclude that such was her principle. This is frankly admitted by Dr. John Watson, who follows with an interesting account of the various divisions of the Church of Scotland and the more recent efforts of re-union, while he himself strongly asserts the right of the Church to revise its standards. He thinks that the leaders of the United Free Church ought to have been more conciliatory and generous in the first instance, but the result of the recent judgment suggests to him Alice in Wonderland.

To readers of these articles we commend also four new "Scotch Tracts for the Times," published by the McQuaker Trustees at Essex Hall (1d. each). To the first of these, a "Unitarian View of the Crisis," by Dr. S. H. Mellone, we have already called attention. The other three are by the Rev. Alexander Webster, of Aberdeen, on "The Disinherited Church in Scotland," "The Confession which became a Compression," and "The Headship of Christ." They put very forcibly the lessons of the judgment, the mischief of a dogmatic confession of faith, and the true principles of religious union in a free church. We are glad at the same time to welcome a new edition of Mr. Webster's most interesting and instructive narrative and confession of faith, "My Pilgrimage from Calvinism to Unitarianism." The first edition appeared in 1889, the fourth in 1893. This fifth edition comes aptly at the present time. (P. Green, 5, Essex-street. 1s. net.)

THE SPARROW'S FALL.

LITTLE sparrow, not dead but numb,
Numb, and so patient, still, and tame,
Your hour had well-nigh come,
When swifter Pity came.

Pity that placed you in my hand,
And lured your drowsy heart to beat:
You could not understand,
But felt a rapture sweet.

Ah! surely now with me you'll live,
A child of nature, docile, glad,
Forget, and, oh! forgive
The fears you once had had.

Alas! what means this startled eye,
This helpless struggle to be free,
This gasping, soundless cry,
This waking dread of me?

For other bosom do you sigh?
The hollow of another hand?
The unobtrusive sky
And God you understand!

The window opens: Oh, the thrill
Of recognition! Intercept Did I that Perfect Will
And wake you when you slept?

RETROSPECT FROM HOME.*

FROM SAN FRANCISCO TO NEW YORK.

Leeds, January 20, 1905.

THE delight with which we welcomed the appearance of the s.s. Sonoma was, I fear, not flattering to our own kind host and hostess, who had done all they could to make us comfortable during our enforced sojourn at Pango-Pango (they spell it Pago-Pago, but why the "n," which is always pronounced, should be omitted in writing I cannot conceive). We were on board four hours before the time of starting, determined to make sure this time of not by any conceivable accident being left behind. So, on the afternoon of November 8, as I find written in my diary, "our three interminable weeks have come to an end," and we bade a last and joyous farewell to Tutuila. Looking back upon the time we spent there I cannot regret the misadventure, for it introduced us to novel and interesting conditions of life very pleasant to look back upon. Indeed, with books and without mosquitoes, we might have enjoyed the strange experience, but with nothing to do except scratch and slap in alternating attention to bites and biters, the time passed very slowly. At home I find it difficult to assure myself that there are really seven days in the week, so speedily does Friday come upon Monday. Here it seemed as if each day were a week long.

We arrived at Honolulu on the 15th, and spent a few hours on shore. We should no doubt have been as enthusiastic as others in its praise if we had come from the bare hills of California, but the little we had time to see appeared tame to us by comparison with the luxuriant vegetation of Samoa.

At last, six weeks later than we had been expected, we reached San Francisco; and having endured the long ordeal of the Customs (everything we had being scrupulously turned over to prove that our written declaration of having nothing dutiable was not a fraud), we drove to the Occidental Hotel and there met Mr. Leavitt, the young and talented minister of the First Congregation, who had come inquiring after us. It was impossible to spare more than four days, unfortunately not including a Sunday, at San Francisco, but thanks to the great kindness of the brethren and the happy coincidence of my arrival just at the right time, I saw and heard much, and made the acquaintance of some whom I shall not forget. The first night I was taken to the quarterly dinner of the Unitarian Club, which numbers among its members gentlemen of the best families of the city. The membership is limited to 200, and there are always applicants waiting for any vacancy which may occur. It is a common belief with us that the name Unitarian is detrimental to the success of our churches or societies: however this may be in England, it is not the case generally. Here, in California, in a city which has a population less than that of Leeds, not only are there more than 200 gentlemen of position found who openly avow the name, but others, who are not Unitarians, are proud to join a club which uses the name in its justly acquired sense of free, rational, religious, liberal, reverent, tolerant. If such men were taunted by their more bigoted brethren with inconsistency I fancy they would reply that while holding Trinitarian doctrine they sympathised with the Unitarian spirit, and were glad to associate themselves with those who made public profession that life was of supreme account and opinion of comparatively small importance.

The word was given to me before the discussion of the evening, on "Nature in California," commenced, and I was glad of the opportunity of assuring our American brethren of our consciousness as English Unitarians of something more than friendship or agreement uniting us—that we felt ourselves one body, owning all of us the same faith, revering the same great names, participating in the same ideals. Channing and Parker, I said, are ours as much as they are yours. Martineau is yours as much as ours. And our Priestley found with you the security which failed him at home. I risk the charge of vanity in reporting my own speech that I may tell how well such sentiments were received. Indeed, I have always found beneath all the little bickerings and jealousies and fault-finding, which the closest ties of blood will not altogether exclude, there is a ready response among Americans of English descent to any reminder how near of kin are we and they.

The day following we were taken under the guidance of the Rev. Geo. W. Stone, Secretary of the Pacific Unitarian Conference. He is a kind of doctor among the churches; devoting his care to any congregation which is distressed or failing, or in debt, working it up to health, and then finding for it a suitable pastor. So that while doing excellent work he is never in charge of a thriving church. Under his kind care we were taken to see the pretty little church at Berkeley—of the University and of the Greek Theatre there space does not allow me to write. Then to the neighbouring church at Oakland, admirably equipped for all possible congregational work, but hitherto not altogether successful. On the way home I had the great satisfaction of introducing myself to one well known by his hymns to all of us—Fredk. L. Hosmer, till lately minister of Berkeley. His audience could never have been large by count of heads, but what a multitude in English-speaking lands have his words reached!

Had they known for certain when we should arrive, they would, so we were assured, have had a reception to welcome us at the First Church. But except for the honour we were as well off as if a meeting had been held specially for us, as it happened that the widow of the late well-known and respected pastor, Dr. Stebbins, was on a visit to the city from Boston, and we were bidden to the assembly called to welcome her. So we were introduced to many leading members of the congregation, and learnt enough to judge for ourselves that it must be in the true sense of the word, highly respectable, and happy, and united in its work.

Thursday was Thanksgiving Day, that great family festival, the date of which is fixed by proclamation of the President. It dates back to 1621, when by the order of Governor Bradford it was observed by the Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth. It was repeated from time to time at more or less frequent intervals during the 200 succeeding years, and since 1863 has become a national institution which is always kept on the last Thursday of November. Mr. Leavitt very kindly invited us to join his family circle, and to us to whom it was all new, the feast seemed a real communion, uniting, like the Passover lamb, all the people and all the generations past, from the beginning of the nation.

We left San Francisco on Friday morning, and crossing the great desert and the Salt Lake arrived at the famous Mormon city on the following afternoon. Here Mr. Fish, known to many in England as at one time the minister of Kidderminster, met us at the station, and most hospitably provided for us during our three days' stay. I preached on Sunday morning to a congregation of about 120, mostly young people, many of them brought up as Mormons, who in the search for a more liberal and rational faith had here found satisfaction for their spiritual and intellectual needs. Unitarian services were begun in 1892, but after five years discontinued. In 1901 a new start was made under the Rev. Philip S. Thacher, who preached in a hired hall, and prepared the way for Mr. Fish, who, in less than two years' time, has gathered a congregation, started a Sunday-School, and built a church which is now free of debt. Seldom has so much good work been done in so short a time, and it is to be hoped that now that he has returned to Boston, for the climate and the dust was very trying to Mrs. Fish and threatened a serious impairment of her sight—that a successor will be found who will maintain and develop the work. In the afternoon we attended service in the famous Tabernacle, which is said to seat 7,000; there were, I should judge, about 4,000 present. The apostles and elders sat on a raised platform below the grand organ, surrounded by a fine choir of 300 voices. There was nothing in the service to account for the numbers regularly attending. We had some hymns and an anthem, and two very ordinary addresses, one on the freedom enjoyed by Mormons above every other sect.

The following day I made use of an introduction given me before leaving England to a venerable old gentleman, Mr. Masser, the official historian of the Order. It was a novel experience to hear a man talking quite simply of "my dear wives," but I confess I was quite unable to summon up the virtuous indignation proper for the occasion. I had the feeling as if I were interviewing one of the patriarchs of old, and when he spoke of his 35 children, and of his ambition that at least one member of the family should always be found in the mission field "till the Lord come," it was impossible not to give him full credit for sincerity and earnestness. "Children, children," he said, "that's everything," to provide bodies for the souls waiting outside for incarnation as the way onward to higher life. It is a curious and instructive problem, this of Mormonism—its mean beginnings, its absurd pretensions, its bare materialism, its practical morality, and its almost unparalleled success! I felt oppressed by it all the time I was in Salt Lake City, as if there was in the atmosphere something not of evil, but of low and commonplace.

* The ten letters which Mr. Hargrove wrote for THE INQUIRER "en route" appeared in the issues of June 18, July 9 and 30, August 13 and 27, September 3 and 17, October 8, and November 5 and 19. The ninth letter was numbered by mistake XI., and the last XII., instead of X. The present concluding letter, following that on January 7, is, therefore, really the twelfth.

Another night and day in the train brought us over the Rocky Mountains by a pass 10,400 feet in height to Colorado Springs. Here there is a Unitarian church, but no minister. Mr. Hill, the acting trustee, took kindly charge of us, and drove us about the beautiful neighbourhood. Though situated on the mountain slopes at a height greater than the summit of Ben Nevis, it was bright and warm. The church is a very pretty building. On the Sunday morning it is let to the Christian Scientists, who have a full congregation; in the afternoon there is a Unitarian service, with a very small attendance. But if anyone should be tempted to draw the inference that Christian Science is the truer religion, he must go further, and, comparing its great success under favourable conditions with the far greater success of Mormonism under the greatest trials and difficulties, conclude, if he can bring himself to it, that the latter is far more true.

We had only a night and morning to spare for Chicago, but I saw "the pit," so thrillingly described in Frank Norris's "Epic of the Wheat." A wonderful sight, indeed, or rather sound; sober men of business, fathers of families, shouting, gesticulating, frantically bidding for futures, and the price of wheat all the world over falling and rising by almost imperceptible fractions of degree as this great dealer or the other persisted or withdrew.

At Albany I met the Rev. William M. Brundage, who, after nine years' strenuous work there, lifting the church out of debt and difficulty into a satisfactory position, is going on to do similar good work, best work, indeed, elsewhere.

And at New York it was our happy fortune to arrive just in time to join with Mr. Savage in congratulating our dear and reverend Yorkshire brother, Robert Collyer, on his eighty-first birthday. Less active in body certainly, just the same in spirit; his company, as of old, every time I have met him these thirty years, was exhilarating as mountain air. One day with him, and then we rolled back across the Atlantic, reaching Liverpool just in time for the last Saturday night train to Leeds.

The next morning I was again in my own pulpit, after thirty-six Sundays' absence. Thank God there was not one missing of all whom we had parted from in April; and the welcome to us was not marred by any word of dissatisfaction with the brethren who had so admirably supplied for me and maintained the credit of the Mill Hill pulpit; Dr. Hicks or Mr. Jacks—which they liked best, that was the only note of difference of opinion; and as I hate futile comparisons, I am content to set down both as excellent, and am proud to have a congregation which can fitly appreciate two such men—not that the others who filled in the intervals were any of them inferior men, or failed of sincere appreciation.

"So I awoke, and behold, it was a dream!" Such was my feeling that same evening, as I mounted the pulpit stairs and looked again on the familiar scene.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION IN RUSSIA.

ON a superficial view the forces of reaction and misrule have been growing ever more strong in the land of the Tsars. From time to time news has come through of some peculiarly wanton insult to a Count Tolstoy, or of some aggravated outrage by the police on a village community or a group of university students. And the records of lawless and unjust arrests, imprisonments, and deportations have seemed the death knell of the hopes of a great and oppressed nation. But the friends of Russian freedom have been aware of a steadfast, if slow, increase in the forces which make for progress. There has been, for one thing, a breaking down in many places of the suspicions which have hindered the work of the reformers. How hopeless seemed the task of the youths who, twenty years ago, sought at once to simplify themselves and to instruct and arouse the dormant ideals of the workers, may be read in many a novel of Tourgenief and others. The task has ceased to seem so futile; to a large extent the young men and women engaged in revolutionary and educational propaganda have succeeded in gaining the confidence of the industrials, and even of the agricultural labourers. In that fact lies the hope of the situation.

Some such reflections as these serve to modify the surprise with which we have received the recent accounts of the spread of a Russian constitutional movement. The war, and its revelation of official corruption and weakness, may have accelerated this, and if so it is matter for thankfulness that out of a thing so evil good seems to issue. But at most the war can only be regarded as an occasion. The recent assassination of M. Plehve—of whom, being dead, we need say no evil—has also served to focus the movement, at least in the sense of having enabled men to realise how widespread was the detestation aroused by the brutal, degrading administration of the Tsar and his ministers. Men looked at one another and read in the faces of their fellows the same hatred of tyranny they felt in their own breast. But it would be a mistake to regard the present uprising of a wronged people as a new or unprepared thing. The misdeeds of a stupid officialdom, subservient to evil society influences, could not continue for ever, for even when the drastic action of the police seemed to crush all opposition, it was also spreading in many directions hot indignation.

With this outpouring of the soul of a people, their claim to enjoy the elemental political privileges, their resolution to be masters of their own thought and their own faith, their consequent determination to be free from the censor who would dictate their reading, the priest who would confine their belief in obsolete forms, and the bureaucratic entourage of the Emperor which aims at dragooning a hundred and thirty millions of people into an ignoble subservience — we have the most profound sympathy. When or in what form the reorganisation and the resurrection of Russia are to come, whether they will come quickly or slowly, by a process of peaceful evolution or of violent civil strife, we are not in a position to foretell. But as lovers of freedom and of humanity in our own land we cannot but look with hope to the efforts of a sister people as they struggle to shape their destinies to noble ends of satisfying social life.

If reform is to come—we must unhappily express ourselves thus, for the forces of oppression are strong—but if reform is to come it must be looked for as an outgrowth of the genius of the Russian people which is not exactly similar to our own. The condition of the country has been strikingly described by the great Russian jurist M. Kovalevsky as a democracy under bondage. The instinct of mutual help is strong in the heart of the Russian people as it is strong wherever it has not been withered by over-civilisation, and this communistic tendency is reflected in the Russian institutions. It is no accident that under a central and irresponsible government the evolution of local government has been so comparatively free. These local institutions reflect an immemorial tendency to co-operation. In the narrowest sphere we have the council of the village community—the mir—constituted as part of the reforms of Alexander II. on the freeing of the serfs. But not at all as a new creation, for the village community, the organised management of common affairs, the exercise of the ability of the whole for the welfare of all, goes back far into the days of serfdom, when the serfs, having rendered tribute and service to the lord, assisted one another. It goes back, indeed, beyond the ages of serfdom to the free village communities of the earlier times. The mir, then, is the unit of Russian society. But it has a defect. It consists only of the sharers in the land of the village; these, theoretically, should be the people of the village, but in reality they are only some of the people. The growth of an agricultural proletariat, of men landless and dependent wholly on chance earnings, presents one of the serious problems of the day. Next to the mir is the combination for special purposes of several village communities, and beyond this again we find the zemstvos—whose doings have startled us of late—or councils of provinces. These exist in nearly three-quarters of the provinces of European Russia proper. They consist of representatives of the nobility and of the peasants, though these last are representatives only in name, being selected by the governor of the province. This selection takes place contrary to the constitution but by Imperial decree. Clearly, if reform is to be real, this, together with the other powers of the governor to overawe and nullify the action of zemstvo and mir must be abolished. The official throttling of local government must cease. In this direction first reform is to be sought.

Before touching on the powers of these bodies we may mention the town councils. Towns in Russia are not numerous, but with the growth of capital they become more numerous, and the town government becomes more important in the national economy. The salient fact about these councils is, together with their subjection to the governor, the exclusion of the working men from them. None of these bodies have what we should call political powers, the functions are rather economic or philanthropic; they regulate roads, factories, build and maintain hospitals, encourage agriculture, all so far as they may be permitted by the officials of the central government. What is wanted may be explained in a word as greater freedom and a larger range of action.

To this increase of freedom and power in the local bodies the reformers will do well to bend their strength. We hear sometimes of the demand for a Parliament. Now, it is very doubtful if a Parliament, in our sense, is what Russia wants. Russian distances are vast, and under the one name so many races and nations are included that it may be doubted if one Parliament in Moscow could be of much service. The present centralised bureaucracy of Ministers is bad, so bad in some of its workings that any change might seem for the better. But probably Russia, if she gain her freedom, will win it best through some form of Federalism. The different lands, with their so widely different people which make up the empire, will work out their own salvation as more and more power is left to the different people in their local assemblies. For this reason it is so essential that mir and zemstvo be at once rendered more popular and more powerful.

So much for the forms of government. It is impossible in some closing lines to give any description of the economic problems involved. The reports of extended strikes which reach us indicate the extreme gravity of the situation. But it must suffice at present simply to draw attention to this aspect of the question. The terrible normal poverty of the masses is the dominant factor in this troubled land.

And the unrest in Russia cannot be stilled by any mere measures of franchise or assembly rights. We have mentioned the growth of an agricultural proletariat; there is also an increasing urban proletariat. These masses of men, living always in an economic insecurity, overworked, and commonly ill housed and ill fed, are a serious element in the tremendous problem. A reform that does not include the means of a nobler and more satisfying life for the proletarian workers cannot secure any lasting harmony in the national life. One is led to hope that this element will not be wanting by the reflection that there has been in the past a disposition on the part of the local authorities to spend more money on the wellbeing of their neighbourhood than the central authority has allowed, and a continuance of this tendency may be hoped for. In any case the long-suppressed but rising cry of the Russian people is a two-fold demand—freedom from basely exercised arbitrary rule and the common enjoyment of the means of a humane livelihood for all. Real and lasting reform must secure both of these demands.

B. KIRKMAN GRAY.

LITERATURE.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

THE collected edition of the poems of William Watson must have been one of the most welcome books of the Christmas season to many readers. It will send them back on winter evenings to "Lacrimæ Musarum" and "Wordsworth's Grave," and many of the exquisite lyrics which they read a few years ago, and they will find that time has done them no injury. English poetry has its great traditions, and to th se traditions of noble thought and exquisite and stately speech William Watson is always true. His work will live after the vagaries and conceits of a good deal of modern verse have ceased to interest us. These two volumes, very satisfactory in appearance to the fastidious book-lover, have been edited by Mr. J. A. Spender, who contributes a short preface. There are some omissions, notably among the occasional political verse, and a few welcome additions, which are marked by an asterisk in the index. Perhaps one of the most striking of the new poems is this sonnet, called "Ecce Homo":—

The Cross, the crown of thorns, the anguished eyes,
The cruel wounds unstaunched and bleeding yet—
Ever the same wan form before me set,
All out of tune with the proud, glorying skies!
O, were it not to-day at last more wise
In his immortal greatness to forget
The mortal agony and bloody sweat,
And in his living words the dying cries?
What is to me this show of wounds and death?
To me his death is nought, his life is all!
The one no word of hourly purport saith;
The other, at morn and noon and evenfall,
Rallies me to Him with a trumpet's call—
Him not of Calvary, but of Nazareth.

Mr. Stephen Phillips has called his new poetical play "The Sin of David," and after "Herod" the title suggests naturally a Biblical subject. The reader will be a little surprised to find himself among the officers of Cromwell's army. It is not easy to judge it as a play before it has been acted. In one place the action is so rapid as to arouse misgiving, but Mr. Phillips is a master of stagecraft and knows the limits of what is possible. Regarded simply as poetry it is a little disappointing, though in the last scene the author comes very near to the emotional intensity of some of his other work and the human tenderness of Marpessa.

To pass from poetry to sermons (the transition ought not to be so severe as probably it is) we hope that many of our readers have made acquaintance already with the new volume by Dr. Brooke Herford called "Anchors of the Soul." They will find there all the qualities, mellow and mature, which gave him as a preacher such a hold over ordinary people. But perhaps the most welcome thing is Mr. Wicksteed's biographical sketch, a piece of work, which for its vividness and finish, deserves our gratitude and congratulations. In fifty pages he has managed to give us a portrait, which those of us who knew Brooke Herford will recognise and admire at once; and we believe it will be no less effective in conveying to the stranger a real impression of the man. His dogmatism and his persistence are not slurred over—why should they be?—but it is his shrewd mother-wit, his simplicity, and his invincible optimism which dominate everything. We wonder that so good a Wordsworthian as Mr. Wicksteed could resist quoting the lines:—

A Man he seems of cheerful yesterdays
And confident to-morrows; with a face
Not worldly-minded, for it bears too much
Of Nature's impress—gaiety and health,
Freedom and hope; but keen withal, and shrewd.

Possibly some people will think that a personality so breezy and individual as that of Brooke Herford might well have had a longer biography. We should, indeed, have been grateful for more of the same excellent quality, but it so happens that these severe limits fit in with a favourite heresy of our own regarding the undue length of many modern biographies. There are some lives that require it; there are others, a very few, that deserve it. Mr. Bryce's "Studies in Contemporary Biography" is an excellent example of the value of brevity. The really great men of thought or affairs, and the few supremely good letter-writers, cannot be treated adequately in this way; but for others it is the best form of personal record in a crowded and busy world. Is it too soon to express a hope that we may have as a companion to "Anchors of the Soul" a volume of sermons by R. A. Armstrong, with an equally vivid biographical sketch and possibly a selection from his letters?

"The Diary of a Church-Goer," by an anonymous writer, published recently by Macmillan, is a book of a rather unusual type The author is a Churchman of very liberal tendencies, who is aware of his own unorthodoxy, and still acknowledges the value for himself of church-going and stated services. The charm of his book, apart from its high literary quality, consists in the frankness with which he analyses his own difficulties, and lays bare his own moods and impressions. There is nothing very original in it; and perhaps it would be less valuable if there were. As it is, the writer seems to be simply the representative of his class—the educated layman who is devout and dissatisfied. We do not suspect the book of much literary device. It has all the appearance of being what it really pretends to be, the reflections upon particular parts of the service, the lessons, the creed, the sermon, written down shortly after the event. Its aim is quite simple and straightforward, namely, to give utterance to scruples and misgivings which exist widely among the laity of the Church, though it is seldom that they have the advantage of such thoughtful and temperate expression.

Upon many topics we find ourselves in tolerably close agreement with the author, as, for instance, in his objection to the use of the Athanasian Creed in worship, not on account of the damnatory clauses (if they express the real belief of the people who use them we have no more right to object to them in a creed than in a sermon), but because of "its pretentious pedantry, through which shines no glimpse of the grace of the Gospel." We agree with him also in his attachment—an attachment which he fears is idolatrous—to the beautiful language of the Bible and the Prayer Book. There are some phrases which it is mere pedantry to try to alter, they are steeped in such venerable and precious religious associations. Fortunately this is a sentiment which can be indulged without any tampering with sincerity; for when we read the Bible in church it is not the critical accuracy of a translation with which we are concerned, but the power of the printed page to convey a religious impression. For the many other topics of interest, notably the discussion of the Synoptic portrait of Christ in its relation to the traditional creed, we must refer to the book itself. The fact that it contains the theological thought of a layman, and that with all its outspokenness it is pervaded by deep religious reverence and a quiet charm of manner, should secure for it a cordial welcome. For the clergy in particular it contains a salutary reminder that theology is something wider than a professional study. The writer does not stray into the region of practical suggestions. He is content to go to church and to think his own thought, though he confesses that perhaps his proper place is in the outer court of the Gentiles. He reminds us that "the periodical withdrawal into these houses built with hands helps us to dwell in houses not built with hands." We close his diary with genuine respect, grateful for his candour, and with our feeling for Christian worship and the traditional pieties unimpaired.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Problem of the Milk Supply. By F. Lawson Dodd, M.R.C.S., D.P.H., L.R.C.P.—No reader of THE INQUIRER can afford to ignore the subject of this treatise; nor is it probable that many can have access to any other book upon the same subject at once so illuminative, concise, and inexpensive. There is sound doctrine of milk as well as of morals. Indeed our methods of milk supply touch our methods of ethics at many points; and certain it is that the mens sana in corpore sano of Juvenal's dreaming must remain a possession of our dreamers for so long as we sleep to the necessity for more stringent regard to the problems of food supply. "It is not by epigrams," says the writer, "but by epidemics that people are being persuaded to take in hand seriously the supply of the necessaries of life" (p. 73). We could wish that there might be an epidemic of this epigram; and that the zeal and enlightenment betokened in this small volume might prove highly infectious amongst all interested in the difference between pure milk and—other sorts! "JESUS SAITH."

III.—FASTING TO THE WORLD.

Jesus saith, Unless ye fast to the world, ye shall in no wise find the kingdom of God.

A HARSH saying, this—harsh in structure and purport alike—yet, except in form, hardily a new one; linked rather to a host of similar expressions, so numerous as to form a distinct feature of the New Testament, no more peculiar to John than to Peter or Paul or James. What does it mean?

When, at a period and in a circle when there was avowedly a marked quickening of spiritual perceptions, we find writer after writer expressing himself upon one particular topic from just one particular point of view, such a circumstance must arrest attention; what is this "world," in the specific sense in which it appears in Gospel and Epistle, and now in this new-found fragment ascribed to Christ himself, as the very antithesis of the kingdom of God? What is this world to which the Christian must be crucified, and it to him—to which he must fast who would find the way to the kingdom? The answer was given with epigrammatic crispness once by the late Bishop of London when he defined the world as "the sum of the activities of life, with God left out." There is an all-important difference between the serene, almost childlike enjoyment of the world by Jesus, who in the freshening breeze of the lake, the gleam of the sun on the yellow corn, in bird-song and child's play, and human toil, discerned his Father's love and power displayed; all the difference between this essentially religious delight in the world, and that essentially pagan and also essentially loveless temper which sees in it only so many—or so few—opportunities for passing gratifications, ever oppressed by the thought of the ever-nearing, the inevitable end; the hedonist temper, profoundly sceptical of realities not obvious to sense, whose riotous summons, "Let us eat, and drink, and be merry" always dies away into the shuddering sob, "For to-morrow we die."

It is the world in this sense, the world minus God, dis-haloed, made common, bereft of Divine significance, its tangled threads shot through with no glory caught from the Infinite, of which we need to beware, this the world to which, in the striking phrase of our text, we are exhorted to "fast." For this world, truly, is too much with us; its offers are plausible, it appeals to each of our more clamant wants in turn, it promises satisfactions and prizes that the imagination pictures as of surpassing worth, and with flute and viol, with brass and cymbal, wakens wild melodies which drown the rarer, sweeter strain that would persuade the soul to journey where alone true joys are found. Alas for the awakening, when we have gained the world, and find it, with infinite disillusion, not worth the winning, not worth the stake which we surrendered for it—the vision of the kingdom, the peace of our own soul!

Is it not sound advice, then, to fast to the world, to refuse the smilingly proffered food which serves but to increase the appetite it promised to allay, to close the lips against the alluring potion which will send a subtle fire circling through the blood? There must be these choices, these abstinences; and moral shipwreck is the result of men's failure to realise at the decisive moment that there had to be a refusal of one set of inclinations and possibilities in order that another, higher one might not be defrauded of fruition. Men constantly imagine that they can combine things in their nature irreconcilable, with an interchangeable citizenship entitling them to sojourn in states that are in unceasing warfare with one another. But our more material appetites, our more frivolous tastes, cannot be ministered to, and at the same time our nobler gifts and aspirations developed. The athlete cannot also be a bon vivant, the man of studious aim cannot also be a drawing-room gossip, the man of God cannot at the same time be a man of pleasure—a man of the world. We must fast to some things that we may taste some others; it is the divided purpose, the divided heart, the divided life, that is our tragedy. Men would fain drink the water of life, the draught of ideal yearnings and attemptings that will transport them into the third heaven; yet cannot let pass the intoxicating chalice in whose laughing depths they will drown fair resolve and self-esteem, whose contents shall benumb the will, and leave the soul in squalid servitude. But it has to be one or the other, not both—the world or the kingdom; there can hardly be greater delusion than his who thinks it possible, by the use of diplomacy or circumspection, to cheat the laws of the cosmos—the laws of God—and to be making simultaneously for ends that lie in opposite directions of the compass.

And this everyday tragedy of the divided self apart, the impossible attempt to live on different grades at once, to combine high thinking with low practice, austere principles with self-indulgent lives—apart from this, there is a sense in which we all need to "fast" to the world, lest we lose the very desire to find the kingdom of God. There are among the dishes spread on the world's banqueting table those which have a sinister power, not only to attract the coarser, but, when repeatedly partaken of, to dull the finer appetite. Here is one who set out with the sacred fire aflame in his breast, bent upon high artistic aims; but popular success won by something miles below the best that beckoned him on, and wealth acquired by doing the easy, the second or third best, fashionable thing which the public appreciate and patronise and are willing to pay for—these have made him content to sacrifice the ideal, to listen no longer to its voice, the voice drowned in the multitudinous babel of the market-place, where he has taken his position as one of the popular purveyors to popular wants; while high above the din and roar of the trafficking crowd bent upon their merchandise, hid by clouds from profane and uninitiated eyes, in the circle of the immortal masters, he might have had place and starry fellowship. O royal birthright bartered for a mess of pottage! O kingdom vulgarly lost for the vulgar guerdon of the world!

"Men, my brethren," saith a living Voice, "ye have heard me say, Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Verily, I say unto you, Come unto me all that are weak and at war with yourselves, and I will give you strength. Learn of me to fast to the world, that so ye may find the kingdom. Learn of me to turn away from the seeming-sweet potions the world offers you, the more surely to enslave you, and share rather my bitter cup, which is the sacrament poured out age after age for the healing of the world and the hallowing of life. In your striving and your renunciation, in your grief and agony, remember me who have suffered all that man can suffer, that in my conquest over sin and death ye, too, may conquer. In this world ye have tribulation; but be of good cheer—I have overcome the world.''

OBITUARY.

MRS. ORLANDO OLDHAM.

ON Jan. 11 Mrs. Orlando Oldham passed away peacefully in her ninety-second year at her residence, Mount Pleasant, Gee Cross.

She was the youngest child of Randal Hibbert, of Brookside, Godley, himself a keen Unitarian and one of the twenty members of the old Hyde Chapel who subscribed towards the cost of applying to Parliament in 1789 for the repeal of the Test Act. Her husband, Orlando Oldham, was also a strong supporter of the Gee Cross congregation, and one of the prime movers in the building of the present chapel.

By Mrs. Oldham's death Hyde Chapel loses its oldest member and one of its most loyal friends. She was the last of her generation, and a very dear link with a very dear past has been broken.

Up to the end of her ninetieth year she regularly attended morning service, and to the last took a deep interest in the affairs of the chapel and the Unitarian body generally. By means of our newspapers she kept herself informed of all that was going on in our churches, while her kindly and sympathetic interest in the welfare and doings of her many relatives and friends made her home a centre for a large circle, and enabled her to keep in touch with the work and the aims of the rising generation. Gifted with a remarkable liveness of spirit and robustness of mind, rich in sympathy and kindliness, she was both a good talker and a good listener.

Those honoured with her friendship were always made to feel that their affection was valued, and could always learn again that life is indeed worth living, and that old age, even when by reason of strength it continues beyond fourscore years, need not be labour and sorrow, but may be an evening of gentleness and peace, in whose fading light many younger spirits may see a beautiful hope.

We must not grieve over her death, for she has rest; and we have a rich store of memories, and the power of another life added to the dearest traditions of our chapel.

A. R. A.

Mrs. Orlando Oldham has left the sum of £1,000 in trust for the benefit of Hyde Chapel, Gee Cross.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

PEGGY IN POUND.

"HERE'S a letter from Peggy's mother to say that the young madcap has broken her leg, so of course we shall look in vain for her this autumn.'' Now Peggy had been counting for months, with ever-increasing excitement, on the promise of running wild in real wild country for three whole weeks in September before she went back to school; and now, within a day or two of the great event, an accident had befallen her which banished other hopes besides her own. In the course of a few days came a letter from Peggy herself, dictated to her mother from bed—the first of a series of messages which have continued up to the present. After the first big disappointment she settled down with good sense to what could not be helped, and plucked up heart to make the best of a bad job. Remembering the fate of a certain stray pony, "the ranger has caught me,'' she said, "and put me in the pound.'' So, unable to make free use of her own feet and eyes while in this state of captivity, she determined to use the feet and eyes of her friends, till Dr. Potter, the ranger, set her free. The friends fell in with the plot willingly, and I presently found myself commanded to serve her highness in my humble way. Once a week, I was given to understand, I was to remember that I was a minister—her minister, and act accordingly. "Accordingly'' means according to Peggy. Truth to tell—and as she is not present I may say so—Peggy is not always as respectful as she might be to sermon and gown, and has an unreasonable dislike to the Sunday-school which does not in the least diminish my faith that she has in her the making of an ideal teacher. But now that church and school were out of the question I was ordered to send up once a week "a kind of a sermon about the woods and the animals and the people you know, and that sort of thing.'' So without arguing the case longer than was necessary to gain a moderately clear idea as to what was expected of me, I promised to obey on one condition, namely, that Peggy should supply me with texts in advance, and that I should be at liberty to wander from them as far as my thoughts cared to take me. This was agreed on; and such, therefore, was the origin of the following Children's Columns which I felt it due to my readers to explain; and if they meet, as is likely, with anything they cannot understand they will remember that I was writing not to them, but to Peggy, whose mind I know, and whose deep brown eyes I see looking into mine now with her wild gipsy hair all round them like the eyes of a fawn that you have come upon unawares gazing at you from the midst of the bracken, all wonder and timidity, and yet with trust. Peggy's texts, let me say, by the way, have turned out not to be texts at all of the ordinary kind, but odd subjects that flitted across her mind, such as thrushes, dead leaves, a giant, the mist on the moor, and so forth.

Peggy, I say, became reconciled to her fate. What others did to help, as others ever do at such times, would have been of little use if she had not set to work to comfort herself. Certain stories about other broken bones and the like, to follow hereafter, did something towards curbing her rebelliousness; but she soon found that her nervous little fingers must have something to do or they would be utterly miserable. So she undid the knots of her coverlet fringe, and tied them up again. She followed up the track of ruthless brigands or of knights and ladies through the wild forests represented by the well-worn fur of an old squirrel-skin cape which was sometimes laid on her bed. These, especially the latter, were gratifying pastimes, but it is well to have something like a purpose on your mind, even when you are lying helpless in bed. So it struck Peggy, and she not only discovered a purpose, but the way to carry it out. This was to make paper pillows for sick children. Her mother made the cases, and she filled them. So, with a newspaper or a pile of bags, circulars, and letters at her right hand, and a small cotton pillow-case at her left, Peggy was soon as happy as a sandboy. The doctor gave his sage approval, praising the cool and wholesome invention, and telling her of the comfort such pillows were when sent out to the wounded soldiers in the war between France and Germany when he was a student at Guy's Hospital. So Peggy set to work with spirit, and her ingenuity meanwhile found many channels for exercise. First, she selected and arranged her papers in qualities, according to their tearableness, and to what she considered their fitness for stuffing. Then there were the varying degrees of fineness into which she would tear up her material, a process commencing sometimes with strips, and sometimes with squares. These different methods and qualities led to different grades of pillows, which were named accordingly, "Queens',' "Ladies',' and "Housemaids'.'' But the chief interest centred in the introduction of birds and animals cut with scissors out of brown, blue, and other coloured paper, and which were devised to give the children whose heads rested on them happy dreams. These were introduced sparingly, as they had to be a good deal larger than the microscopic snippits, extending to two or even three inches in length; but a flock of singing birds, such as robins, thrushes and nightingales, were certain to sing the sufferer back to health in his dreams. Or pleasant farmyard fancies were to haunt the pillow which contained an array of horses and cows, poultry and pigs. Or a medley of wild beasts—lions and tigers in red, yellow giraffes, blue elephants, and white camels and ostriches invited the unknown invalid child whose head might lie on that particular pillow to forget its weakness and its pain in a delightful voyage with Noah in the Ark, or on a less romantic visit to that modern Noah's Ark which has come to its anchorage in London, and which we call the Zoo. Finally, the stamp of the maker was honestly inserted in each pillow, written on a small square of white paper by Peggy's mother. It read thus:—"Made in bed, by Peggy.''

THE TRAINING OF MINISTERS.

THE annual meeting on Thursday week of the Trustees of Manchester College is fully reported in our present issue. The meeting, which was held in the Memorial Hall at Manchester, was more largely attended than usual, 110 Trustees being present; and the Annual Address of the Committee, which contained a full report of the work of the past year and a plain record of recent events, was accepted without the striking of a single discordant note. After the decisive vote of the special meeting of Trustees at Oxford in November, it was inevitable, since a division was challenged, for the first time for very many years, in the election of the Committee, by the nomination of several representatives of the minority, that the view as to the right management of the College maintained by the old Committee should again receive the strongest support; but apart from any question of conflicting policies, it will be generally acknowledged that the two new members elected on the Committee are a great gain to its effective strength.

A resolution in favour of the compulsory retirement of a certain proportion of the Committee each year, to be ineligible for re-election for one year, met with decided opposition from speakers (and doubtless from other Trustees who did not speak), who were on both sides in the recent controversy, and the resolution was defeated by a very large majority. The demand for the periodical infusion of new blood into any committee is perfectly legitimate, but in this particular case the grounds of complaint appear to have been somewhat exaggerated. The Committee of Manchester College has not been by any means the stereotyped body which some of its critics seem to have imagined. During the past thirty years the whole personnel of the Committee, formerly of 22 members, then of 21, and, since 1897, of 25, has been changed, with the exception of three members, the Revs. S. A. STEINTHAL and H. E. DOWSON and Mr. DAVID AINSWORTH. During that period the same Committee was re-elected at the annual meeting on four occasions only; seven times there was a change of only one member, and seven times of two. Twelve times there was change of three members, and on one occasion of four. Only twelve of the present members of the Committee have served for more than ten years; eleven have been elected at various times during the past ten years, and two new members are now added. In the government of a college, where the maintenance of a strong tradition and consistent principle is of great consequence, such a history does not appear to us marked by a too dangerous conservatism.

The passage in the Committee's address for which we ask the most earnest attention is the concluding appeal. The Treasurer's appeal for more subscriptions is doubtless urgent, but this other is more vital still; and the two, as Mr. LEWIS BEARD said, hang naturally together. If there is progressive religious life in our churches, with faith in their future, and eagerness for greater power of ministry in the world, the churches themselves ought surely to produce more men ready to devote their lives to that service. And if the young men are there, the churches must not suppose that the College can do all the rest. Its part in teaching and training is essential, and for this it cannot be too generously equipped, but a large part of the work and the responsibility must still remain with the churches, to provide a field of service from the first, in the times of College vacation and in subsequent years of practical training, and always the stimulus of religious fellowship, the sense of support and encouragement which comes from a common life and a common devotion to high aims. For the College and Churches together there is still much to be done to perfect such conditions for the adequate training of ministers.

OUR HERITAGE OF GOOD AND EVIL.

ROUGHLY, very roughly, the society of which we are members may be divided into two classes—those who from its organisation and past working have inherited good, and those who from the same source have inherited evil. We cannot get over the fact that, after making due allowance for individual effort and responsibility, large masses of people are born into the world under circumstances and with personal disabilities which bar them out from all reasonable chance of happy, noble life, while others find themselves from the beginning so situated that, with a qualification to be presently mentioned, it is their own fault if their life is not, on the whole, happy, interesting, and a great opportunity. Such, and so widely different, are what we may call the social heritages of these two classes. For the one, grinding poverty, vicious surroundings, enfeebled or diseased constitutions, and a future with no reasonable hope of advancement; for the other, enough or too much of wealth, a pleasant and helpful environment, fair health of mind and body, and a future in which any native talent will have fair play and a fair chance.

Yet—and this is the qualification already mentioned—the latter class inherit at least one great danger, and one great sorrow arising from the existence of the former. Danger, because the presence of a great mass of life on a low physical, mental, and moral level is a standing menace, and source of infection to all but the very highest types which come into contact with it. Sorrow, because just in proportion as the fortunate ones are fit for any true happiness, the joy of their lives is overcast by the consciousness of the unhappiness of the others, and their own inability to remove it.

It has been questioned whether any really thoughtful and sympathetic man can be truly happy in a world which contains so much misery and undeserved suffering. It is an exaggerated view, no doubt, but it is an exaggeration which lends emphasis to a great fact, namely, that the sorrow of the sorrowful does and always must dim the brightness of the joy of those who should be happy.

So it comes about that there is a great pain in the world, felt to-day as it has probably never been felt before, the painful consciousness of those who should be happy of the sorrow of those who have been born to grief. This is the penalty of the inheritance of the fortunate, the knowledge of a blot upon their scutcheon, which cannot be removed by any immediate effort on their part. It is in vain that we would plead that we have personally had no part in that past history which has produced so much present wrong. The same sense of solidarity which justifies our pride in the great and good achievements of our ancestors compels us to appropriate to ourselves also a share of responsibility for their wrongdoing, and in its bitter fruits of to-day.

It has been said that the most severe punishment for years of wrongdoing is to awake to a consciousness of it and of the need for restitution, and to find that no effective restitution or compensation can be made. More or less clearly we are growing to see that much of the present suffering in this world is the consequence of human wrong-doing in the past. We dare not go on ascribing to the "inscrutable decrees of providence" or the "inevitable working of natural selection" what can be sufficiently accounted for by man's greed, unkindness, and injustice. We know that these have been powerful factors in the making of history and in the production of that social system which works for good to us and for evil to others. We would fain make amends in some way and so ease ourselves of this pain; but, alas! with this desire comes the growing conviction that there is no swift and sudden amendment to be made; that, as the evil has been long in growth, so it must be slow in healing; as it is the product of greed, injustice, and unkindness working through generations and aided by much folly, so it will probably take generations of unselfishness, justice, and love guided by wisdom to remedy it effectually.

Much of the benevolent activity we are witnessing to-day in connection with such questions as that of the unemployed, the feeding of poor children, and similar problems, is undoubtedly the expression of a genuine, though often ill-informed, pity and goodwill. Some of it is certainly the outcome of a desire to be eased of our troublesome pains, and to be at liberty to enjoy life ourselves more fully. That latter motive is not good enough. We shall not be set free on such easy terms. We have had these spasmodic efforts before. They have passed and left but little permanent good effect. That can only come from a steady and permanent growth of the opposites of those human qualities which have produced the evil, from individual unselfishness, justice, and love. Out of a society in which these are the dominant traits will inevitably grow in some way or other, the details of which we cannot foresee, something more like a kingdom of heaven than the present state of things. Surely our best contribution to a future which shall be truly happy is to cultivate these qualities in our own lives, in our personal business, political and social relations.

Meanwhile we must be content to bear our pain, and perhaps learn to be thankful for it as an incentive to a better personal life; not relaxing effort in any particular cause which we are well assured will not in remedying old create new evils, but trusting more to the steady growth of high ideals and nobler character to which we can all contribute. The past we cannot alter. Its inevitable consequences must be worked through. The future we can influence by what we are to-day.

Bad as things are in this country they are not so bad but that without violent convulsion they may yet grow to better things. It is well, however, to remember that the evil may grow to such a height that no peaceful outcome is possible, and to take note of the pass to which an accumulation of individual wickedness and folly is even now bringing another great people.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE OXFORD.

ANNUAL MEETING OF TRUSTEES.

THE annual meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 19. The President, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, was in the chair, and there were also present: Dr. Drummond (Principal), the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter, J. Edwin Odgers, L. P. Jacks (of the teaching staff), Mr. Charles W. Jones (treasurer), Mr. A. H. Worthington and the Rev. Henry Gow (hon. secretaries), Miss M. S. Beard, Mrs. Brace, Mrs. Bramley, Miss Case, Mrs. Evelegh, Mrs. Evans, Mrs. Freeston, Mrs. H. P. The Late Rev. R. A. Armstrong:

The PRESIDENT, on taking the chair, said that before proceeding to the regular business they remembered the great loss the College had just sustained, for which they were all sorrowing, and he called upon the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers to move a resolution.

The Rev. J. EDWIN ODGERS said that it was a great honour to be asked to move that resolution, and he could not decline, but he wished it had fallen to another. They had lost a distinguished son of the College, one who promised to be its friend and counsellor for many years, whose words of strength and wisdom last June in his Visitor's Address and at the Valedictory Service would live in their hearts, and would not easily be banished from their memory. For five years he had been the College companion and intimate friend of Richard Armstrong. They had seen less of each other than either could have wished in the later years of life, but the ties which bound them had never been relaxed. To him Manchester College was of the deepest value and the highest significance. There was no one who had done so much to give forth to the world at once the instruction and the influences which they received under the teaching of their college; and if anyone deserved to bear the title, which he was sorry to say he had lately seen used in scorn, "A Unitarian of the M.C.O. type," it was Richard Armstrong. He was true to that type. The depth of the faith which he brought with him to College was in every way broadened, increased, matured by the instruction of their great teacher, Dr. Martineau, and there was in the man himself that fire of moral earnestness that made his faith glow and live in every word he spoke and every deed to which he put his hand. At that deeply impressive scene, in Hope-street Church on Saturday week, in which many of them had taken part, when they heard words of deserved eulogy, uttered with a discrimination with which it was not his to vie, it was impossible not to be moved by the thought that a man apparently in the height of his powers, and the very acme of his influence, was smitten down by mysterious disease—the volume of his teaching was closed; and did there not go around them, his contemporaries, in that hour of farewell, a thrill of self-judgment, a call to them to set their house in order, and turn to account the few days of work that remained to them! Richard Armstrong was nothing if not strenuous. He desired to work to the last; and if not, then to rest and be silent at once. His wish was granted. Their sympathy must go out to those, his wife and sons, whose support and companionship had drawn more closely than ever around him of late years in the hours of occasional suffering and weakness. How bravely they had met their great sorrow he need not tell. He moved:—

The Trustees of Manchester College in general meeting assembled record their profound sense of the great loss to the College and to Liberal Christianity in the death of the Rev. Richard Acland Armstrong.

He was a distinguished student of the College, a Trustee and member of the Committee for many years, and at the time of his death one of the Visitors.

His devotion to truth, his moral courage, his unswerving allegiance to principle, his love of Freedom and his deep religious faith, made him a leading influence in the Free Churches and in the College life.

The Trustees would express their affectionate reverence for his life and character, and their deep sympathy with Mrs. Armstrong and her sons in their bereavement.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES seconded the resolution. He felt deeply honoured, he said, to be allowed to do so. The duty could not have fallen into the hands of anyone who felt more keenly the loss they were experiencing. If any man ever died for his fellow men, Richard Armstrong was such a one. If he had felt less deeply the evil he had to fight, if he had taken less to heart what he had to do, if he had thrown off the griefs of the world, he might have been living still. Speaking not as a personal friend or a co-religionist, but as a citizen of Liverpool, he wished to bear his testimony that not a word too much had been said in the papers on the day after Mr. Armstrong's death, as to what he had done for the city. And for his own part he confessed to a feeling of shame that he had not given more help in that work. Liverpool to-day was a different city, more moral, more decent, because Richard Armstrong had lived there. He had faith, and his faith had been rewarded. As a man and a citizen of a great city they would mourn his loss for years and years to come.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON then read the following passage from a letter he had received from the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, who was absent in Switzerland:—

It was my pleasure a year ago to join my colleagues on the Committee in appointing Mr. Armstrong as one of the Visitors of the College, with the confident hope that, for many years, he might give to his Alma Mater, in that high office, the benefit of his inestimable services. During one short year that hope has been richly fulfilled; and now the eloquent voice, which was heard in the two noble addresses which he delivered at Oxford, in June last, is for ever still, and the inspiration of his presence is no more with us.

I am more grieved than I can tell to be debarred from attendance at a meeting at which the Trustees will give utterance to their profound grief at the loss of this dear friend of us all, while still in the prime of his strenuous life of service of God and man. His wonderful gift of speech was less remarkable than his dauntless courage and his unswerving allegiance, in things small as in things great, to his highest sense of right and truth. His was the soul, as his was the voice, of a true prophet of the righteousness of God. We shall not soon see, or hear his like again. A truer son of the College never breathed. We, who were his fellow-students and life-long friends, loved and honoured him beyond power of speech. In the life of our churches, and in wider circles where his inspiring faith in "God and the Soul" lifted up and strengthened many a seeker after truth, he was a tower of spiritual strength; while in the troublous human world, his eager spirit sent him out to fight with word and deed the battle against wrong with an enthusiasm that was on fire and with a courage that never fainted or failed in the heat of the day. May his example and his influence live on in our midst!

The PRESIDENT, in putting the resolution, said how deeply he sympathised with every word that had been spoken. He was, perhaps, the oldest of those who knew Mr. Armstrong in early days. He remembered him fifty years ago at Bristol, as a bright and promising boy, during his own first settlement as minister at Bridgwater. The childlike spirit lived on in him to the last, and he added to it all those graces which made his memory so dear and precious to them.

The resolution was passed in reverent silence, the Trustees rising in their places to signify their assent.

Minutes and Accounts.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON read the minutes of the June meeting of Trustees and of the special meetings in November, and the catch-words of the minutes of the half-year's committee meeting, and these, on the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by the Rev. DENDY AGATE, were confirmed.

In reply to Mr. Bramley, the PRESIDENT said that the protest lodged on behalf of the Sheffield Fellowship Fund, in the matter of representation at the Trustees meeting in November, had been received by the Committee. He had ruled as president that a society, subscribing to the College, could not be represented as a Trustee, although, if the society thought fit, a subscription might be paid on its behalf by an appointed individual in his own name, who would then have all the rights of a trustee. Mr. BRAMLEY, at the close of the meeting, again drew attention to the protest, and said that the Fellowship Fund might feel it right to press the claim to a representative vote.

Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, as Treasurer, in presenting the accounts, said that, thanks to Mr. Marshall, they had such an explicit statement, that it was not necessary for him to say anything. He noted, however, that in such work as theirs, the more they did the greater was the loss financially; and so, for that year, as they had more students, they were more heavily in debt. He had seen, recently, in the Christian Life, a statement that the vote at the special meeting of Trustees at Oxford was obtained with the help of "fagot votes." When he saw that, it at once appealed to him as Treasurer. "What a good idea!" he thought, and hoped for a large increase in the subscription list. But to his disappointment, he found there was an addition of only £26 from twelve "fagot votes"! They were appealing for new subscribers. For the whole of their body to raise only £1,000 in subscriptions was, in his view, altogether inadequate, and he could only suppose that their friends outside thought they did not want more money. But for the present needs of the College they wanted £500 a year more; and as the work grew, still more would be required.

The accounts for the year ending September 29, 1904, showed an income of £3,406 1s. 7d., of which £2,380 15s. 11d. was from investments, and £999 6s. from annual subscriptions, and £25 14s. from benefactions, the excess of expenditure over income being £546 6s. 8d., which, added to previous deficits, made a total of £1,233 0s. 3d. of income overspent. The payments included £1,600 for salaries and fees, £475 exhibitions to students, and £625 external exhibitions.

Mr. F. W. MONKS seconded the adoption of the accounts, and the resolution was passed.

The Committee's Address.

On the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by the Rev. J. C. STREET, the Committee's annual address, which had been printed with the accounts, and previously sent to the Trustees, was taken as read.

The Address opened with the usual expression of gratitude to the Teaching Staff, gladly recognising "the eminent scholarship, the interest in the students, and the loyalty to the fundamental principles of the College, which characterise all its members."

"The Committee have to chronicle once again the loss by death of many friends and supporters of the College, some of them amongst the oldest of our subscribers. The list of losses includes some of the best-known names amongst the supporters of the College—names which have been known for generations as belonging to men of high culture and character, men of wide sympathies, men in love with liberty and possessed with a quiet, strong religious faith. To this group of old families belonged Mr. Richard Enfield, Mr. Alfred Paget, Mr. William Thornely, Miss Thornely, and Mr. Joseph Preston. Mr. Thornely had been a subscriber since 1849, and Mr. Alfred Paget since 1854. In neither case had there been any close association with the inner working of the College, but the Committee felt the strength of such life-long support from men trained in the best traditions of the past, and reverenced by all who knew them for the integrity and beneficence of their life. Mr. Alfred Paget was the last surviving fellow-student with Dr. Martineau at York, and cherished the memory of those days on to extreme old age."

Then followed a tribute to the late Mr. James Arlosh, who, since his settlement at Oxford in 1892, after the death of his only son, had, with Mrs. Arlosh, taken the deepest interest in the College.

"Himself a scholar, and devoted to the search for truth and inspired by a deep and simple Christian faith, he believed profoundly in the future of the College, with its open and liberal foundation and administration. He took the keenest interest in the welfare of the students and of the Free Churches in which the great majority of them were to seek their ministry. He himself frequently conducted the services and preached in the pulpit of the Viaduct Church, Carlisle, of which church he was a warm friend and liberal supporter."

Among the benefactions to the College recorded were a fine oil painting of the late Mr. Russell Martineau (by Mrs. Basil Martineau), presented by his widow, and the gift of £100 a year by Mrs. A. T. Webb, of Hitchin, towards enabling students for the ministry to take full advantage of their years at Oxford.

The address recorded that of the students who left the College in June, on the completion of their course, Mr. J. Islan Jones, B.A., was pursuing his studies as a Hibbert scholar in Germany; Mr. Henry Dawtrey, B.A., had settled as assistant to the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., at Sheffield; and Mr. F. Hankinson as assistant to the Rev. F. K. Freeston, at Kensington. Miss G. von Petzold, M.A., whom the Committee welcomed as the first woman to take the full theological course at the College, had settled as minister of the Free Christian Church, Leicester.

The session 1904–5 opened with the following students:—Third Year: Messrs. J. Park Davies, B.A., Arthur Golland, M.A., Albert Thornhill, B.A., C. M. Wright, B.A. Second Year: Mr. J. György, LL.D. (Hungarian). First Year: Messrs. Stanley Mellor, B.A., F. Sinclaire, M.A. (New Zealand), W. E. Williams, B.A., Felix Holt, B.A. (Tate Scholar), A. E. Christien, B.A. Special Student: Mr. V. A. Sukhtankar (Indian). There were also eight external exhibitioners at Oxford, working for graduation, and two other external students, to whom a further year had been granted for graduation.

The arrangement made by the Rev. John Ellis, by which a student of the College each week during term spent the week-end in helping in the mission work at Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, was being continued by the Rev. Gordon Cooper, with much satisfaction to all concerned.

The Dunkin Lectures by Mr. J. A. R. Marriott, during the past year, on "The Theories of the State," and during Michaelmas Term by Professor Henry Jones, of Glasgow, on "Working Hypotheses of the Science of Social Life," had been largely attended by members of the University, and were very warmly appreciated. The Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, Hibbert Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History, gave six public lectures on Sunday evenings during the autumn on "Chapters in the Religious History of America," beginning with "The Pilgrim Fathers" and "The Puritan Republic and its Religious Difficulties," and ending with "Unitarianism" and "Transcendentalism." In Whit week Professor H. H. Wendt, of Jena, lectured in the College on "Typical Forms of Christianity."

The work of the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., as Tate Lecturer was noted as follows: "The lectures are intended to help men preparing for the ministry of the Free Churches. They deal with the conduct of public worship, with the preparation of sermons, with pastoral work, and with the theory of rhetoric. The Committee are confident that such lectures from a man with the experience and power of Mr. Jacks, must be of great service to the students."

As to the Residence the Address said:—"The Committee wish again to thank Mr. Addis for his conduct of the Residence, and for his untiring devotion to the interests of the students. They feel that the amount of time and work which he freely gives is much beyond the official duties of his office, and they recognise gratefully his willingness to spend and be spent on behalf of the students. Mr. Addis's Report for the last year was as follows:—'The Residence during the past year has had no history—at least, none known to me. I have never had the slightest occasion to find fault. The men have done a great deal to help each other in their studies; the work has been good, and I believe that a great spirit of peace and friendship has prevailed.'"

The proposed arrangements for celebrating the centenary of Dr. Martineau's birth in the College were noted. As on the actual day of his birth, April 21, which was Good Friday, it would not be possible to hold such meetings in Oxford, Monday and Tuesday, May 1 and 2, had been fixed for the celebration, which would include an evening service in the College chapel on Monday, and an evening meeting in the College Library on Tuesday. There would also be a luncheon on Tuesday, to which a limited number of guests would be invited, as at the opening of the College.

The Committee noted with pleasure the request of the National Conference Committee (which had been unanimously granted) for use of the College Chapel and other buildings, so far as practicable, in connection with the meetings of the Conference of 1906, which it is hoped will be held at Oxford.

The Address then recorded the requisition signed by 45 Trustees, asking for a special meeting, which was held at Oxford on November 29. The resolution moved by Mr. John Harrison and seconded by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and the amendment which had received the approval of the Committee, moved by Mr. Russell Scott, and seconded by Mr. A. H. Worthington, and carried by a majority of 113 to 29, were given in full, also the further amendment moved by Sir R. K. Wilson, and seconded by Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, which was defeated by a large majority. On the final result, by which the Committee's amendment was carried, as the substantive resolution, by a similarly large majority it was added:—

"The temper and tone of speeches on both sides was worthy of the best traditions of the College, and it is hoped that the open discussion of a question which has exercised the minds of many Trustees will lead to a better understanding, and a united effort to improve the condition of the College, for which all feel an equal affection."

The Address concluded as follows:—

"The great need of the College is more students. From churches of all denominations at the present time there goes up the cry, 'We want well-qualified ministers.' To meet this, it is the first duty of congregations to feel greater responsibility for providing students for the ministry; and the second duty is to make themselves responsible for their training. The future life and usefulness of the churches depend, to a large extent, on the men they send into the ministry, and the education which is given them. Earnest, faithful educated men are wanted, men who come from homes where they have been trained in love of truth, simplicity and goodness, men strong in character and intellect and faith, men who could do good work in whatever profession they engaged.

"The Committee would conclude its Annual Address with an earnest appeal to young men to consider the claims of the calling of the Christian minister."

Mr. LEWIS BEARD moved the adoption of the Address, and calling attention to the closing appeal for more students, said that it went naturally together with the Treasurer's appeal for more money. The fact that there were more students constituted the Committee's best claim for more money.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT, who seconded, said that he did so with pleasure. The plain, straightforward and moderate report must commend itself to them as a business statement. The appeal at the conclusion for more students linked itself, in his mind, with the event to be celebrated in May, the Martineau Centenary. It was the loss of a distinguished and venerated leader that had moved Martineau to enter the ministry. Might not their celebration, coupled with the feeling of bereavement in the loss of Mr. Armstrong, stir the minds of some of their young people to consider the calling of the ministry? He remarked with special pleasure on the reference in the Address to the Tate lectures as "intended to help men preparing for the ministry of the Free Churches."

The Rev. L. P. JACKS afterwards said that the reference as to his lectures was a statement of the strict and literal truth.

The Rev. J. H. WEATHERALL asked that some reference to Mr. Montefiore's Old Testament Prize, which they saw from the accounts had been awarded that year, should be introduced into the Address.

After one or two further remarks, the resolution was passed.

Mode of Electing the Committee.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON presented a report as to the election of the Committee. At the last annual meeting a resolution was passed instructing the Committee to consider a scheme by which a certain proportion of the Committee should retire annually, and be ineligible for re-election for one year. On this the Committee's report was as follows:—

That all the members of the Committee are only elected for one year, and the Trustees are therefore free to elect each year such Trustees as they wish to act on the Committee; that the Committee do not consider it desirable that any members of the Committee should be considered as ineligible for re-election.

In presenting the report Mr. Worthington pointed out that the whole of the Committee retired every year, and it was the almost unanimous opinion of the Committee that a system of the ineligibility of a section was not a happy system for the working of an academic body such as theirs, or, indeed, for any public body. The very men who worked best, and whom it was most desirable to retain on a committee, were thereby often lost.

It was agreed that the report be received and entered in the minutes.

The Rev. C. J. STREET then moved, and Mr. LAWSON seconded, a resolution declaring it desirable that a certain proportion of new members should be elected each year, and instructing the new Committee to prepare a scheme whereby a proportion of the Committee, exclusive of the officers should retire and be ineligible for one year. The object, Mr. Street said, was to secure the infusion of new blood, and keep the Committee in contact with the Trustees.

Mr. LEWIS BEARD said that he had some little experience of such governing bodies, and he had seen how the system of retirement by rotation worked, but it was never to the advantage of the body governed. The collective experience of the country in its institutions—in Parliament, municipal corporations, school boards, &c.—was against such a proposal. No such body would deny itself the right of retaining its experienced members. With the growing claims of public work there were not too many men ready to give themselves to such arduous service, and they must have the right to keep the most capable men. If new blood was to be introduced, the change should be effected, not by a blind automatic system, but by the direct vote of the Trustees. They ought not to tie their hands by any rule such as was proposed.

Mr. T. GROSVENOR LEE said that, as a lawyer, he entirely agreed with almost all that Mr. Worthington and Mr. Beard had said. He did not agree with the haphazard retirement of the proposed scheme; yet, in a case where there was an immovable committee, it might be the only way to effect a change. He thought that if they were all united, as the Report said, in the desire to improve the College, the opinions of the minority in the recent discussion ought to be represented on the Committee.

Mr. F. NICHOLSON cited the case of another society which had been nearly wrecked by the system of compulsory retirement, and the resolution was defeated by a large majority.

Election of Committee and Officers.

The election of the Committee was then proceeded with. Twenty-five members were to be elected, and there had been thirty nominations. The election was therefore by voting papers, the list having first been duly proposed and seconded. It was agreed that votes should be valid whether the paper was signed or unsigned by the voter. The arrangement made by Mr. E. W. Marshall for the counting of the votes was thankfully accepted.

On the motion of the Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS, seconded by the Rev. J. H. WEATHERALL, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal was re-elected President, both speakers dwelling on his long and faithful services and deep interest in the College.

On the motion of Mr. JOHN HARRISON, seconded by Mr. H. P. GREG, the Vice-Presidents, Mr. David Ainsworth and Mr. William Colfox, were re-elected.

On the motion of the Rev. J. C. STREET, seconded by Mr. F. MONKS, Mr. Charles W. Jones was re-elected treasurer. Mr. Street said that in that vote they not only expressed their gratitude and confidence in a most devoted and capable treasurer, but also their deep sympathy with Mr. Jones in his sorrow, and their admiration of the way in which he had held to his public work.

On the motion of the Rev. C. T. POYNTING, seconded by Mr. JOHN DENDY, Mr. A. H. Worthington and the Rev. Henry Gow were re-elected secretaries. Mr. Dendy said that was not a merely formal vote. In the very trying time through which they recently had passed they owed a great deal to the conspicuous ability and the equally conspicuous fairness with which their secretaries had fulfilled their duties.

On the motion of Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON, seconded by the Rev. F. W. STANLEY, Mr. F. Nicholson and Mr. Egbert Steinthal were appointed auditors, and the deputy treasurers were also re-appointed, with power for the Committee to add to their number.

The meeting then adjourned for half an hour while the counting of the votes for the Committee was completed, and in the interval tea was served in the library.

On the PRESIDENT again taking the chair, he declared that the following were the members of the new Committee elected :—

Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., Rev. C. T. Poynting, B.A., Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A., George W. Rayner Wood, Esq., Robert Harrop, Esq., M.A., S. B. Worthington, Esq., Russell Scott, Esq., A. H. Worthington, Esq., B.A., Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., Charles W. Jones, Esq., Henry P. Greg, Esq., M.A., Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., William Long, Esq., David Ainsworth, Esq., Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., George H. Leigh, Esq., Grosvenor Talbot, Esq., Rev. F. K. Freeston, Rev. R. T. Herford, B.A., J. W. Scott, Esq., A. Ernest Steinthal, Esq., M.A., F. W. Monks, Esq., John Dendy, Esq., and Rev. Joseph Wood.

The last two are names of new members, the others were all members of the old Committee, and are arranged in the order of their seniority on the Committee.

A very cordial vote of thanks to the President, moved by the Rev. Dr. Drummond and seconded by Mr. A. H. Worthington, b ought the meeting to a close.

THE REVIVAL IN WALES.

THE revival is not for us; but that is no reason why it should not be for other people. It is interesting to notice that both those who find all their preconceptions of a religious movement shocked by the revival, and also those who earnestly desire that it will spread to England, and then reform both hemispheres, proceed on the one common assumption that there is some universal law and pattern which the manifestations of religious awakening ought to follow. Just the opposite is the plain lesson of the events which have been shaking the whole social life of the South Wales valleys into a new orientation. The revival is very Welsh, belongs to a certain soil, follows (with well-marked differences belonging to 1904-5) a national type of such commotions, and appears to shrink back whenever it finds itself straying upon alien ground. Here in Cardiff, in spite of the newspapers, it is an unreality which, up to the present writing, refuses to "materialise"; for Cardiff is not truly Welsh. It is true that for weeks past the walls have been placarded with announcements of "revival services," that united prayer meetings have been held among the leading dissenting sects, while the smaller chapels and missions have tried hard to gather in some harvest for themselves, and well-known missioners have been placed in the field. Needless to say, the newspapers have done their best to increase the "boom," and there is no doubt that they have helped to stimulate and increase interest in the surrounding country. But, with exceptions which prove the rule (e.g., at Welsh chapels), the Cardiff congregations cannot be said to have caught the fire. Now and again one sees a decorous and careful procession of very respectable chapel people singing its way through the streets to some widely advertised "mission" conducted by a specially hired evangelist. But that is about all; and all this is quite foreign to the methods of the real revival "up in the hills," where the remarkable young leader goes about unannounced, and even hides himself from publicity, and where convention and self-conscious decorum are thrown to the winds in the abandonment of the first and only great spiritual revolution of many lives. It is not safe to prophesy, but up to the present there has been no sign of the coming of the revival to this town, where the conditions do not seem to be fit. Our idea of a Mission was exemplified by the events of last autumn, when we were visited by Messrs. Torrey and Alexander—a machine-made revival, worked up for months beforehand by means of flaming posters, the expenditure of thousands of pounds, and a huge temporary building erected for the meetings, with all proper patronage from the great people, the docks, the Exchange, and so forth, with a furious dogmatic preaching of the most lurid theological terrors and ignorant attacks upon any and every aspect of progressive thought. In comparison with such apparitions, the Welsh revival might almost be said to represent "sweetness and light," springing, as it obviously does, in spontaneous fashion to meet a people's urgent need, and darting up now here, now there, in a flamelike eagerness that defies all general rules.

What has caused the revival? No one can say why, exactly at one place or time rather than at others, a great sudden wave of interest should sweep through a community as through the mind of one man. But in the absence of any general theory upon the psychology of crowds, we can discern the conditions present in South Wales to explain the rapid infection with which towns and villages have been caught up in the movement when it was once started. The moral and social state of the coalfields and the adjacent districts present the spectacle of vast agglomerations of people, for most of whom the one source of stimulus and suggestion towards the higher refinements of human existence consists in their religion. One class is predominant, in fact overwhelmingly influential, and, in that one class, one occupation. The gradations of class, so operative in other parts, are here less marked. For these great masses of people—hard workers, hard spenders, often hard drinkers—when the sanctions of religion are not powerful to keep life pure and sweet and kind, there are not many other sanctions to reckon upon. So there has been a period during which, owing to the widespread indifference to religion, it seemed as if a large population was slipping gleefully into a well-fed, ignorant, often fierce barbarism. Appalling stories have occasionally gone about, telling of the open, unashamed immorality of portions of the working-class, and the newspapers have too often traded upon the base thirst of a certain public for the most nauseous details. All this in communities which are eagerly pressing their claims to self-government, and entire liberty of life and speech, where there are no important or numerous classes of better educated folk to frown down licence or allure to brighter manners. Even elsewhere careful observers of social conditions have gravely commented upon the lowered moral tone of the last decade of our history. But in parts of South Wales the coarsening and materialising of the general life of the people, often crowded in places where the housing problem is intolerable, in towns that are slovenly, and of which one would use the word "towny" but never the word "civic," stands out with a peculiar clearness. And yet (and this is the second important point in our explanation) all this while the old beliefs were practically in possession of the minds of the people, as a kind of dim background of reality against which their life and conduct, private and public, was a wilful disobedience. For to all but a small minority the negations of secularism and "Nunquam," were of little interest; the hard, fast, brutal life to which modern industrialism so often tends, and the narrow, unimaginative, sordid life to which commercialism always tends, does not need to fortify itself with speculations against Free Will. The intellectual basis of the people is still that of Biblical Protestantism, and modern doubt has scarcely disturbed its repose. I do not know whether we are to take it as a significant fact that Merthyr Tydfil, with its Ethical Society movement, has been less affected than other places by the revival; but, at any rate, it falls in with the idea here maintained that the movement has been among those whose intellectual beliefs were still of the old order. Put these various facts together, and you will be able to imagine something of the tremendous appeal, the impact of the conviction striking freshly upon hearts which had all along been conscious of moral defection and open rebellion against a system of ideas and institutions which they tacitly allowed to be divine. The strength of the revival lies in its having consecrated a great popular reaction against the forces of wickedness which batten so freely and unrebuked upon our modern social conditions. No doubt faults may be detected even in this connection. No doubt hypocrisies make hay while the sun shines; and one newspaper, in its frantic exertions to increase its small circulation, having disgusted everybody in the summer by placards announcing the most revolting and immoral contents, has now for some time been trying to run as the revivalist journal. These, however, are only the false coin that pay their homage to the sound issue.

There is, of course, more to be noticed in this interesting movement beside its moral value. Others have sufficiently dwelt upon the theological advance marked by the absence of the old "hell-fire" preaching which the imitation-revivalists think so necessary for drawing down the old-time enthusiasm, but which Evan Roberts discards. Even more significant, to my mind, is the small part played by preaching, at least so far as Mr. Roberts is concerned. It is as if the preaching and other instruction is now, as it were, taken for granted, "taken as read," and the people proceed therewith to praying en masse. The fundamental notions about Christ, Salvation, the Spirit, Sin, and other matters which form the groundwork of revivalist theology appear to be assumed and even quite commonly well understood, so that more preaching on these subjects would be a kind of playing with or ornamenting great realities which had much better be dealt with directly by each soul for himself. It is a kind of mixture of enthusiastic and articulate Quakerism combined with the day of Pentecost. "All this, I find, shocks my friends very much, because it is so disorderly, whereas to me it is most interesting. In former days Mr. Roberts would have founded a new sect—probably a short-lived one. The whole matter should be looked into by psychologists on the hunt for the sub-conscious, or, at least, for the non-rational or sub- (or supra-) rational powers of the soul. A whole audience will give itself to what seems, to the poor, untutored Saxon onlooker, a very vagary and medley of different speeches and emotions; and yet it is explained that all will be actually praying for one man, or moved by one common feeling at the moment—feeling which prostrates leader and people in one tearful, agonising ecstasy of submission or exaltation. What powers are here! At one meeting, in the midst of a most subduing experience, which bent a whole audience as one soul, a man of ready speech from America thought he could improve the occasion with some bright Transatlanticisms, and proceeded to give a neat five minutes' sermonette upon a text which he divided into five turns upon the letter C. Immediately the whole crowd was attentively listening. But the tears were also dried, and the feeling was killed. He appealed to the intellect! Another side of the matter is that Evan Roberts has been carrying a little further forward one of the strongest points of Methodism, viz., the attempt to make "all the Lord's people prophets." He himself is not, as yet, an official minister, and the whole course of the revival has received the impression of his spirit of absolute liberty of expression, of "prophesying"—under the supposed guidance of a higher Power. How can all preach at once? is the obvious English objection. Alter the question a little, "How can the whole membership of a church actively and with personal spontaneity take part at once in the service?" and this revival supplies one answer at least. Perhaps the answer holds good only for a time of intense excitement. But it has much importance for those who have pondered the future of religious services in thoroughly democratic communities, in which people will no longer be content to be spoken for by an official. The class-meeting was perhaps the most characteristic contribution of Methodism to this problem, but is now passing away. Mr. Roberts' insistence on complete liberty, even for the children, is very striking.

The revival is not for us, but in its newness and also in its oldness it may well suggest that the ways of the Spirit are not yet exhausted. It suggests that as no one could have foretold it for Wales, so there may be—there must be if some of our dearest faiths are not to turn out lying mockeries—for England a revolution of its spiritual condition:

> Some common wave of thought and joy
> Lifting mankind again.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bradford.—At Chapel Lane Chapel on Sunday, January 22, special services were held for the dedication of the large stained-glass window, recently placed in the chapel by Mrs. Todd Vance Smith as a memorial to her husband, the late Dr. Vance Smith. There were crowded congregations. Special hymns were sung, and the anthems for the day were, "As pants the hart" (Spohr), "God is a spirit" (Bennett), "O that thou hadst hearkened" (Sullivan), "O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness" (Hollins), and "Happy and blest" (Mendelssohn). The window, which is a beautiful piece of work by Messrs. Heaton, Butler, and Bayne, represents Christ among the doctors in the Temple, and in part reproduces Hoffmann's celebrated picture in the Dresden Gallery, but so as to complete the figure of Christ in full length. The window consists of five lights, which are filled by various figures of the Rabbis, who were present, according to tradition, in the Temple at the time, and the figures of Christ and his parents. At the foot of the window is the following inscription: "In memory of the Rev. George Vance Smith, B.A., Philos. and Theol. Doct., formerly theological tutor in Manchester New College, late Principal of Carmarthen Presbyterian College, Rawdon Fellow, and member of the New Testament Revision Committee. The first two years of his ministry were spent with this congregation. This window is erected by his widow." Mrs. Vance Smith was present at the service, and also the Rev. G. Hamilton Vance, of Dublin, and Mrs. and Miss Vance. At the close of his morning sermon the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones delivered an appreciation of Dr. Vance Smith's life and work, speaking of his settlement at Bradford sixty-four years ago, of his gifts as a teacher, his eminent scholarship, and the services he rendered on the N.T. Revision Committee. At the close Mrs. Vance Smith formally presented the window to the trustees, and it was accepted on their behalf by Mr. F. R. Pesel, J.P. In the evening the Rev. G. Hamilton Vance occupied the pulpit.

Burnley.—The following resolution was passed at the annual meeting of the Trafalgar-street Unitarian congregation, held on Thursday, January 19, on the motion of the minister, the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, seconded by the Secretary, and supported by the President and other members of the church:—"That we place on record our deep sense of the loss our Free Churches have sustained by the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, for whose life of strenuous service to the cause of liberal theology and practical religion we are profoundly thankful to God. His occasional visits to our church have always been a source of inspiration and strength to us; and it is with a real sense of personal loss that we desire to offer our tribute of sympathy to his sorrowing widow and family. May they find comfort in the thought that he whose memory they cherish has done much to remove the veil that hides the Father's face from so many of His children, and that, through his writings as well as in the memory of thousands who heard his living voice, 'he being dead, yet speaketh.'"

Cardiff.—The New Year's Congregational Soirée on Jan. 2, and the Sunday-school New Year's treat and prize-giving on the 4th, have been most successful. On Friday, Jan. 6, the mothers and children attending the mission, in which some of the ladies of the congregation are interested, were entertained to tea and Christmas tree. The performance of a children's play, entitled The Sleeping Beauty, was much enjoyed.

Dromore.—A very pleasant and successful social evening in connection with the sewing class was held on Thursday, January 19, the Rev. A. Davison presiding over the entertainment which followed the tea.

Exeter.—At a meeting of George's Chapel Guild on Tuesday evening, January 24, the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, B.D., of Torquay, delivered an eloquent and most instructive lecture on "Church and State in France"—a subject on which he is specially qualified to speak by his former experience as a pastor in that country. He described the nature and history of the Concordat, the gradual change from Gallicanism to Ultramontanism among the Catholic clergy, their hostility to the ideals of the Republic, and sympathy with the parties of reaction, and the way in which M. Combes' policy for the separation of Church and State would, if carried out, affect Catholics and Protestants alike. At the close of the lecture Mr. O'Connor was very cordially thanked.

Horsham.—On Monday evening, January 16, an interesting lecture on "Thomas Carlyle" was given by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards.

Horwich.—On Saturday, January 14, a Young People's Entertainment was given in the school, the last item of an interesting programme being the Fairy Musical Play "Cinderella." The proceeds were for the Prize Fund. Last Saturday evening, a delightful lecture on "Switzerland and the Italian Lakes," illustrated with beautiful lantern views, was given by Mr. Oliver Winder, There was a large and appreciative attendance. Mr. Henry Ilarwood, M.A., of Rivington, presided. A hearty vote of thanks was given to Mr. Winder on the motion of the chairman, seconded by Rev. R. C. Moore. Last Sunday afternoon prizes to the number of forty-seven were awarded for attendance during the past year. Several copies of the useful and substantial musical volume "Hymns and Choral Songs," issued by the Manchester District S.S. Association, were presented to those scholars musically inclined; the recipients in each case contributing a little towards the cost.

London: Deptford.—The fifth anniversary of the M. A. Pearce Lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars was recently celebrated by a special Sunday evening temperance service. The chapel was well filled, and the service heartily enjoyed. The Rev. A. J. Marchant delivered an appropriate discourse, urging total abstainers to active co-operation in aggressive effort, especially in view of the Act of Parliament which has just come into operation, and which has dealt a severe blow to the temperance reformation. Mr. C. Parkinson, district chief templar, assisted in the service, and also delivered a short address.—On Friday, the 20th inst., the Rev. A. J. Marchant entertained a hundred of the aged destitute poor of the neighbourhood. As the guests assembled a pathetic picture was presented, for among them were the blind, dumb, halt, and lame, and most of them bore marked traces of sorrow and distress. A capital hot dinner, consisting of beef, potatoes, Christmas pudding, mince pies and coffee was served. The meal over, Mr. Marchant intimated that this was the ninth consecutive year that it had been his privilege to invite some of the destitute of the neighbourhood to a similar repast, and he offered them all a hearty welcome, and assured them of his deep sympathy. Miss Dorothea Shade (Congregationalist) arranged a very excellent entertainment, in which several ladies and gentlemen generously assisted.

London: Highgate.—The first meeting of the spring session of the Highgate Unitarian Temperance Association was held on Saturday evening, January 21, the president, Mr. G. H. Chancellor, in the chair. A capital concert was provided, and in the course of the evening the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, who has recently entered on his duties as minister of the church, made a short and telling speech. He had, he said, always held that there was no reason why a man should not take alcoholic liquors in moderation. There was nothing in itself evil in alcohol if so used. That had been his position for many years, and he felt it was a true position, but when he looked around him and saw the degradation of human life, the ruined homes and hopes for which drink was responsible, he felt that his sympathy with temperance should take the most practical form. He had, therefore, decided upon taking up his duties at Highgate to throw in his lot with the Temperance Association, and to make the small renunciation involved in becoming a total abstainer. The chairman, in a few words, laid the hopes and aspirations of the society before the audience. They were providing, he said, a free entertainment every Saturday as a counter attraction to the public-houses. The work of the society was not, however, confined to entertainment: they stood for high motives and for the uplifting and betterment of the neighbourhood in which they lived.

London: Mansford-street.—The members of the Stratford Temperance Union and Band of Hope gave their services on Thursday week in aid of the Southend Home, in a performance of Mr. Waddington's cantata, "Princess Lara," with orchestral accompaniment.

Middlesbrough.—At the close of last Sunday evening's service, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle referred to the death of Mrs. Faucett, the faithful caretaker of the church for close on twenty-four years. He could not close the service, he said, without paying a tribute to the memory of one who had served the church so faithfully and so long. At the close, the congregation standing, the organist played the "Dead March."

Nelson: Lancashire. — The Unitarian movement recently started in this thriving town is making very satisfactory progress. The first Christmas tea party was held on Dec. 26 and proved a great success, 130 persons being present. On Wednesday, the 11th inst., a meeting of persons desiring to form a church was held, for the purpose of organising the movement. The Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Accrington, presided, and there were over 30 persons present. It was reported that 63 persons had enrolled themselves as members, and it was resolved that these persons constitute the Nelson Unitarian Church. A committee of 12 persons was chosen, including Mr. J. T. Mosedale as secretary, and Mr. J. W. Parker as treasurer, to manage purely local matters. The services are being carried on by the kind help of ministers in the district, with assistance from laymen. The average attendance at the services (evening only) is 70 to 80, whilst a very flourishing school has been established, with over 60 scholars on the books.

Newark.—A very pleasant re-union of congregation and Sunday-school was held at the Free Christian Church on Thursday, January 5, when a Christmas tree was provided for the children, and after the little ones had gone, a concert was given, followed by social games, and concluding with "Auld Lang Syne." In the course of the evening the Rev. W. Lindsay, of Christ Church, Nottingham, who is now also in charge of Newark, gave an encouraging address on the position and aims of the church. They had good hope of reviving a successful school, and of maintaining that church as a centre of worship and Christian life.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The quarterly meeting was held at Flowery Field on Saturday last, attended by about seventy teachers and friends. After tea a meeting of the committee was held, and a report of the school's stall at the recent bazaar was presented. The evening meeting was presided over by Rev. B. C. Constable, the vice-president, in the absence of Mrs. Dowson, the president. He was supported by Rev. W. F. Turland and Mr. A. Slater. A cordial welcome into the Union was given to Revs. W. F. Turland and W. G. Price on their settlement at Flowery Field and Stalybridge respectively; and regret was expressed at the forthcoming departure of Rev. W. C. Hall, who had been one of the most earnest supporters of the Union since his settlement at Ashton. A paper on "The 1904 Summer School for Teachers at Oxford" was read by Miss Lea, and was greatly appreciated. A discussion and conference followed.

Rawtenstall.—The annual congregational meeting was held on Tuesday, January 24, the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas in the chair. Reports were read by the secretary (Mr. J. W. Ramsbottom), the treasurer (Mr. H. Wilkinson), and by the treasurer of the Independence Fund. The year has been one of steady work. The congregation added £60 to the Independence Fund during the year, making a total of £760. A small triangular plot of land on the west side of the church has been purchased. The whole of the burial ground and church site is now the property of the congregation. It was decided to adopt the revised Essex Hall hymnal at an early date. On January 10 Mr. James Lupton, of Chorley, a life-long supporter and generous benefactor of the church, passed away. Mr. Lupton served for twenty years on the Chorley Town Council. He was buried in the family vault at Rawtenstall on January 13.

Raloo.—The church has been re-opened after thorough renovation, a special sermon on the occasion being preached by the Rev. J M'Cleery.

Saffron Walden.—On Sunday evening, 22nd inst., a special service was held in the General Baptist Chapel in memory of the late Mr. H. B. L. Hockley, who died so unexpectedly on the 12th inst., as recorded in this column. The Rev. J. A. Brinkworth's sermon was from John xi. 11, "Our friend is fallen asleep," and the "Dead March in Saul" was played.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meetings were held at the Vestry Hall, Pontypridd, on Monday, Jan. 16, the President, the Rev. W. J. Phillips, in the chair. The committee met at 2 p.m. when reports of an encouraging nature were received from the various churches. The Rev. D. J. Williams read a paper on "Faith and Enthusiasm from the Unitarian Point of View," which was followed by a discussion in which the Revs. R. J. Jones, D. Rees, W. J. Phillips, Messrs. J. Lewis and G. C. Thompson took part. In the evening the Rev. W. Whitaker preached on "Belief in God freed from Superstition." The weather was very inclement and the attendance was only moderate. Tea was provided by the Pontypridd congregation at the lesser Town Hall.

Tavistock.—On Tuesday, January 17, the Abbey Chapel Sunday-school and congregation assembled in the Town Hall at General Jacob's invitation. For the Sunday-school there was a tea and New Year's tree, from which presents, given by various friends, were distributed. Mr. Jewers, of Plymouth, exhibited magic lantern slides, which were thoroughly enjoyed. A large number of outsiders were admitted after the lights were turned down, so that during this part of the entertainment the hall was quite full.

Todmorden.—Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave an admirable miscellaneous recital in the Sunday School here. He sought to give examples of four kinds of humour. First, he recited with much power Dickens's "Doctor Marigold," to illustrate humour blended with pathos. The humour of the old comedy was excellently exemplified by two scenes from George Colman's "Heir-at-law. Artemus Ward, well selected and rendered with piquant gravity, represented American humour, while Lancashire humour found its peculiar character well displayed in Ben Brierley's "Stuffed Monkey." In each of these selections Mr. Harwood showed his marked versatility and capability as a reciter. The audience was large and enthusiastic.

Torquay.—A tea and entertainment was given to about seventy of the poor of Torquay on Wednesday, January 11. A dialogue in character entitled "Poor Pussy" was given by several of the younger members of the congregation, creating much amusement, and a magic lantern entertainment followed. The spring session of week-day meetings began on Monday, January 23, with a concert.

Kilburn, Lewisham and Plumstead Church Building Funds.

AN APPEAL FOR £7,500.

THE Committee of the London District Unitarian Society urgently appeal to their fellow members of the Unitarian body on behalf of these three energetic and progressive congregations.

Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead have already amply vindicated their right to exist, and are deserving of our most generous support.

Church buildings have now become essential to secure their position, and ensure their continued progress. Excellent freehold sites have been secured, and in the case of Kilburn and Plumstead wholly paid for. A church building at Lewisham will save the congregation a yearly outlay of £70 for hire of a chapel.

This appeal is warmly commended by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on behalf of the Committee.

HOWARD CHATFEILD CLARKE, President.

Contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Hon. Treasurers of the Appeal Fund.

DAVID MARTINEAU, ESQ., J.P., 4, South Road, Clapham Park.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE announced last week that the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter had entered on the new term of his public lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience." At Hull especially the audience was most encouraging, numbering 400; at Norwich, we understand, there were about 170 present.

IT would be interesting to know how many of those 170 were Church of England "Young Men," for it seems that we were mistaken last week in saying that Mr. Carpenter's lecture was given in the hall of the C.E.Y.M.S. So, indeed, it had been arranged, and the hall had been duly let for the purpose; but in the eleventh hour the Bishop and Dean scented dangerous heresy, and would not allow the hall to be used for such a purpose.

THE Committee by a narrow majority, since the objection had been raised so late in the day, decided to allow Mr. Carpenter's first lecture to be given in their hall, so that sufficient time might be given to make fresh arrangements for the rest, but the chief shepherds were obdurate, and the necessary guineas were paid, to keep the dangerous heretic out altogether. We wonder whether the C.E. young men of Norwich are very meek. Otherwise we should think they would be inclined to flock in great numbers to hear these lectures which are deemed so terrible that they must not be allowed to taint the orthodox atmosphere of their hall.

A FRIEND suggests to us that under the circumstances the Rev. Alfred Hall should invite the Bishop and Dean of Norwich to attend Mr. Carpenter's lectures, and at the same time offer them the pulpit of the Octagon Chapel for the public refutation of his errors.

WE are very glad to hear that the course of lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," delivered by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong at Northampton and Nottingham last autumn, are left in so complete a state that they can be at once published. Only part of one lecture, dealing with Matthew Arnold, had been marked by Mr. Armstrong for revision, and this passage is to be replaced by some notes by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed. The volume will be eagerly looked for by many friends.

THE Christian World takes the occasion of the opening of the new Institute in connection with Whitefield's Tabernacle in Tottenham-court-road, to offer its readers a very interesting and fully illustrated article. These illustrated reports, which are also a noteworthy feature in the Examiner, do undoubtedly serve to stimulate a widespread interest in movements which thus in a sense are shown to belong to the churches at large. The new Institute is commodious, pleasant to behold, strongly staffed, planned for multifarious schemes of socio-religious work. Among other more important, if more usual branches, we note the furnishing of a few rooms as bedrooms for young women coming from the country; not rooms for residence, however, as they are meant to serve only for a night or two till lodgings of the right type can be obtained. We note also the employment of a sewing-woman, to be always available for mending, &c., for members of the mission.

THE cost of inaugurating the institution has been considerable, but it has been met, and already Mr. Brown, the enthusiastic chairman of the Mission committee of the London Congregational Union, is laying plans for carrying out a similar enterprise in another district, Southwark, to wit. Of this part of London Mr. Booth said there were practically no longer any Congregationalists in it. Mission settlements rarely make Congregationalists. Indeed, so far as they succeed in their religious aim it is a vaguer if broader form of religious association they foster. But, after all, to make Congregationalists is a small part of the aim of Mr. Brown and his committee, and without achieving that, there are vast results to be won in Southwark, where the conditions of life make it hard to be cleanly human.

TO the article on "Revivalism," which appears in another column, we may add these notes from the February Seed Sower:—

"The Welsh Revival is still pursuing its enthusiastic course. The daily press has devoted a considerable amount of attention to it, and on all hands it is acknowledged to be startling and remarkable. It is not at all easy for those who stand at a distance from it either to understand it or to gain any real insight into its value. For ourselves, perhaps, the instinctive attitude is one of suspended judgment, if not of actual mistrust. Our own religion does not pass readily into fervour, and we are not slow usually to scent the dangers of excited religious feeling in others.

"That these dangers exist, and are very grave, no thoughtful person with a knowledge of Christian history will deny. But, amid all the excitement, and what we have seen described as 'tornadoes' of singing and prayer, there is evidence in the present revival of salutary moral elements, which may be its salvation. The words 'by their fruits ye shall know them' have not been forgotten; the old enmities have been annulled and old debts paid; while many publicans seem to be threatened with ruin. At the same time the impression that is made upon the public mind is not entirely for good. Men are always too ready to seek for God in what is exceptional, and to undervalue the religious power of quiet habit and ordered feeling. At present, our attitude is one of sympathy and strong interest, tempered with some misgiving."

Young Days will this year revive many pleasant memories by its publication of another story by Beatrice A. Jourdan, "Eagle's Crag" is the title, and it is "a tale of by-gone days." Two parts have already appeared, in the January and February numbers, to which the Rev. A. W. Fox also contributes illustrated articles on "Bird and Flower, Month by Month." The guild work is on "Poems Worth Knowing."

BY A MINISTER.

XIII.

"IF I have written well and to the point in my story, this is what I myself desired; but if meanly and indifferently, this is all I could attain unto: For as it is distasteful to drink wine alone, and, in like manner again, to drink water alone, while the mingling of wine with water at once giveth full pleasantness to the flavour; so also the fashioning of the language delighteth the ears of them that read the story."

Who would suppose that he was here reading the closing words of the Second Book of the Maccabees? Could anything be more modern? Could any figure more aptly describe the blending in literary composition of substance and form?

Of the two, which is the wine? Plato, it is said, arranged and rearranged the opening sentence of his "Republic," and critics have been entranced by its divina simplicitas. In this case "the fashioning of the language" was, for the moment, the wine; the matter was of no account. A good opening was all that was wanted, but it must be an opening that would satisfy the critical taste under tests as severe as those by which good wine is judged. So, too, it was said of Horace, Paene divinus est in epithetis inveniendis, and here also a happy choice of words in description was regarded as the very fruit of the vine compared with the mere reality of the things described; though, indeed, style is something more than the choice of words, just as painting is something more than the selection of colours. Generally speaking, I suppose, subject-matter is the wine, and style is the water which rounds and softens the wine; yet I confess that the element of manner is often more grateful to me than the element of fact, and I do not so much care what a man says as how he says it.

It is remarkable how insensible children are to style. I am told that they like "The Swiss Family Robinson" better than "Robinson Crusoe." The things which happen are for them the things which count. No one would quarrel with them for this, but it seems to show that enjoyment of quality in the telling is an advance upon the simple enjoyment of detail in that which is told.

There is the style which is the effect of conscious skill, and there is the style which is the result of pure artlessness, and I know not which to admire more. The humblest line of dialogue in Sophocles is a triumph of composition. There is a balanced distribution of the parts; there is a subtle correspondence between the parts distributed; there is a certainty of touch which can only come from complete mastery of every note of expression. The writer of the Fourth Gospel, on the other hand, is not sure of his medium, feels his way cautiously, and avoids idiom. With a better knowledge of Greek he would have given us—who can say what? A patristic treatise? Happier in his limitations, using only the tricklings of limpid speech which he understands, he fills this wondrous wayside well for travellers of all degrees to gaze into, clear as crystal yet profound. When the Brothers Grimm collected the fairy tales of the people they wisely kept them as the people told them; a word of comment or reflection would have spoilt them; therefore they have all the appearance of being nothing less than the plain truth. Better than any concealment of art was the repression of it.

The apologue, on the contrary, owes everything to art. It is a fable with a moral, but the moral must be neither too evident nor too restrained. It is a story, but the points of it must be lightly touched, the diction must be as severely simple as the action, much must be left deliberately unsaid, and the writer must know exactly when to take his hands off the whole. The fabulist would be a poet if he were not compelled to be an artist.

A contrast may also be drawn between the style which is formed by imitation and the style which springs out of occasion. Ruskin would one day say that Hooker was his master, another that he followed Johnson; there were times when the Bible was his only acknowledged model; and he could be at intervals as weighty as Johnson, as copious as Hooker, and as rhythmic as Isaiah; but when a thought possessed him, enravished or enraged him, then he was wholly and only himself. The fire kindled, and he spake with his own tongue. Archilochum rabies armavit. A man of many moods is a man of many styles, and one unchanging manner would argue poverty of feeling, if not narrowness of mind.

I would set by itself the style which seems to be caught without effort at the moment when the literary language of a people is flowering into new and wide development. Only in this way can I account for the felicity of such a passage as the parable of the Prodigal Son in its English form, or of such a scene as the crossing of the river at the end of the "Pilgrim's Progress." The pens are the pens of ready writers who seem to have no other way of writing; the right words come to them, and come at once, and come of themselves.

There are styles which are charged with technicality, and so lack the play of personal freedom. Macaulay in his critical essays is a professional swordsman; every movement is by rule; a step forward; a pass or two, this way and that; a very palpable hit; a step back; a flourish to mark the end of a paragraph; and he is ready for the next assault, to be delivered as before. Jeffrey wondered where he "picked up that style." Fencing is not a thing picked up. Macaulay in his diary and letters is another man.

The value of egotism in style must depend very much on the ego. Bacon's essays are not the less liked because Bacon himself is absent, whereas Elia's essays without Elia would be loved of none. What would the odes of Horace be without the poet's playfulness, or Cicero's orations without the orator's vanity, or St. Paul's epistles without the apostle's passion?

If his critics are to be trusted, the writer of the Second Book of the Maccabees succeeded only in writing "meanly and indifferently." His style is said by one to be "diffuse and rhetorical," by another to be "rude and broken." He deserved gentler treatment, if only for his engaging little postscript.

A GRATEFUL TESTIMONY.

THE following passage is from an article in Horner's Weekly on "When I was a Girl," by Mrs. Hugh Price Hughes:—

"Two books that I read when I was about seventeen greatly influenced me. The first was Stopford Brooke's 'Life of Robertson,' and the second a volume of Essays by Channing. The first absolutely captivated my imagination. I entered with passionate sympathy into that heroic life, with its struggles for wider and fuller conceptions of God and the Christ life, its beauty and pathos.

"The teaching of Robertson, which has comforted and helped so many troubled and bewildered souls, came to me like a new message of hope and peace; for, girl though I was, and brought up in carefully guarded surroundings, my mind had begun to be troubled with many questionings, and the religious ideas of my youth—never doubted before—seemed suddenly to shake and tremble.

"Channing's Essays made me realise Christ as never before. Hitherto he had been an historical character, who by his death procured for me immortality, and in whom I trusted for salvation; but now he became a living reality, the great object, hope, and aim of all Christian life and endeavour. My girlish doubts and questionings very largely receded before the image and reality of Christ conveyed to my mind by the teaching of Channing.

"I have owed much to other writers in later years, but when I reach the shores of the other world I should like, if it is permitted me, to find Robertson and Channing, and thank them for what they did for me on the threshold of life."

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

SIR,—I must express my regret at one of the appointments made at the Manchester College meetings, namely, of Mr. Egbert Steinthal as one of the auditors; not, however, that I have any objection to him personally, or that I think he will not properly discharge the duties of the office.

But Manchester College is a public institution, and surely it is wise to widen the sphere of interest by enlarging the circle from which its officers and committee are drawn.

Looking at the appointment from this point of view, and having regard to the fact that the post of auditor carries with it a right to take part in the deliberations of the Committee (though not, I understand, the right to vote), I suggest it is not a happy one, seeing that the result is that a father and two sons will now sit on the Committee.

Not wishing to disturb its harmony, I did not make any observation at the meeting.

THE CHRIST OF PAUL.*

I.

THE first great step in the transformation of the conception of Jesus was made by the Apostle Paul. He stands forth in the history of the early Church as the far-seeing agent of its expansion, who saved Christianity from sinking into a Jewish sect, and carried the Gospel forth to all the world. He is the typical champion of liberty, who laid broad and deep the foundations of religious freedom; he is the preacher of a life "in spirit" which showed itself essentially one through manifold diversity of form and operation. But he was also a thinker of extraordinary originality, force, and daring. He reveals in his own person an order of experience wholly new in the range of Christian discipleship; and this becomes in its turn the basis of a fresh interpretation of the meaning of the Gospel. His ideas concerning Jesus were wrought first of all out of the incidents of his own inner history. But they could not be confined to the struggles or triumphs of a single soul. They passed out into the wider range of God's purposes for Israel and the world, and the Apostle's larger conceptions are in consequence so closely intertwined with his faith in Jesus that it is extremely difficult to isolate his doctrine of Christ from its relation to other elements in his general views of religion and life. It has been said that "one might begin the presentation of the Pauline conception of Christianity with any of the great cardinal categories of the system,"† and the remark states under one aspect an important fact. The interpreter who seeks to expound the apostolic thought, naturally endeavours to display it as an intellectual whole. This involves a more or less exact estimate of the several parts, a perception of their relations, and the grounds on which those relations are based. It implies a certain amount of clearness, definition, and coherence. But the Apostle does not usually present his ideas as parts of a system in measured continuity and proportion. He lives in a state of exalted emotion, which charges his utterance again and again with a wealth of feeling which his words are inadequate to express. In this effort his thought goes out to the great objects of his trust and love in terms which do not admit of precise adjustment. According as one or another is at the time prominently present to his mind, does it receive all the emphasis of his moral and spiritual imagination. Hence his conceptions often seem to blend or to overlap each other; to isolate them in clear-cut severance becomes difficult; and the commentator who has not passed through his crises or lived in his environment, finds that to him the radiant forms have lost their brightness and grown faint and dim. Some uncertainty, therefore, must attach to all attempts to set forth the working of this wonderful mind. The most assured results have about them an inevitable margin of indefiniteness.

* The series of articles of which this is the first, form, it should be noted, only a section of a larger study, but a section complete in itself.—ED. INQ.

I.—THE APOSTOLIC LETTERS.

The inquiry into the ideas of the Apostle Paul has one great advantage compared with the investigation of the meaning of Jesus. In passing from the Gospel to the correspondence with the churches the reader is conscious of many new difficulties, but they are of a different kind. He perceives at once that he is in direct contact with the writer's own thoughts. He does not even have to approach them (in the Greek text) through the medium of another language. Nothing is lost by translation from the vernacular of Galilee. Nor does he encounter varying versions of the same words or incongruous statements of principle and rules of practice in the same record. He has not to reconstruct the materials of a teaching as the necessary preliminary to the discovery of its purport. The teaching is there, in the form impressed upon it by the teacher; the student has only to learn to understand it.

(1) The letters attributed to the Apostle Paul in our Revised Version include one, at least, which no modern critic now ascribes to him, and which does not even bear his name—the Epistle to the Hebrews. Of the thirteen others, some seem to proceed rather from writers imbued with his thoughts than from Paul himself. It is possible that in one or two cases a Pauline nucleus may have been expanded by later hands. Or it may be urged, not unreasonably, that changes in the Apostle's own mind and circumstances may have led him to lay heightened stress on certain elements of faith in later life. These considerations can, perhaps, be better estimated after gaining some acquaintance with the characteristic ideas of the four great Epistles which, by an almost unchallenged concurrence of opinion, are regarded as summing up his exposition of the "Gospel of the Christ." These are the letters to the Galatian, Corinthian, and Roman churches. Separated from each other by no wide intervals of time, they represent the Apostle's view of the significance of his work at the height of his missionary activity.* To these may be added one representing an earlier period, written apparently soon after his visit to Thessalonica, the First Epistle to the Thessalonians, and another much later, dispatched from his imprisonment at Rome to the devoted friends at Philippi, the Epistle to the Philippians.† The first and last of these mark the simpler and the more advanced stages in the expression of the Apostle's Christology. But it does not therefore follow that this group of ideas had undergone any essential change. It is a question still undecided how far we are to regard Paul as starting upon his great missionary enterprise with a scheme of Christian truth already carefully elaborated, or how far a real "development" is to be traced with the help of his letters through advancing years. For the purpose now in hand it is not necessary to consider his teaching from that point of view. The brief compositions which the Apostle produced in the midst of his laborious toil must not be examined as if they were exact treatises representing the whole of his thought at so many successive dates. Even "Romans," which has more than any other the character of a theological exposition, is not a complete and formal summary. These are remains of a correspondence which arose out of the needs of particular churches. There is, therefore, a certain occasional character about them, and they cannot be understood apart from the controversies or difficulties to which they refer. Their statements of Christian faith, consequently, are often partial or limited. The stress that is thrown on particular topics by no means necessarily corresponds with their relative importance in the Apostle's mind. The sudden demand for counsel or rebuke or self-justification alters the emphasis of thought and feeling; and what is significant in relation to the particular crisis seems to acquire a disproportionate prominence. On the other hand, dispute and attack compel the teacher to revise his position, to strengthen weak arguments, and connect fixed points of belief with securer lines of reasoning. By these processes great truths once seen with intense vividness of imaginative apprehension are linked in firmer union. The steps of transition from one to another are thought out with closer sequence. The implications which they carry with them are perceived more clearly, and thus experience and meditation contribute to enrich the whole.

(2) Of the five churches to which the letters above selected for consideration were addressed, four had been founded by Paul himself. Their members, therefore, were all personally acquainted with him. He had lived among them, he had reasoned and argued, persuaded and convinced, in their midst. They were familiar with his ideas, they knew the chief terms of his theological vocabulary, they more or less clearly and completely understood what may be called the peculiarities of his religious idiom. They could therefore comprehend his use of words in strange connections; they could fill out hints, supply gaps in the argument; they could interpret what was said by what was remembered, and by the overmastering impression of the preacher's personality. He himself might be painfully conscious of a weakness of bodily presence, and an inability to turn the passion of his faith and aspiration into ready speech (2 Cor. x. 10); but whatever criticisms his opponents might pass on aspect or utterance, they found themselves compelled to confess that his letters were weighty and strong. But the force and energy were not those only of the parchment roll; they lived in the memory and the hope of the converts who owed all to him. These, moreover, looked at things more or less in the same way; they had the same general notions of the world, they shared the same intellectual and moral atmosphere. They could appreciate that peculiarity of ancient thought by which such conceptions as sin and death and law seemed almost to become persons, having an activity, a history, a life, of their own. They realised that connection between names and powers which modern imagination finds it so difficult to grasp. They had no difficulty in thinking of transformations which altogether baffle our modes of scientific apprehension. Greek legend was full of such symbols, and the human race was enveloped in a network of wonders. These general conditions, however, affected the churches at large, as well as the particular communities to which the letters were addressed. The same was true of many of the circumstances reflected in the Apostolic correspondence. The difficulties arising from the old Gentile habits were not confined to Corinth; other churches besides those of Galatia were disturbed by the preachers of a different gospel. It was partly to meet this need, and partly, perhaps, with the sanction or direction of the Apostle, that the practice arose of reading his letters publicly in meeting, and communicating them to the congregations round about (1 Thess. v. 27; cp. Col. iv. 16). The second letter to the Corinthians was intended for "the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in the whole of Achaia" (2 Cor. i. 1). Sometimes the Apostle seeks a wider audience still. With his persistent habit of rising from the particular to the general, from individuals to types, from parts to wholes, he opens the first letter to the Corinthians by uniting the saints there with "all that call upon the name of our Lord Jesus Christ in every place" (1 Cor. i. 2). After all, therefore, Paul is really writing to the entire body of believers through out the world.

* The chronology of the Apostle's life is still by no means fixed beyond dispute. The data for settling its chief incidents are partly to be found in the narrative of the Acts, and partly in the letters themselves. These four letters are usually placed between the years 51 to 56 A.D.

† The critical attack on these letters, of which Van Manen is the exponent best known in this country, seems to me to have wholly failed. Difficulties connected with Colossians, Ephesians, and the Pastoral Epistles, will be perhaps best considered towards the close of these papers, when the main lines of the Apostle's thoughts have been displayed.

(3) This larger aggregate, even more than the fellowship of the saints in any particular locality, could recognise and appropriate the various elements of thought which blended, not always, perhaps, in complete harmony, in the Apostle's mind. Of "the seed of Abraham," he was trained in a traditional reverence for the Law, which the Gentile probably found it difficult to understand. Educated as a Pharisee, he had embraced with ardour the characteristic methods of the Rabbinical schools. In his early years at Tarsus he laid the foundations of a culture which enabled him to quote a line from the comic poet Menander (1 Cor. xv. 33), though he may easily have picked up the saying without knowing its source (cp. the citation from Aratus in Acts xvii. 28). His native city, also, may have opened his mind to other aspects of Greek teaching. The affinities between Stoic ideas and some aspects of Pharisaic speculation may easily be exaggerated, but it is at least worth notice that men of Tarsus played no small part in the origins of Stoicism, and that some insight into modes of Western philosophy may thus have been imparted to the future liberator of Christianity from its Jewish bondage. His older contemporary, Philo of Alexandria, he does not appear to have studied, but the language of the "Wisdom of Solomon" seems once or twice re-echoed in his phrases, so that even if he was unacquainted with it, he was not far from the sphere of its ideas. So active a traveller must have been familiar with many phases of life which lay outside the ken of the fisherman of Galilee or the instructor at Jerusalem. We need not, therefore, wonder if the symbols belonging to the worthier religious aims and usages of the Greek cults sometimes proved suggestive to him. Thus different lines of historic development in the past leave their traces on his page, in the swift succession of reasoning and rebuke, analogy, and exhortation. The conception of Christianity which emerged may, therefore, have points of contact with various orders of thought, but these, after all, belong to its outside fringe, not to its essential core. Its main substance is wrought inevitably out of two factors. In the first place, the Judaism in which Paul was reared supplied a general outlook on the world, on God and man, with all the ranks and powers of good and evil, and into this was introduced the belief of the Jewish Christian church that the Messiah had appeared in the person of Jesus of Nazareth. However widely Paul's view of Christ and his function in history and in the soul might differ from that of the "pillars" at Jerusalem, there were many elements in the "Messianic idea" which found a place in his general scheme of things. These constituted for him the background of the vast drama of humanity, provided the scenery of the stage, and pointed to its ultimate issue. But the process, as Paul worked it out, began far earlier; its central incident, the Cross came to have quite another meaning; and its great protagonist assumed proportions far transcending the Petrine scale. This new aspect of Christianity resulted from the personal experience of the Apostle as he wrestled with his own problems, and advanced independently along his own lines of thought to unforeseen solutions. Here lay the contributions of his original reflection on the events of his inner history, and their relation to God's purpose for humanity at large. When Paul the persecutor of Christ became Paul the preacher of Christ, he did not change his lineage of mind. The universe with its lofty hierarchy of beings remained the same, save that he discovered the presence in it of a new and transcendent personality. The facts of life also remained the same, but he discerned that they were far wider and deeper than he had realised before. The Christ of Paul, therefore, is still the Christ as he was apprehended by a Jew. But it is also the Christ as he appeared to an elect soul of our race, who so interpreted the story of his own heart that it has become one of the great spiritual types for humanity at large.

A CORRESPONDENT directs our attention to the two magnificent planets now to be seen in the western sky in the evening. Jupiter is the planet higher up in the sky, Venus lower down and further west. The moon, we are told, will be near Venus on the 8th, about half-way between the two on the 9th, and near Jupiter on the 11th. Let our readers, young and old, observe for themselves, and see if that is right. The two planets will approach nearer and nearer to each other till the end of February, and then pass one another.

LITERATURE.

THE PRACTICE OF SELF-CULTURE.*

SALVATION is of the Jews, and culture is of the Greeks, but however separate in their origin, these things are hardly distinguishable from each other now. What distinction exists may best be indicated by saying that salvation is culture with the emphasis on the moral and spiritual sides of our nature, whilst culture is salvation with the emphasis on the intellectual side. Matthew Arnold's definition of culture as the knowledge of the best that has been thought and said in the world is, of course, excellent so far as it goes; but culture, as we are coming more and more to understand it, is not a matter of intellectual training and equipment only, but is the due development of all our powers and capacities—physical, mental, emotional, ethical, and spiritual. In the book before us, Mr. Hugh Black pleads for such a really all-round culture. The necessity for it he finds in the unity of the individual life. He looks at this life steadily and sees it whole. Its various parts—body, mind, heart, conscience and spirit—are no isolated fragments, any one of which may be treated regardless of the rest; on the contrary, they exist in the very closest relation of interdependence, and the culture of each is a matter of vital concern to all the others. We cannot, for example, realise our best mentally until in other respects also we have reached, so far as we are able, the stature of full-grown men. It is true that a strong mind is often found in a weak body. It is true that much mental acuteness may co-exist with appalling moral bluntness or callousness of heart or spiritual apathy. But in each case the thing we deplore constitutes a limitation on the mind's range and healthy activity. It is the inexorable law of our nature that if one part of us is feeble and undeveloped it hinders the others, and is a handicap on the whole life. So there can be no adequate scheme of culture which ignores the intimate relation of the several parts of our personality, and which does not provide for their mutual efficiency. In his chapters on the culture of each, Mr. Black points the way to the realisation of his comprehensive ideal. "Such an ideal," he says, "imposes on us a heavy load, but a deliberate and sustained approach to it is the task of life, and without dishonour we are not permitted to lay down the burden of being men." In spite, however, of our efforts to gain an all-round culture we cannot, owing to the conditions under which we live, avoid a more or less one-sided development. Specialists of one kind or another we must all be if we are to do any effective work in the world. Our author recognises this, but he rightly holds that we shall be all the better specialists if, as we have opportunity, we cultivate those sides of our nature which our particular life work does not tend to develop. Moreover, we are reconciled to a certain one-sidedness by the thought that after all culture is not an end in itself, but is rather a means ad majorem

* "The Practice of Self-Culture." By Hugh Black. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

Dei gloriam, and for the better service of mankind.

It is true that, in a sense, we are doing the best for others when we do the best for self, since we thus bring a richer contribution to the world's life. What we do ultimately depends on what we are, and according to the depth and wealth of our own nature can our value to society be measured. Every highly-trained capacity is a possible instrument of social service, and adds to the real possessions of the community. Still, any individual ideal which gives no definite and conscious place to the claims of Society is fatally imperfect, and dooms itself to failure even in its own sphere. To be himself, a man must get out of himself. He must hold all he has for a larger purpose than any self-improvement. At the best, self-culture of all kinds is only like the polishing and sharpening of an instrument to make it serve for the best work.

As long as books are asked for there will be a demand for some on this subject. Mr. Black treats it with marked ability, and his book deserves to be widely read for the sake of the noble ideal of culture which it sets forth.

IN THE COUNTRY AND BY THE SEA.*

THE title of Mr. E. Kay Robinson's book, "In the King's County," gives no idea of its contents. It would be better described as "All the Year Round in the Country and by the Sea," but it is not surprising that he has chosen the title he has. Norfolk people are exceedingly proud of their county. Mr. Robinson only repeats the opinion of all Norfolk men when he says, "Norfolk is a county which is a country to itself." The sentiment is echoed by Mr. Dutt: "We, Norfolk folk, or 'North folk of East Anglia,' are firmly of opinion that there is no county in England to compare with our own." The present writer has known many who, after one visit, have made a yearly pilgrimage to the county; many others, including the King, find it an ideal place of residence; and others, again, like Dr. Jessop, delight in it as an inexhaustible field for archæological research. Norfolk men are not a much travelled people: but that is chiefly due to the fact that they have plenty of seaside places, and plenty of places of historic and artistic interest within their own borders. And personally (I speak not as a native, nor have I any apartments to recommend) I am surprised that Norfolk is undiscovered to most Englishmen, save those of London. The Broads are well known: certain seaside resorts are too popular to be inviting, but the beauties of Norfolk woods and heaths have been seen by only a few.

The book before us is one of the best accounts we can find of the experiences of a man who spends his years in the country. Various events in rural life from January to Christmas are dealt with in thirty-nine papers picturesquely written. The author has an infinite fund of humour which enables him to furnish some amusing and brilliant sketches. We have read few things so genuinely funny as the descriptions of "The Pleasures of a Poultry Yard" and "Neighbours." A lover of the country will be charmed with the book; but we recommend it especially to those who live in towns. Every townsman should have on his shelves a few books on country life. They would take him out of his surroundings and carry him away, after the turmoil of his business day, to a fresh world—to the fields and the dykes, to the sandhills and the sea. Richard Jefferies has not given a better account of country life than is here portrayed; and this book has an advantage, for it gives insight into the life and experiences of the fishermen on our coasts, and furnishes information about the habits of the birds of the sea and the broad as well as of the land.

Harvest is a great event in Norfolk, and the time-honoured beanfeast or "frolic" is still celebrated by the farmers whose fathers farmed the land before them. I was in a village last autumn when a frolic was being held, and was invited to witness the rustic fun of the harvesters. I was heartily welcomed by all, urged to partake of their cheer, and amused to watch the unsophisticated merriment in which old and young joined equally, both forgetful of their years. The old villager of Norfolk, except so far as knowledge of the weather and crops is concerned, is intellectually behind the boy who has been to school, and loses both dignity and authority through having to call upon the youngsters to read the letter he has received from his son. One of the ancient harvesters informed me that only one other farmer besides his master kept up the good old customs. The new farmers were all for making money, and the young fellows under them were losing interest in the ways of their fathers. The chances of witnessing the "frolic" are therefore diminished, but an account of it can be read in this book.

The paper "Harvest by the Sea" reminds us of the incompleteness of our harvest thanksgiving services. Why should we be grateful for the produce of the surface of the earth, and forget to thank God for the riches that we gather year by year from the depths of the mines and of the sea? The following extract will illustrate Mr. Robinson's powers of observation, and also the charm or his style:—

> If you turn your eyes seawards, other harvests are seen. Beyond the shimmering, grey-green expanse of the salt marshes, streaked with stretches of blue sea-lavender purpling to decay and dotted with gulls that gleam snow-white in the sunshine—beyond the smooth, green tracts of sea-marsh pasture where the scattered sheep graze securely, because the season's low tides bring no danger—beyond the winding dykes where the whimpering redshank, with white-belted wings, tells the whole wide landscape that a stranger passes—away on the level sand you may see many stooping figures of old men and children gathering nature's free harvest of the succulent green glasswort, which is pickled as "samphire" on the Norfolk coast, and brings in some pence daily to its feeble harvesters.
> Beyond these, again, where the wet stretch of slimy ooze gleams like melted lead between the golden sand and silver sea, sturdier rows of stooping figures show the short-skirted cockle women at their work, filling bags and baskets with the blue-tinted shell-fish known to cockle epicures as "Stewkey blues," and the best of their kind in England. And away beyond the cockle gatherers and the further fringe of sprinkled gulls along the seaward margin of the ooze, the white wings of fishing boats mark where the harvest of the sea itself is reaped.
> Thus, far as eye can reach, landward and seaward, man is taking Nature's bounty in the shimmering September sunlight, and the whole landscape gathers meaning of human endeavour and success.

The book is full of a Norfolk man's feeling and spirit, though much of what is written is descriptive of life anywhere in England in the country and by the sea.

FAITH IN EXPERIENCE.*

THIS little book by the translator of Herrmann's "Communion with God" is written from the conviction that the great religious need of the present time is intellectual. Our modern "apostates" must be won back to Christianity by an intellectual justification of it. "The ultimately spiritual nature of all things" must be demonstrated, men must be made aware that "as a simple matter of fact" they live and move in an "Eternal Will." The author offers his brief pages as a modest contribution to this end.

Experience is our one source of certainty. Knowledge of reality, therefore, must be established by an analysis of experience. The writer's analysis is determined by the central position he assigns to the will. "The existence of the will must be presupposed if we are to have even the simplest of certainties." The reality of the world and of ourselves, and of the Universal Force which is manifested in both, consists in the relation which they bear, not to our intellect, but to our will. This Universal Force is held to present all the characteristics of a Will. The activity of our will always takes the form of motion, and therefore the will is ultimately of the same nature as force. On the other hand, the will is limited, and limited by force—that is to say, opposed by it; and as the nature of opposites is one, it follows that the force opposing must be of the nature of will. Moreover, this force, which limits human wills and must itself be interpreted as will, is a unity inasmuch as all its manifestations are alike in principle. We are justified in "regarding all that happens around us to be ultimately the expression of a single Will."

The remainder of the discussion, which deals with the revelation of the character of this Will, is mainly theological. The same method is taken. Facts of experience are examined, and it is argued that their correct interpretation coincides with the teaching of Jesus. "The theology of Jesus may be taken as the justification of our own." This does not, however, exhaust the writer's view of our relation to Jesus. While in our simple endeavour to explain experience we reach certain conclusions respecting the Divine Character, which are at one with the Gospel of Jesus, a further study of experience reveals the fact that it is the influence of Jesus upon us that has enabled us to interpret the facts of experience after this manner. "Whatever of truth there is in our theology must be ascribed to Jesus." Mr. Stanyon does not pretend to do more than sketch outlines and lay down principles. In spite of the very condensed form in which much of the argument has to appear, the style is clear throughout and well suited to the purpose of the book. We have no doubt that there are many who will find it very helpful and suggestive.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Work of the Prophets, by Rose E. Selfe, is a well-written little book, and should prove helpful to other parents and teachers besides those belonging to the Church of England, for whose use it is specially intended. The various prophets from "Amos the Herdsman" onward are vividly characteristed, though occasionally the writer seems to us to ascribe to them a kind of foresight they did not possess, and to lend herself too easily to traditional interpretations of their utterances. In questions of date and authorship she relies on the results of criticism. She manifests throughout a keen sense of the ethical significance of the prophetic teaching. "True religion," she says, "makes people just and kind and merciful. Outward observances are good if they help us to be good. The more you read of the prophets the more you will feel that this was what God taught through them." (Longmans. 2s. 6d. net.)

REVIVALISM.

"NOT as in my presence only, but much more in my absence." St. Paul had a wholesome fear of religious stimulus. He saw a possibility of danger even in personal influence. He desired in the Christian congregation a spirit of self-reliance, or, if of dependence, the dependence of mutual support. Speaking in a tongue he recognised, but prophesying he commended, as a sober power in all, by which all might be edified. He was even doubtful whether his own too constant presence might not be a disadvantage. "Not as in my presence only, but much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling." What would he say of the prominence and importance now given to personal guidance and leadership in spiritual things?

It is from this point of view that the stimulating efforts of revivalism may be judged. Granted that awakening appeals may sometimes be necessary to arouse the indifferent, to alarm the self-confident, and even to counteract the deadening effect of custom, it may still be doubted whether revival, as now understood, is the form they should take To work out salvation is one thing, to work it up is another. The present idea seems to be that a crowd should be acted on, in order that it may presently act upon itself. To do this, it must be brought to a certain pitch of excitement. The action of a crowd cannot be gathered psychologically from anything that is known about the action of individuals. It has a consciousness of its own. It will laugh, or sing, or cry, or be convulsed, show courage or fear, beyond the range of any personal experience included in it. Set in motion, it sways and swings of itself. And the thing to be noted is that its movement is mainly the movement of those primary instincts which lie at the base of human excitability. A crowd cannot think; it does not always know; sometimes it does not even care to know. It will laugh at the sound of its own laughter, weep at the sight of its own tears, be emboldened or panic-stricken as chance may decide, and in each of these cases be ignorant of the cause. The imitative instinct, strong in animal nature, and hitherto, perhaps, kept strongly under control, is suddenly liberated. The questions, then, at once occur: Does the revivalist, as a fisher of men, catch them at their best when he catches them in a crowd? Are they then quite rational, and quite responsible? If they are strung up to the expectation of the unexpected, is it any wonder if the unexpected happens? Is this an atmosphere in which conviction can be thorough, and resolution deliberate? Is it thus that in other matters deserving serious attention we "persuade" men?

There is the objection, also, that the action which is to tell on a crowd must be itself on a large and extravagant scale. To make an impression, you must produce a sensation. There are people now, it would seem, who cannot hear the voice of duty unless it is thundered forth in some overpowering way; the old message must be set to a new accompaniment; and the further question presents itself, Is the revivalist himself at his best when he plays on emotion by commotion? Are strain and vehemence the notes of serviceable ministry, or even of becoming address? And what will he do when noise and novelty have ceased to charm? Sensation may be repeated, but nothing will prevent sense from growing dull.

The voice of duty is a still small voice. It is a voice of admonition. It has been spoken by prophets, apostles, evangelists, pastors, preachers, heralds, ambassadors, moralists, reformers. Their sound is gone out into all lands. It is taken up and re-echoed by parent and teacher and leader and friend. If they hear not these, I am tempted to say, neither will they be persuaded, though one shook the earth itself with deafening roar.

I cannot find that St. Paul ever thought of popular religion as a thing apart. Even in excitable Corinth the city treasurer worshipped with the city slave. We know from three other places in his writings what the Apostle meant by "fear and trembling." He meant the nervous anxiety of those who are eager to act, not the unmanly trepidation of those who are overcome by what they feel. It would be a lamentable thing if the method of salvation were not the same for rich and poor alike.

"JESUS SAITH."

IV.—THE SOUL'S SABBATH.

Jesus saith, "Except ye keep the Sabbath ye shall not see the Father."

THESE words are so unexpected in the mouth of Jesus, they are in such direct conflict with one of the best-accredited features of his teaching, as to suggest immediate doubts of their authenticity; the very term used for "keeping," literally "Sabbatising," the Sabbath is foreign to the New Testament—foreign, we feel, to its central figure. On the other hand, it is difficult to assume that even the most daring of manipulators would have placed upon Christ's lips a saying so easily recognisable as spurious. Can it be that we have here a genuine saying of the Master's intended to bear an allegorical meaning? If so, what meaning?

Any interpretation of the words must necessarily be conjectural; but it is at least not illegitimate to suppose that during his stay in the capital Jesus heard a good deal of this technical term of "Sabbatising the Sabbath," with much reiterated stress upon the all-importance of keeping the multitudinous prescriptions as to its right observance elaborated by generation after generation of rabbis. We can well imagine him listening to Scribes and Pharisees, arguing with abundant learning and subtlety that he who did not observe every one of these endless and minute regulations was guilty of deadly sin, and should be banished from the face of God; and, wearied by these barren disputations we can think of him thus pursuing and developing the theme in another key: "Yes, there is indeed a true Sabbath, which, if truly kept, does bring the soul into the very forecourts of eternal peace, close to the presence of God. But where shall that Sabbath be found, and who are they that partake of it? Not amid this barren babblement of mechanical performances and abstentions, surely. Where is the true Sabbath, O soul of man, which, unless the soul do keep, it shall by no means see the Father?"

Jesus never opposed, either by his teaching or example, the setting apart one day in seven for spiritual worship; but he was acutely aware of the danger of a dividing line being drawn between the one day and the other six, making the Sabbath the day, pre-eminently, of observance, and the others days of comparative non-observance. This danger, though not always arising in so sharply discernible a form, is yet a very real one; it is the temptation, in a very typical form, of that divided life of which we spoke already. If men do not attempt, with open eyes, to strike some compromise enabling them to fulfil their obligations towards God while following their own bent in so-called secular matters, there is yet nothing more familiar to the observer than the spectacle of a man's real, though ineffectual, striving for better things, counteracted and overborne by the lures and snares of the world. Such a one desires—with what anguish, what hot tears, what bitter shames!—to "keep" the Sabbath in the higher sense, to surrender, i.e., heart and soul and mind to the blessed and tranquillising influence of God; yet when he would fix his gaze upon the Father, and in His light would see light, he can behold nothing but the flickering, torturing, iridescent ignis fatuus of his wayward desires. He cannot "keep the Sabbath" because he cannot bring his daily life into harmony with his intermittent ideals. One thinks at once of the classical and extreme instance of this tragedy of the divided life, the cry "I myself with the mind serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin"—an appalling conclusion, and pardonable only to a mind temporarily bordering upon distraction! Such divided service is essentially and inherently impossible; let us understand that by repeated and habitual unfaithfulness to what we acknowledge to be right in the Sabbath mood, we are creating between ourselves and God a gulf which nothing save a miracle of grace may avail, at long last, and after who can tell what sorrows, to bridge over.

The object of the true Sabbath should be no other than the hallowing of all time and all existence; it should be to generate influences and determinations which will go far beyond the hour that gave them birth; it should make us see the Father, not in the stillness of the hour of worship only, but in the activities, the struggles, the joys, and sufferings of the life that now is. So, then, to Sabbatise the Sabbath, if we may transpose the phrase from the dialect of an epoch into the universal idiom, is nothing less than to make religion real, overflowing the prosaic dykes, transcending the narrow boundaries whch would confine it to the performance of ceremonial devotions, the recital of formularies, or even the theoretical acknowledgment of the beauty of holiness.

Moreover, is not the Jewish Sabbath, with its meagre ideal of a temporary surcease from manual toil, only a symbol expressive of man's perennial aspiration, however dimly realised by himself—ideal rest and peace in God? As the true Sabbath truly kept will consecrate all our powers to God's service, so it will fill us with a spiritual restfulness which will not remain confined to the one day, but flood all days, yea, all our life. We shall face the unquietness and tumult of the world, its anxieties and temptations, its threats and show, its bids and scorns, with a Sabbath peace in our hearts. If we have indeed made the Most High our habitation we shall not be afraid of evil tidings. There may be storm and vicissitude, cataclysm and upheaval without; but in the soul of the godly it is Sabbath always.

Jesus saith, "Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time, Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy; in it thou shalt do no manner of work. But I say unto you, So keep the Sabbath that it may be to you, not the cessation from labour only, but a beginning rather of holy energies, a consecration of life, a vision of the Father, a fountain of which he that drinketh shall know no baser thirst, a calm and healing breath blown from eternity upon the fevered brows of time. O ye afflicted and beset with dragging cares and turbulent desires and mocking dreams and tear-dimmed memories, hope, for the day of the Lord is at hand. Not a day of loud rejoicings and jubilant triumph and exultant cries of ecstasy; but the day of the Lord is a Sabbath day, when the sin that stained and the burden that oppressed will stain and oppress no longer. and every tear shall be wiped away, and every hurt be healed, and humanity—tired and fretful child—be hushed to rest against the brooding, loving heart of God."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN

THE ENCHANTRESS.

LONG, long ago, when God was making the world, after the foundations were laid and His masons had built up the walls, after the beams of the roof were fixed and the dome completed, He sought from among the Spirits who served Him an artificer who should adorn it and make it a beautiful abode for His creatures, and such as would remind them of Him. First arose Vulcan, Master of Fire, a Titan, who lay slumbering in a vast cavern below the earth, and when he came forth his tread shook the wilderness. He betook him to his forge, where he welded the iron on his anvil with ringing blows which resounded against the vault of the heavens. He piled the mountains to the sky, and hammered and wrought their surface into the shape of the Hand of God spread out and grasping the world, even as a pomegranate in the hand of a man, so that all who beheld might think of Him who is the Upholder. Then God said the work of the Master of Fire was good and great in the sight of the angels and archangels; yet withal it sufficed not, for the tender green things that were coming would be struck dumb with amazement, and lack comfort, and die smitten with parching thirst.

Then rose another mighty Power from the sea, and offered to perfect the work that was thus begun, and vouched that he would provide that no living creature should need to die of thirst. And God said, Yea, and he went. He ascended to the summits of the mountains which the Master of Fire had built, and there began his labours. He swept down their sides in an irresistible flood, planing off the fearful jagged rocks, and graving the smooth surface with strange rifts and characters; then, carrying away in his mighty hands all the dust and chippings of his sculpture, he cast them into the valleys, filling up their depressions until they were like level lakes of soil in which herb and tree might grow. Thus wrought Aquarius, the Master of the Waters, and when he had finished, the pattern on the level branching plain portrayed the open Hand of God the Giver.

Then God said that it was good, but that it sufficed not, for that the homes of His children would not be safe on the banks of the masterful rivers, and their hearts would quail at the thunder of the mighty waters.

And now, to amend the labours of his brother artificers shone Sol from the arch of the heavens with all the fervour of his light and heat. The grim, colossal deeds of the earth-giants glowed in his beams, both the Grasping Hand on the mountains and the Open Hand on the plains, whereat Sol rejoiced at his triumph.

And God said that it was good, but that the eyes of his children must needs be made of agate to withstand the excessive splendour. And He waited still for the skilful artificer who could perfect the House of Life. He waited, and no one could be found to do this needful service; but at length, at the breaking of the day there appeared on the face of the waters a womanly figure of mist, which crept to the feet of the mountains, and spread a grey veil abroad to mitigate the blinding glory of the sun, as a mother does to shield the eyes of her sleeping child. Behind her flowed an endless robe of rainbow colours, and the rod of the rain was in her right hand and the harp of the winds in her left. Now, she wrought not with tools of hand, but by touch or word as a magician. "I will adorn thine earth, Lord God," said she; "and make it comely as a garden and a place of healthful toil and blessed rest for all Thy children for ever. The tender green thing shall not fear to live, and the hearts of the feeble shall not be oppressed. The very butterflies shall be safe in their day, yet heroes shall shout in the battle by reason of the strong breath of my soul within them. And the Lord said, Yea. And she went forth and wrought after the Masters of Fire and Water, and Sunlight. She plaited a soft blue shoulder-cloth and wrapped it round the mountains to make them look kindlier; she taught the great waters to whisper, and invented the lesser rain; she unravelled the stiff, black shadows, and sent them like breath through the trees, and forthwith, amid a hundred glad, fresh scenes the host of the Children of God appeared. The lizards crept out on the sunny rocks, and clouds of birds beat up on the wind, and the shooting seeds covered the plains with grass, and the thirst-scorched hills drank deep of the rain, and the ploughman whistled to his team down the furrow; and pink-blossomed orchards gave promise of fruit, and vineyard and olive yard yielded their crops, and barley and wheat harvest summoned the reaper, and mariners hoisted their sails and put out on to the deep. Thus, through all the four seasons wrought this spirit, singing to the joys and industries of the Children of the Earth, and painting throughout a picture which, fading ever, was ever renewed—a picture of light on the mountain, a picture of life on the plain. But it was another design than that which the spirits of fire and water had wrought, for as the sunbeams fell across it, behold, the pattern of the Heart of God!

Then did God pronounce the work to be very good, for the earth was now made fit, alike by summer and winter, to be the house of Life. And He appointed that skilful spirit to remain on the earth evermore to encourage the healthful labours of His children, and to remind them by the sign of the heart of His goodwill to them all. Such was His behest to the great Enchantress, whose name no man knows, but whom we call The Weather.

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BRAHMO SAMAJ.

ON Saturday and Sunday last a little company of Brahmos, together with a few English friends, met together in Essex Hall to celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Brahmo Samaj of India. The meeting on Saturday evening opened with a brief devotional service by Mr. B. C. GHOSH, M.A., who afterwards gave an address on "The Relation of Religion to Morality," which was followed by discussion. It was their custom, he said, always to devote some time at their anniversaries to such discussion of fundamental questions of religious life. On Sunday morning religious service was held, conducted by Mr. V. A. SUKHTANKAR, B.A., the Indian student at present at Manchester College, Oxford, and in the afternoon a conference was held, over which the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE presided, when Mr. B. C. GHOSH gave an address on "Unitarianism and the Brahmo Samaj." At this meeting a resolution was passed, on the motion of Professor P. C. RAY, of the Presidency College, Calcutta, gratefully acknowledging the sympathy and help extended by the Unitarians of this country to the members of the Brahmo Samaj, and another resolution commemorating the late Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, and acknowledging how deeply earnest religious thinkers in India were indebted to him for his book, "God and the Soul." The celebration was concluded with a further religious service after tea.

"It was, as we have said, only a little company that came together for this simple, unostentatious commemoration in London, but to them also the old saying may be truly applied, that "where two or three are met together" in the name of a great ideal, there the holy, quickening Spirit will be in their midst. And the thoughts of this little knot of friends in a distant land doubtless travelled, as they communed together, to their own country, where, during the past weeks, greater gatherings have been held, in Calcutta, beginning on Saturday, January 14, and concluding on that same Sunday on which they were met. This greater celebration of the Brahmo Samaj, in the city of its birth, was marked by a variety of meetings, public and private, beginning with prayers in Brahmo families and students' lodges, and including various services of devotion, lectures and preaching, singing processions through the streets, and special meetings for women, while several institutions, educational and religious, connected with the Society, had their special annual meetings.

This is the great annual religious festival of our Indian brethren, similar in many ways to our Whitsuntide meetings, for the strengthening of the bonds of religious fellowship, and the renewal of consecration to the spiritual life of worship and service. The actual anniversary celebrated is that of the opening, on January 23, 1830, of the first House of Prayer for the members of the Brahmo Samaj in Calcutta. The Society itself, inaugurated by the RAJAH RAMMOHUN ROY, as a purely native Theistic movement, is somewhat older, dating from the first meeting, on August 28, 1828; but the anniversary of the opening of the first building is now generally observed as that of the Brahmo Samaj itself.

The trust deed of that building contains a notable declaration of the ideal of the Brahmo Samaj. It is dedicated to the worship of the One Eternal God, of whom no image may be tolerated, and in whose service no living thing may be sacrificed. No idolatrous observance may be permitted, but neither is any attack allowed in the teaching there upon the objects or modes of worship of any other people. In conducting worship nothing is to be allowed that has not "a tendency to the promotion of the contemplation of the Author and Preserver of the Universe, to the promotion of charity, morality, piety, benevolence, virtue, and the strengthening the bonds of union between men of all religious persuasions and creeds."

RAMMOHUN ROY died while on a visit to this country in 1833, and for a time the Theistic movement did not make great progress. Then arose a new leader of commanding personality in KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, and since his death there have been not a few faithful servants of the truth. Of unhappy divisions we do not speak here. When the late FLETCHER WILLIAMS was in India he had good hope of a new spirit of unity, and progressive religious life. Recently there have been signs of distinct progress in the movement, and not least among them the extended missionary tours of Mr. V. R. SHINDE and Mr. H. C. SARKAR, who were both formerly Brahmo students at Manchester College, Oxford, and whose career we watch with the deepest interest. May the bonds which unite us in spiritual worship of the Eternal, and in faithful service of all human needs, be continually strengthened, that both here and in India we may be found more faithful servants of the Truth.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED IN RUSSIA.

SUNDAY, January 22, is a day to be ever memorable in Russia's history, and sacred for the sake of its martyrs of humanity, the peaceful crowd of the workers of St. Petersburg who pressed towards the palace of the TSAR. They were animated with a faith which events falsified—faith in their tyrant. They went to present their claim of rights—to ask for redress of cruel wrongs—believing that the Little Father would receive it at their hands and answer them. They went, accompanied by their wives and children. The answer came, Suddenly, and without warning the savage massacre began. These men, these women, guilty of no crime save asking the right to live and the means of life, were charged and trampled and mangled by the troops. Some regiments, rumour tells us, refused the bloody work. To them all honour. In the spreading of that spirit of disobedience to evil commands lies hope. But sufficient troops were found for the slaughter, and the terrible work of repression was carried out. To the victims the world has offered a fierce pity, though indeed their doom is gentle compared with that of those who remain, and those who these many years have preceded them to death, exile, or to madness. But as those unarmed, unaggressive workers were mowed down before the Winter Palace another falling was taking place. In spite of all misery and misrule the Russian people have held an obstinate faith in the TSAR, who was to them half-divine. Throughout the length and breadth of the land the news of that Sunday's treachery will fly, and where it reaches the hearts of men it will change their thought till they speak no longer of their TSAR with veneration, but in words of execration. Misplaced trust in the throne has alone sufficed to maintain its despotism, and this trust is stricken to the death.

Yet only through many toils and sufferings can the people achieve its triumph. For a few days men thought of Revolution as the immediate issue, and of the speedy overturn of the autocracy. Already we are told of a St. Petersburg returned to its normal gaiety, of recalcitrant workmen returned to their accustomed servitude. And now comes the report of Wednesday's solemn farce, when the Tsar commanded a deputation of the workmen to his presence, and having reproved them for the crime of coming on Sunday week "as a rebel mob," to declare their wants, deceived by traitors and enemies of the Fatherland, told them that the massacre which followed was inevitable, and——pardoned their transgression! The strike movement, however, was no local rising; it has spread rapidly to the ancient capital and to the great towns of the empire, and in many places, especially in Poland, is still active and menacing. The massacre of January 22 repeats itself, if on a smaller scale, in all these centres. But it is already obvious that for the present the forces of oppression are in the ascendant. Popular movements are crushed, workmen are driven by cold and hunger back to their life of toil. There have been many strikes before this one, and they have been suppressed as this is being suppressed—for the moment.

We cannot believe, and we need not believe, that the events of last week will be forgotten or lost. We have witnessed a strike; but it is more than a strike. We behold the self-conscious uprising of a people. A great hope is come to life in Russia and in Europe, a mighty kindling of faith in the solidarity of the workers and of humanity. For what is perhaps of all most significant, is the union of ideas which too often have been kept separate. The movement in Russia is political and economic, aimed equally against imperialism, priesthood, and capitalism, demanding on the one hand freedom of thought and action, on the other the means of a humane livelihood. That Sunday massacre will weld these more indissolubly into one. Those thousands of proletarian victims do tragically voice the claims of the poorest. If we would not see our brethren cruelly done to death, we must care for it that the life they live be, indeed, worth human living.

These things seem to have come to pass in Russia—faith in the TSAR broken, faith in the people coming to its strength. But the effects are felt far beyond the limits of a single land. In London and throughout England the thrill of a great hope has come. This is equally true for Paris and for France. Cautious members of the ruling class may protest against describing the conduct of their ally as "inhuman"; but this hardly affects the chorus of shame which is everywhere rising up. It is true also for Rome and for Italy, although where the people demonstrate in sympathy with their Russian comrades they are dispersed by Italian troops. But that does not check the sympathy. In every nation it is the same; the people and their spiritual leaders, men eminent in literature, in science, in art, are aroused to enthusiasm for the sufferers and the strugglers in Russia. Public meetings are being held in the cities, and in private gatherings the needs of the Revolution are warmly canvassed. How many are the unknown towns throughout the world where little groups of men have kept the faith MAZZINI taught, and are banded together for mutual help, proud in possessing a banner inscribed with words of co-operation and fellowship. These banners they unfurl to-day; this faith they hold more radiantly clear. The voice of humanity has sounded, and the voice of humanity responds.

And because this is so, things cannot return to their old stagnation in Russia. The fight there is stern, and may be long. But the cause of Russia is the cause of Europe, and there are many ways in which the people of Europe can help their brethren in their need. Among these no way is more practical than augmenting those funds which are already being raised for the relief of the fallen and the support of the people. Material assistance is needed. It will be powerful chiefly as an expression of the growing sense of solidarity, a faith in that union which is forming, union first of all classes in Russia which are not parasitic and predatory, union further of nation with nation. This consciousness of the common humanity of the world's workers must confirm the people of Russia in their hard, glorious revolt against an effete and cruel despotism.

THE UNEMPLOYED.*

ONCE more this winter the regular numbers of the unemployed have been swollen to such an extent as to attract serious public attention to a problem never entirely absent from us, and frequently acute. Before me as I write is the report of the Commission of Inquiry into the subject of the unemployed held in Liverpool in 1894, and signed, among others, by our leader whom we have so recently lost, Richard A. Armstrong. And now, in 1904, the same breakdown of the industrial system, the same utter failure of the Poor Law is upon us, and to prevent wholesale starvation, urgent relief funds have to be hurriedly improvised, and the old temporary and unsatisfactory shelving of the difficulty has perforce to be adopted.

The pamphlets and articles named below have this in common: they are moderate, carefully argued attempts once more to formulate proposals which will permanently change the conditions which produce these recurring industrial crises, these failures of society to organise itself aright.

The number of men, women, and children already "in the coils of hunger and despair" Mr. Keir Hardie estimated in November last at 2,250,000. During December this number must have considerably increased. From 700,000 to 800,000 men able, and for the most part willing to work, were unable to find opportunity to produce the necessaries of life for themselves and their families, and to provide a surplus for others.

Side by side with this is the accepted fact that some ten million more of the population of Great Britain are existing without a sufficiency of the necessaries of life, which the labour of those at present unemployed might in some measure have assisted in providing.

Is it necessary further to dwell on the lamentable failure of industrial and economic arrangements which result in a deadlock, with such fearful consequences to human life and happiness? Mr. Hardie puts it very well:—

> They lack food and clothing, shelter for themselves and their children, they have the skill and the strength and the will to produce all this, but in all our wondrous civilisation no man has yet been found to tell us how capable, honest men may be assured of a livelihood in return for their work.

This estimate will probably be questioned by some who are disposed to say the difficulty is that these men have not the skill and the strength and the will sufficient, and that there lies the whole difficulty. This point is not dealt with at any great length in the pamphlets and articles in question except in the one by Mr. Benson. He points out, as regards one oft-repeated explanation of the cause of poverty and unemployment, drunkenness, that the percentage of unemployment owing to drink is estimated, according to Mr. Charles Booth, at 14 per cent., and in America at 11 per cent.; while the total percentage owing to personal misconduct is 18 per cent. in England, and 21 per cent. in America. And he proceeds:—

> If we admit that the unemployed, as a rule, are the least efficient part of the workers, it only removes the question one stage further back, and leads to the question, why are there so many inefficient? . . . When we consider that in London alone there are 316,000 in chronic want, and a million and a half whose earnings are below a guinea a week, it is matter for surprise that there are so few whose personal conduct is responsible for their state of unemployment.

Mr. Masterman in his article touches the same note:—

> It is alike grotesque and pitiful elaborately to produce with all the resources of civilisation a half-starved race, charged with some kind of vague mental culture, which can be guaranteed, with infallible prophecy, to develop into a menacing class in the future. . . . The vicious circle must somewhere be broken.

Without going further into the question in detail, it is at least certain that the conditions of life in most of our great cities, and the means at the disposal of quite one-third of the population, are so unfavourable, so insufficient, that the results of impaired efficiency, weakened frames, clouded intellects are inevitable.

Granted, then, for the time that the whole problem of unemployment is, as regards a very large part of it, the difficulty of finding work for those who are not quite as capable, as efficient, how best can the problem be solved, or if this is too much to look for, how can the existing state of things be best remedied?

The pamphlets and articles are almost at one in this respect. Mr. Keir Hardie points out very clearly the existing powers of the Guardians of the Poor, confirmed in 1893 by Sir Henry Fowler in the House of Commons, powers to purchase or rent land not exceeding 50 acres of land for each parish, to employ thereon, or to open workshops for, destitute able-bodied persons, and to pay such persons reasonable wages for their labour.

How few Boards of Guardians avail themselves of these powers? The ratepayers' influence is strong upon most of them, and even when they have shown desire to put these powers into force, the Local Government Board has often effectually put obstacles in the way. Yet what can be clearer than the intention of the Acts of Elizabeth and George III., that when the poor were unable to obtain work, work should be found for them; and the Act of Elizabeth says: "If you be found negligent, or shall fail to meet once a month to confer together for the purpose aforesaid, then you are to forfeit 20s. apiece for every month that you shall be found remiss or careless therein." The reason of such refusal is clear: not only would such use of land and opening of workshops interfere with existing interests of cultivators and manufacturers, but it would remove from the labour market the pressure of those seeking work, which is required to enable employers of labour to obtain these supplies of labour at a rate little above the actual cost of living.

Mr. Benson is most clear on this point. He quotes Mr. Charles Booth, who says: "Our modern system of industry will not work without some unemployed margin, some reserve of labour." And Mr. Benson goes on:—

> Unless the manufacturer and farmer have a number of unemployed to call on when trade becomes brisk, and an army of unemployed into which to discharge their workers when trade is slack, the prospect of making profit would be nil. It is the hunger and starvation of the workers which give the victory to the employer.

I am unable to follow Mr. Benson in the whole of his argument on this point (page 5). He claims that in the absence of any unemployed the workers could make their own terms; and "capital would cease to bear interest, and land would cease to earn rent." Surely not; because land and capital, being both essential to production, and necessary to labour, must, if they are to be used by labour, be remunerated. But Mr. Benson is right so far, that it is this surplus labour always seeking employment which enables land and capital to extort undue toll for their own use from labour. Reverse the conditions, and the power passes to labour. Now we can see why existing powers are not used by the Guardians of the Poor.

Mr. Keir Hardie and Mr. Masterman are alike in their desire to see a distinct Ministry of Labour. Mr. Keir Hardie says, "he would be expected to keep watch on the state of trade, and make the necessary arrangements for meeting a period of depression." "His department would suggest great national public works of utility requiring to be done." These would include reclamation of waste lands and foreshore, afforestation, building harbours of refuge, making new roads, and the like. Mr. Masterman uses almost the same language, and adds, "The fundamental qualification would be, that the work should be itself production, not the mere blind creation of a blind and random toil."

All these writers advocate the development of agricultural land by an increased employment of labour upon it, though Mr. Hardie, in his article in the Nineteenth Century, seems to consider labour colonies of doubtful value. His objections would, however, evidently be met by a differentiation in the type of colonies, and the labour which was sent to each.

Mr. Hardie enters at considerable length into the economic soundness of the scheme he advocates, details which are evidently well thought out, and moderately stated, and impress themselves upon the reader as sober estimates of possibilities. They cannot, however, be entered upon here. Both pamphlets advocate the adoption of eight hours as the statutory working day. Mr. Hardie estimates that such a reform in the carrying trades alone would mean the employment of 300,000 more men; and Mr. Benson, with ample warrant, states that "any permanent improvement of wages, hours of labour, in any trade, has always been followed by a marked improvement in the condition and habits of the worker."

Both Mr. Hardie and Mr. Masterman argue that the formation of a Labour Bureau, or, as the latter calls it, a Labour Reservoir, is an indispensable part of the arrangements necessary, and Mr. Keir Hardie strongly supports the creation of a new local authority to deal especially with those and similar duties, a departure, it seems to me, from true democratic principles in which I am unable to follow him. If the Guardians are, for various reasons, considered unsatisfactory, the additional powers granted to town, county, and district councils will add to the importance of these directly elected bodies, and ensure more public attention and greater efficiency.

Both pamphleteers are fully alive to the tremendous increase in the demand for necessaries, and consequently in the demand for labour which the improved conditions, the increased spending power on the part of so large an army of workers would necessarily bring—so that the problem would tend to solve itself, once started on the right lines. Space, however, forbids quotations on this point. I will close with a sentence from Mr. Masterman's article, which is amply enforced in both pamphlets:—

> The method must be national, dealing with the problem as a whole, combining local direction and initiative with a general attempt at solution, and the supervision of some central body. It must mean a firm grasp of the necessities of the problem, and a deliberate determination that the problem shall be solved.

If the people of this country are resolved that this firm grasp shall be taken, then the problem is already solved, for the means of solving it are amply before us in the documents considered.

RICHARD ROBINSON.

THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE'S MISSION TO AUSTRALASIA.

WELCOME HOME MEETING.

THE President and members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and many other friends, joined in giving a very cordial welcome to the Rev. Charles Hargrove, at a meeting held at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening. Mr. and Mrs. Hargrove reached home again, on the completion of his mission to the Unitarians of Australasia, on Saturday evening, Dec. 17, having returned by way of America, but the Association's meeting of welcome in London had naturally to wait until the paramount claims of Leeds had first been satisfied, and the Christmas season with its many home engagements was well over. Mr. Hargrove completed, in last week's INQUIRER, the series of twelve letters, in which he has given a record of his journey.

The meeting on Tuesday evening was in every way successful, and was greatly enjoyed. Essex Hall was well filled, and about the platform was decorated with palms and flowers. After an hour's conversazione the chair was taken by the President, the Right Hon. William Kenrick, who was accompanied on the platform by Mrs. Kenrick, Mr. and Mrs. Hargrove, Mrs. Russel Martineau, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe (ex-President), and other members of the Executive. Letters expressing regret at their inability to attend had been received from the following:—Sir J. T. Brunner, Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, Messrs. James Beale, E. Clephan, T. Grosvenor Lee, G. H. Leigh, F. M. Lupton (Chairman of the Mill Hill Chapel Trustees), Basil Martineau, and John Warren, the Rev. James Harwood (Chairman of the Foreign Mission Sub-Committee), and many others.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, said that he was probably a stranger to many of those present, but he was not a stranger to that place. He remembered being there many years ago, and the preaching of the Rev. Thomas Madge. The structure had indeed been altered, but doubtless the principles these maintained were the same. They were met to congratulate Mr. Hargrove on his safe return, and he moved the following resolution of welcome:—

> That this meeting of Unitarians cordially welcomes the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., on his return from his tour in Australasia, a tour which we hope and believe will prove of permanent value in binding us and our Colonial brethren in closer ties of fellowship, and in more effective work for the cause we hold dear.
> Congratulating ourselves, and the congregation of Mill Hill, Leeds, on the safe return of their beloved minister, we especially beg to thank the congregation for kindly consenting to his absence from them during so long a period.

The position of their body, Mr. Hargrove would no doubt tell them, was not different in Australia from what it was in this country. They were always a small minority, and as they believed they held the truth, that was not altogether satisfactory. If they asked for the reason, it was, he thought, partly because the corruptions of Christianity were so closely woven in with the truth that to separate the threads was a matter of no little difficulty; it had occupied, and would occupy, a long time. Then he said, and he believed it was true—Mr. Augustus Birrell said it the other day—that there were as many Unitarians outside the body as within its ranks. And if they asked why those people did not openly join them, he should say that the force of old associations would account for much; and perhaps their puritanical system of worship did not attract people. Coleridge said they did not win heaven by logic, nor was religion fostered altogether by logic, but by the emotions, and his own view was that they had too much neglected music and the arts by which emotion is expressed. But the main reason, after all, though it might seem paradoxical, was, he thought, that questions of dogma had lost their importance. Where people found the spirit of religion in the old Church, they were content still to worship there. It could, indeed, be only a provisional arrangement. Sooner or later they must come out, or change the church in which they remained.

There were many signs in the world of religious thought of progress towards that end. It was not a time of religious indifference, but of anxious inquiry, of courageous thought and outspoken words—of fear and retrogression, indeed, on one side, but not a time in which people accepted conventional ideas of old and worn-out formulæ. They could recognise this in reading the daily press, and as one piece of weighty evidence he cited the great influence and success of the Hibbert Journal, of which the circulation had steadily increased, and which drew its articles from widely different sources. There was no topic of religious thought that was not boldly and reverently discussed in its pages, as thoughts of diverse men connected with diverse religious communions found an opportunity of giving them expression.

Mr. Kenrick then cited a number of titles of articles which appeared in the Hibbert, as showing how wide the area of discussion was. He believed in such discussion carried on temperately and gravely, and held that the result would be a common term of agreement. The dream of a universal Christian Church had been entertained by saintly men of every age, and among them by Dr. Martineau. They would be glad to hear from Mr. Hargrove what indications of progress he had found on the other side of the world.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. W. ARTHUR SHARPE, and very cordially passed.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, in responding, gave a delightful address, full of interesting narrative and not a little humour, which exactly suited the occasion and the temper of his audience. A map of Australasia had been hung at the back of the platform, and on this he was able to point out the course of his journey, while he re-told some of the story more fully recorded in the first ten of his letters in THE INQUIRER. It was very difficult, he said, to know what to say on that occasion. He was like a man who had swallowed a cyclopædia, and was suffering from indigestion. He should be glad some time to give lectures on the several countries he had visited, but that evening he must speak especially of his mission as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. It was no small honour to travel through the Colonies as representative of the Unitarian body, and everywhere he had been received with the warmest welcome on that account.

Before proceeding with his narrative he could not refrain from alluding to one who, he said, was first, and rightly first, thought of for that mission, one with special ability, not only as a preacher, but as an exponent of high religion, which would have given his thought great weight wherever he went. They must be thankful that Mr. Armstrong did not go, since, as they now saw, he might have died out there far from all his friends.

Mr. Hargrove then told of various experiences in his journey, from the first landing at Fremantle, for Perth, in Western Australia (the land of "Wait Awhile," as they themselves confessed), through his visits to Adelaide and Melbourne, to Launceston and Hobart in Tasmania, and thence to Sydney and Brisbane, and from Sydney to New Zealand. Then he told of our Church at Auckland, and what he found at Wellington, Christchurch, and Dunedin, and then of his final departure from Auckland, on the way home.

Speaking of his lecturing and preaching, he said he was afraid that people were constantly disappointed, because there, as in America, they were like the Athenians, constantly eager for some new thing; and he had nothing new, no new revelation or discovery, to take to them. He had simply declared the old truths of religion, as he believed it was in the teaching of Jesus himself, and that was not sufficiently exciting or attractive for the people. Everywhere he had met theosophists and spiritualists; but while he could not object to their presence, and did not attack them, for he had not gone out to preach against them any more than against Trinitarians, they were not to be relied on as supporters of a Unitarian Church.

Of Adelaide Mr. Hargrove spoke with a special warmth of gratitude. The church there seemed to him most like home, like one of their old-established congregations, and it was delightful to see so many young people in the congregation. They were happy in their minister, the Rev. John Reid, and in the presence of the venerable Rev. J. C. Woods, who had been the first minister of their church. It was due to the friends at Adelaide to gratefully record their generous and warm-hearted hospitality, which had been extended beyond their own borders, insisting on paying the expense of Mr. and Mrs. Hargrove's stay at Perth, and giving them their tickets to Melbourne, with first-class sleeping berths on the train.

At Melbourne the church was not so prosperous as at Adelaide, though it had a fine position in the city and in the congregation was Mr. Henry Giles Turner, who had been for more than fifty years in Melbourne, prominent in good works. His "History of Victoria," just published in two volumes, would be the standard work on the subject. The chief obstacle to success in Melbourne was not bigotry, but religious indifference; but it was a testimony to the respect that the Rev. R. H. Lambley had won in the city that he was able to secure so representative a platform for the welcome meeting. There, side by side, were leading Presbyterian and Congregational ministers, and Dr. Strong, of the Australian Church. Dr. Rentoul, the Presbyterian, had been formerly the leader of the orthodox party in driving Dr. Strong from the body, but on that occasion he told Dr. Strong that he repented of what he then did, and he joined cordially in the welcome to the representative of the Unitarian Association.

Sydney, Mr. Hargrove thought, might benefit more than any of the churches by a little sympathy and support from home. The congregation had had great troubles, for which he believed that the Rev. George Walters had been in no way to blame. He was working there in isolation with great devotion, doing, in his opinion, the best a man could do. They had a debt of £600, which they were trying to meet by a bazaar, and for this they appealed for help. He hoped that friends in England would help, and thus show their sympathy.

At Hobart, in Tasmania, and at Wellington, in New Zealand, he thought the time was ripe for sending out a minister, if the right man in each case could be found. They were greatly encouraged by the example of Auckland, where the Unitarian Church had been established only some four years ago, and, under the vigorous leadership of the Rev. W. Jellie, had now of its own accord declared itself independent. If only some of their aided churches at home could be touched by that spirit! They were by no means a wealthy people at Auckland—there was not a carriage in the congregation—but they were thoroughly in earnest. There, as at Adelaide, they had been received with the warmest and most generous hospitality, and when they left they felt that they were parting from dear friends.

Speaking, in conclusion, of the needs of the churches in the Colonies, Mr. Hargrove said there was a good deal of talk about bringing the Colonies nearer; and whatever might be their opinion on the measures to be adopted, they were all at one in the desire to keep their mighty Empire united. They would be doing something if they could bind the Unitarians of the Colonies more closely to the Unitarians of England, just as it was with their friends in America. The first need was that they English Unitarians should recognise that there were Unitarians in the Colonies, with the same faith, and the same difficulties as they themselves had to face; and, secondly, that they should give all the encouragement they could to the societies founded out there. It would be a great thing if they could get over the extraordinary sacerdotalism from which they suffered, in the idea that every little society must have a minister—and that if they could not get a minister, "they would have no one." Why should not a few people meet together, and if no one of them felt able to preach, then simply read a sermon, as Dr. Priestley recommended so earnestly more than a hundred years ago? As to what they asked, they would like a yearly visit from this country, but that of course was impossible; yet he hoped that occasionally some representative of the Unitarians at home might be sent out. Then they wanted ministers for Wellington and Hobart, and they wanted sympathy and help at Sydney, for that debt of £600. The test of his visit, whether it had been worth while, would be in the faith and hope which came of it. The committee of Manchester College, he noticed, at the recent annual meeting, renewed the appeal often made, for men for the ministry; he never believed in the want of money; it came, if there was the heart behind; but if there was lack of faith and earnestness it was no use talking about ministers. Who would want to be a minister, or give his sons to the ministry of a body only half in earnest? He was struck during his journey with the difference of their body from others, in that they had no missionaries. Yet they believed they had the truth, the simplest, truest form of Christianity. Ought they not to send missionaries of that truth to those who need it? Their need was of ministers, men of faith, brave men, with capacity for work. There were plenty of such men in England. Why could they not be got for the ministry? That was the gravest question at the present moment for England and the Colonies alike. If he could turn the attention of their whole body to that question, why they had not what they needed, earnest, devoted men sufficient for that great work, his mission would be well repayed to them, and through them to the Colonies.

At the conclusion of Mr. Hargrove's address, a cordial vote of thanks, moved by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, and seconded by Mr. H. CHATFEILD CLARKE, was passed to him and to the President, and the meeting was brought to a close.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual business meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Tuesday afternoon. In the absence of the President, Mr. J. R. Beard, through illness, Lieut.-Colonel Pilcher occupied the chair.

The report gave a full account of last year's celebration of the Jubilee of the College, recounting the growth of the movement, and the successful effort to secure a residence in Victoria Park, for the purchase and endowment of which it is hoped that £20,000 will be raised. An eloquent passage from the jubilee sermon of the Rev. J. C. Street, on the ideal of the College, was also included in the report. As to the Fund and the Residence the report said:—

"The Fund now reaches the sum of £12,500, contributed by upwards of 700 subscribers. Satisfactory as the Committee feel this to be in view of the difficult position they have to face, much yet remains to be done before the desired result is reached. The number of subscribers to the fund represents but a small proportion of the membership of the churches for which the College works, and to all who have not yet responded, the Committee appeal for assistance in carrying into effect an object which has the strongest claims to support.

"Since its foundation 196 students have been trained for the ministry of the Unitarian and other non-subscribing churches by this College, of whom 99 are now in active ministerial work. Its intellectual status is recognised by its inclusion among the colleges connected with the Theological Faculty of the University of Manchester. To the past work of the College, accomplished under conditions of inadquate accommodation, and with means which have required the utmost economy in administration, the Committee point, as at once the best justification of the present appeal, and the best guarantee for the future usefulness of the College.

"The Committee, with the assistance of their architects, Messrs. W. and G. Higginbottom, of Manchester, have made a careful examination of the newly acquired premises in Victoria Park. They are glad to be able to report that, though the cost of sanitary rearrangements and general repairs and equipment will necessarily be substantial, the house is so well adapted for collegiate and residential purposes, that very slight structural alteration will be required. The Committee are informed that there is considerable demand for residential accommodation for lay students attending classes at Owens College, and they hope to be able to provide such accommodation for a small number of lay students Much remains to be done before the College can enter into occupation of the new premises, but it is hoped that this event may take place in time for the commencement of the next session."

The report recorded the settlement of Mr. Simon Jones, B.A., at Pontypridd, on the completion of his course last June, and gave the following list of the present students of the College:—

Theological Senior: H. McLachlan, B.A.; Theological Junior: Edward Thackray, B.A.; At Owens College: Edward Morgan, Walter Short, Wm. McMullan, Samuel Evans Bowen, Wm. Thomas Davies, Albert Victor Grayson. Felix Holt, B.A. (Tate Scholar), is studying at Manchester College, Oxford.

The following is the conclusion of the report:—

The Treasurer's Accounts for the year show that the income from all sources has been £1,210 3s. 7d., a decrease of £62 4s. 11d., as compared with the previous year. The Capital Account stands at £11,944 19s. 7d., as compared with £11,872 14s. 1d. the previous year, an increase of £72 5s. 6d. The Subscription List loses, through death, yearly subscriptions amounting to £15 18s, while new and increased subscriptions amount to £5 11s., a loss of £10 7s.

In view of the Jubilee Memorial Scheme to provide the College with a home of its own, the Committee consider an increase in the number of subscribers and the subscription income as of the utmost importance, and they are glad to note that some subscribers have already anticipated this necessity by increasing their subscriptions. They take this opportunity to urge all subscribers to assist in the work to the full extent of their power.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, said he had been a member of the Committee for thirty years, and through the whole of that period he had keenly felt the serious disadvantages under which the students laboured through having no adequate collegiate premises. He was therefore prepared to sympathise with the suggestion made by over 100 of the alumni that the Jubilee celebration should take the form of a Hall of Residence. He thought that the College should be put on the same level as the other Nonconformist Colleges of Manchester, and that its equipment should be adequate in view of its relation to the Free Faculty of Theology at the Victoria University of Manchester. The reception which the scheme at once received from the hands of friends showed that it met with the approval of the vast majority of Unitarians in various parts of the country. There was reason to hope that when the College was established at Summerville, surrounded by healthy conditions, and in close connection with Owens College, there would be an accession of students. Already they were hearing of parents who were directing the training of their sons with a view to their entering the College.

The Rev. J. H. BIBBY seconded the resolution, and spoke of the great enthusiasm there was in Ireland for the College Jubilee scheme. About one-fourth of the whole sum thus far subscribed came from Ireland, where the people felt a great indebtedness to the College.

The Rev. C. C. COE, F.R.G.S., was elected President of the College for the ensuing year, and then took the chair. In his address he expressed profound sympathy with the work in which the College was engaged. He thought it demanded an adequate status among the other educational institutions in Manchester, and that students should be enabled to pursue their studies under healthy conditions. He controverted the arguments which are sometimes put forward to deter young men from entering the ministry. The great need of our congregations is that ministers should present to them something more than criticism and unbelief, which have a disintegrating effect. It is of importance that ministers should have deep personal conviction, and that they should be able to express them clearly and with earnestness. He said there was such a thing as over cultivating the right of individual judgment; what our Churches needed instead was a union of sentiment, feeling and action, a minimising of caste, and a bringing of the members more closely together. He hoped the College would turn out such men. As to the raising of the £20,000 required, it would be one of the greatest joys of his life if, during his year of office, it could be achieved. It will be a monument to the memory of those men of the past to whom they owed the College; it would be a proof of the great enthusiasm and generosity of its present supporters, and it would prove a noble legacy to the future.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH announced that up to date 836 subscribers had paid or promised £12,662 14s. 8½d., of which sum the past and present students had contributed £1,005 3s.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON moved the reappointment of the Special Jubilee Committee. He heartily supported the movement for a College residence. He had been sceptical at first, but he was now convinced of its desirability. Three points weighed most with him. (1) The character of the men who had passed through the College, of whom some were his personal and valued friends; (2) the intellectual and industrial atmosphere of Manchester was important for the training of ministers, and contact with its phases of life and thought would prove useful to them in their future work; (3) the Free Faculty of Theology at Manchester University made such a College necessary. He was an earnest, consistent supporter of both Colleges, and he trusted that out of recent misunderstandings a better feeling and closer co-operation would arise.

The Rev. W. E. GEORGE seconded,

Mr. W. H. TALBOT moved, and Rev. C. PEACH seconded, the following resolution :—

That this Meeting records its warmest thanks to James R. Beard, Esq., for the invaluable services he has rendered to this College, not only as President during the past year, but throughout his long association with the Institution as Treasurer and member of the Committee ; and that this Meeting, deeply regretting that ill-health has rendered it necessary for him to abstain at present from work and participation in public affairs, desires to express its earnest hope for his recovery of health and strength during the coming year.

Thanks also were accorded to Rev. C. C. Coe and Col. Pilcher for their occupancy of the chair.

RELIGIOUS FORCES OF THE METROPOLIS.

I.—CANON HENSON AT ST. MARGARET'S.

A RARE and not unwelcome Sabbath's leisure presented an opportunity of hearing a new voice, tasting a new companionship in worship, and breathing an atmosphere of association and tradition perhaps more stimulating, because less familiar, than the habitual. So on Sunday week I made my way through streets emptied of their week-day crowds to the ancient and famous church of St. Margaret's, Westminster. Dwarfed by its vicinity to the stately Abbey, this church is in itself not insignificant ; more full, indeed (it has been claimed) of interesting history than any parish church in England; reviving memories of Caxton, Raleigh, Admiral Blake, Milton, and many another ancient worthy, and standing in a relation to the Mother of Parliaments which gives it a dignity and importance all its own.

The pulpit, so long held by Canon Farrar, is now occupied by Canon Hensley Henson; and it was to hear this reputed enfant terrible of Anglicanism that I joined the throng of worshippers who—to the number, I should guess, of some 700 or 800—filled every available seat. The accustomed morning prayer was followed by the Litany; the music was pleasing and adequate and not too obtrusive ; one at least of the hymns—the popular "Jesus, lover of my soul," was sung feelingly by a large number of the congregation (including many men), in common with the choir; finally, Canon Henson ascended the pulpit, and announced as his text Romans xii. 9 : "Let love be without hypocrisy."

It was a tall, almost youthful, figure, with smooth black hair and thin, clean-shaven face, the head small, the attitude erect, that stood surveying the worshippers with an almost aggressive nonchalance and self-confidence. The face, voice, and manner are without special distinction; the sermon is read from a manuscript with a total absence of gesture or declamation; yet the words fall clear and sharp upon the ear, and there is the force of an acute personality behind them which compels attention. With no elaborate introduction or culminating peroration, with none of the literary allusions or bursts of rhetoric to which this church must once have grown accustomed, the preacher plunges at once into his subject with uncompromising simplicity and directness.

Sincerity and truthfulness of heart (he begins) are the keynotes of genuine Christianity. Jesus was full of contempt for all merely formal or conventional piety. So, too, as this chapter from Romans showed—was St. Paul. All gifts must be used thoroughly, and without dissimulation. The ruler needs diligence, the giver liberality; he who shows mercy must do so with cheerfulness, not grudgingly. Practice must go with profession, deed with word. Love must be "without hypocrisy." Next it was to be noted that "hypocrisy was the peculiar parasite of religion." It was sad to think that the very name "ecclesiastic" was tainted with the idea of diplomacy and insincerity. The Pharisees were the religious leaders of Christ's day, and against them Jesus launched the keenest shafts of his denunciation. "Woe unto you!" Their religion was compatible with cruelty, bigotry, and hardness of heart. Jesus, like the "word of God," pierced through these pretences, and separated, as with a sharp sword, the inward motive and intention from the outward mask. To-day we see the spectacle of a society which is nominally Christian, but not yet sincerely so. Was not St. James's rebuke to its selfishness deserved? It is not sentimentality that is needed (continued the preacher), but rather truthfulness. There is no real conflict between love and justice, pity and goodness, mercy and virtue. When Jesus was confronted with the problem of the Magdalen, he exhibited, as ever, an uncompromising attitude to all vice and sin, combined with a tender, yet piercing insight into motive, inner conflict, and aspiration. So it must always be when life is lived on a level with the outward profession. Usually, the level of our life is lower than the level of our claim. Yet Christian love is a love that must be "without hypocrisy."

Such, in brief outline, was the sermon—a sermon containing no word of explicit theological doctine, but going to the roots of conduct and life, Unadorned and without "padding," it was an excellent discourse, pithy, practical, and helpful; made memorable by the eloquence of simple truth, and the assenting commentary of inward experience.

Canon Hensley Henson is one of the most courageous and outspoken of the small but always select Broad Church section of the Anglican communion. As I left the church I asked myself, Is the plea of the Broad Churchmen ever likely to be admissible, when judged by a tribunal of plain Englishmen, who love a clear issue "without hypocrisy"? Anglicanism has chosen to throw in its lot with social, political, and religious "privilege." It must give pledges of its sincerity if it wishes to be trusted by the democracy and stem the rising tide of anti-church revolt. The wails of its impoverished bishops—poor on £10,000 a year—excite ridicule rather than sympathy in days of social stress such as these. Its leading clergy preach conflicting doctrines, but own a common confession. Is not this Jacob-Esau spectacle on the same lines as that "skilled whist-playing" and finesse on the political stage which is rousing just now the increasing indignation of the country? The Creeds, the Articles, the Liturgy, the Ritual, the Ordination-Vows—what kind of Liberalism is it that can suffer the oppression of this Dead-Hand. We Liberal Dissenters long for unity and a true comprehension; but who that has breathed the air of real religious freedom could tolerate an atmosphere so charged with compromise and accommodation as that?

It would be a real service to our time if "without hypocrisy," a concentration of all the progressive elements within the National Church should resolve to carry through a programme of revised formularies, a recast liturgy, new terms of subscription, and a squaring of the doctrinal and political teaching of the Church with the best knowledge and aspiration of to-day. Has the time gone by when such a movement may be looked for within the Establishment? There are many who think so! But I would fain believe that among its gifted preachers are some who would still desire to be numbered among the Sons of the Prophets.

H. S. PERRIS.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—The sale of the church property has at last been effected, but the congregation has been disappointed in its expectations of a price. It hoped for £2,500 at least, but only £2,000 has been obtained. Still, it was thought expedient to sell at the lower price, so as to save a delay which was detrimental to the progress of the congregation. After all, the investment in the church has proved to be a good one. It did not cost £2,000, and the congregation has had the use of it for 64 years. The new buildings will be proceeded with at once, and the congregation is earnestly setting itself to the raising of the money still required to complete the project.

Accrington (Resignation).—The Rev. W. H. Burgess has resigned the pulpit of the Oxford-street Unitarian Church, which he has held since 1898.

Birkenhead.—At the annual meeting of the congregation, held on Sunday last, a resolution, according a most hearty vote of thanks to all those friends who had come forward and so kindly helped to reduce the debt on the building of the new church from upwards of £1,800 to about £1,000 was unanimously carried. At the same meeting a resolution recording the great regret of the congregation on the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and tendering to Mrs. Armstrong and family the sincerest sympathy in the sad loss they had sustained, was unanimously adopted.

Bootle.—The Sunday-school annual concert and prize distribution was held on Wednesday and Thursday, Jan. 25 and 26. A burlesque of "Robinson Crusoe," written for the occasion by Rev. H. W. Hawkes, was, under his superintendence, acted by some of the elder scholars. t is expected that about £7 will be cleared by the effort.

Boston.—Last Sunday evening an address was given by the Rev. W. Stoddart, in Spain-lane Chapel, on the "Revolution in Russia," or "The Answer of Tyranny to the Appeal of the People." At the close of the address the following resolution was passed unanimously by the congregation :—"That this congregation expresses its sympathy with the Russian people in their efforts to obtain representative government, education, better social conditions, and freedom from oppression and tyranny. And we hope that the reform movement may still be characterised with moderation and a peaceful attitude in spite of the terrible provocation of the agents of despotism. And we also express our indignation at the shameful massacre of peaceful citizens, their wives and children, in St Petersburg, last Sunday, when they were seeking to approach the Czar with a petition for help, pity, and the redress of grievances."

Bradford.—The annual meeting of the members of the Chapel Lane Chapel was held in the Channing Hall, on Thursday, January 26. Mr. William Thirkill, the senior warden, who presided, presented a highly satisfactory report, in which he stated that the attendances at the services had been uniformly good, and that, considering the commercial depression in the district, the finances were very satisfactory. The net increase of membership in 1904 had been fifteen, and several new members had been enrolled since the beginning of the present year. Gifts had been received by the congregation of the aggregate value of about £2,700. The officers and the minister (the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones) were heartily thanked for their services during the past year.

Central Postal Mission.—The first of two Unitarian Conferences arranged by the Postal Mission was held in the Council Room at Essex Hall on Friday evening, Jan. 27, when the chair was taken by the Rev. J. E. Stronge, and an address was given by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, followed by discussion, on "The Unitarian Cause in the Light of To-Day's Thought Concerning God and the Bible." The title of his address should have been completed, Mr. Hopps said, by adding "with special reference to the Dean of Westminster's late lectures in the Abbey and the last volume of Archdeacon Wilberforce's sermons." Behind the scenes, he said, tremendous transformations were going on in what was called the religious world. Old things were passing away, and all things were becoming new —strictly in a Unitarian sense. And that altered the Unitarian case. There was now not the same need of attack. His case now was to concur and to quote those modern writers. Mr. Hopps gave instances of modern statements of the Trinity and the doctrine of Incarnation, quoting specially from the Dean of Westminster and Archdeacon Wilberforce on the subject of inspiration and the Bible in support of his contention. They did not know how this new teaching of the "children of light" would affect the Unitarian body. There were many who now said there was no need, in the face of such teaching, to leave the old churches. Their only answer must be the appeal to honour. They were free from the bondage of the old creeds, and it was an honourable and blessed thing to be a pioneer. In the discussion which followed more than one speaker urged that it was still necessary to deal in doctrinal controversy, for the man in the street was by no means so liberal as these modern teachers. The second conference is announced for Thursday evening, Feb. 9, under the presidency of Mr. E. F. Grundy, when the Rev. G. Critchley is to speak on "The Good and Evil of Modern Revivalism," with special reference to the work of Dr. Torrey and Mr. Evan Roberts. The meeting is freely open to all. Tea (at a charge of 6d. each) is at 7 p.m.; chair at 8.

Evesham (Welcome Meeting). — On Thursday evening, January 26, a congregational "At Home" was held in the schoolroom attached to the Oat-street Chapel to welcome the Rev. G. L. Phelps, the recently-appointed minister. There was a large attendance, and during the course of the evening Mr. A. H. Martin, as chairman of the congregation, offered a most cordial welcome to Mr. Phelps, and said they looked to him to worthily uphold the great traditions of the congregation. Their ministers had always striven for the best interests of the town, and they believed Mr. Phelps' ministry would be one of great promise. In reply, Mr. Phelps said he recognised when he came there the task that lay before him, for he knew the honoured traditions of the congregation; he felt it was an honour and a privilege to succeed such a man as the Rev. Rudolf Davis. He was very pleased to find the cordial relations that existed between the members and minister of that congregation, and the members and ministers of other congregations in the town, and he hoped he should do nothing to interrupt these cordial relations, and that he should be able to work hand in hand with his fellow ministers. They wanted no sectarian differences, for they all had the same object in view—to enlighten and elevate the lives of the people. The Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, D.D., joined in the congratulations and good wishes to Mr. Phelps, and the Rev. Alexander Gordon, Principal of the Home Missionary College, and son of the Rev. John Gordon, formerly minister at Evesham, also gave an address. He was sure, he said, that the congregation desired their minister above all things to be frankly and perfectly honest in expression, and to be truly and deeply sincere in conviction. Mr. Geoffrey New proposed a vote of thanks to Dr. Odgers and Mr. Gordon for their presence and addresses.

London Guilds Union.—The annual meeting of the Union will be held at College Chapel, Stepney-green, on Monday next, February 6. Refreshments at 7.30; 8.15, annual business meeting, the Rev. F. K. Freeston in the chair.

London: Plumstead. — On Wednesday evening, January 25, the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones and Mrs. Jones gave an "At Home" to the members of the congregation. About sixty persons accepted the invitation, and a very pleasant evening was spent. On Monday evening the ninth annual general meeting of the congregation was held. There was an excellent attendance, and the meeting was addressed by the minister, who briefly reviewed the events of the past year, and having touched shortly upon the prospects of a new church, appealed to the congregation for a continuation of that zeal and earnestness which had already accomplished so much.

Lytham.—A movement is in progress to establish Unitarian services at Lytham. Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy, of Blackpool, has placed himself in communication with several Unitarian families resident in the neighbourhood, and as a consequence the first service is to be held tomorrow (Sunday) at 3, Pollux Gate, Lake-road, Fairhaven, to be conducted by the Rev. Robert McGee, of Blackpool. The room has been taken for three months for the purpose of these services, and it is hoped that a vigorous congregation and Sunday-school may be the result. All Unitarians within reach should rally to the call for this new effort of union.

Nantwich (Welcome Meeting.)—On Monday evening the congregation of the Hospital-street Presbyterian Chapel welcomed the Rev. David Davis, late of Blackpool, as their new minister. About one hundred persons partook of tea in the schoolroom, after which a meeting was held in the historic old chapel. The chair was occupied by Mr. E. S. Haighton (Chairman of the Urban District Council). Mr. John Heywood and Mr. T. H. Hill, on behalf of the congregation, offered a hearty welcome to Mr. Davis. Rev. C. D. Badland, of Whitchurch, spoke on behalf of his brother ministers in the neighbourhood, and the Rev. H. Fisher Short, of Crewe, for the District Association. Mr. F. K. Wilson, of Bootle, testified to the high esteem in which Mr. Davis was held by the congregation of the Free Church in that town, where he had laboured as assistant minister prior to going to Blackpool. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes, who was prevented by indisposition from being present, sent a letter, in which he expressed his high regard for Mr. Davis, who had been his colleague at Bootle. The Rev. J. Morley Mills, a previous minister at Nantwich, spoke in the double capacity of friend of the congregation and of the incoming minister. He briefly traced the history of the chapel, and the cause for which it had so long stood, alluding to the founders and their faith in the future evidenced by the Open Trust, to the occupation of the pulpit for three years by the famed Dr. Joseph Priestley, and in more recent days the life-long connection with the chapel of the late Mr. Philip Barker, to whose benefactions the churches of like principles, and the public at large, were indebted for the Willaston School. It was a congregation apparently insignificant, but having an important history, and it was hoped that in the future it would continue to have a yet more important historical significance. The Rev. David Davis responded to the welcome in a short but appropriate address, saying that it would be his main purpose to foster a truly religious life among them, and to be the friend and helper of his people to his uttermost. Besides those mentioned, there were present Mr. Guy Lewis, M.A., headmaster of the Willaston School, Rev. J. H. Woods, M.A., and several friends from the churches at Crewe and Whitchurch.

Nottingham.—At a meeting of the High Pavement Historical Society on Tuesday evening, Jan. 31, a lantern lecture was given by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, of Leicester, on "Beowulf," Mr. J. C. Warren (president of the society) occupying the chair. The poem, said the lecturer, was written in the sixth century by a scribe, who wrote to glorify the little kingdom lying between Bernicia and Deira. About the year 627 King Edwin embraced the Christian religion, and "Beowulf" was revised, Christian touches being introduced into the poem. A large number of beautiful slides were thrown on the screen showing the "Beowulf" country round about the little village of Hart, near Hartlepool. On the motion of Dr. Blurton, seconded by Mr. H. T. Facon, a very hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Lummis for his extremely interesting lecture.

Stockport. — The annual parents' party, prize distribution, and entertainment in connection with the Sunday-school was held on Thursday, Jan. 26. After tea the Rev. B. C. Constable took the chair, and presided over one of the largest parents' parties ever seen during the last ten or twelve years. It was specially gratifying to see a considerable number of the congregation present. In a short address the chairman referred to the unfortunate absence through illness of Miss Hirst, who had been usually present at such gatherings for more than fifty years past. In the course of the evening the children performed "Little Red Riding Hood's Rescue" (assisted by a few of the teachers and elder scholars) in which were introduced some action songs and skirt dancing. At the close the prizes for good attendance were distributed.

Swansea.—The annual meeting of the congregation of the Unitarian Church was held on Thursday, Jan. 26, Mr. J. Moy Evans in the chair. A very satisfactory report was read by Mr. C. H. Perkins, and the accounts presented by Mrs. Reid showed a balance of £40 on the right side. Mrs. Tudor Jones presented the Postal Mission report, which showed a remarkable response to the offer of liberal religious literature. The Rev. W. Tudor Jones, in acknowledging the kindness of the congregation, said that it was now six years since he came among them, and he was more impressed than ever with the greatness and the necessity of the work of liberal religion.

Trebanos (Farewell Presentations).—On Monday, January 30, a farewell meeting to the Rev. and Mrs. T. J. Jenkins, on their departure for Hinckley, was held at the Craig Chapel. It was a most remarkable gathering. The chapel was crowded to its utmost capacity by an audience which represented all the Nonconformist churches in the district, while in the "big pew" their respective pastors were assembled. This happy testimony to the regard in which Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins were held was largely due to the marked activity they had shown in the cause of temperance and other social reforms. The Rev. R. Rees (Congregationalist) presided, and Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins were the recipients of a number of gifts, both from their congregation and from local temperance societies. They both acknowledged the presentations with much feeling.

Yorkshire Unitarian Lay Preachers' Union.—The annual meeting of the Union was held at the Upper Chapel, Sheffield, on Saturday, January 28, afternoon and evening. Mr. D. B. Foster, the president, occupied the chair at the afternoon meeting. The Rev. John Ellis opened the meeting with prayer, and the President then gave a brief address. On the motion of Mr. F. Clayton, a vote of condolence was passed with the son and daughter of the late Mr. Pickles, to whose memory a warm tribute was paid, as for so many years a devoted lay-preacher in the district. Encouraging reports of the year's work were presented, and the Rev. John Ellis, as district minister, was elected secretary of the Union. A cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. F. Clayton, of Leeds, for his services as secretary for many years. After a brief adjournment for tea, a discussion on the subject of "Laymen's Fees" was opened by Mr. Ellis and a resolution was passed, which will be submitted to the Yorkshire Union. Mr. Blackwell, of Sheffield, the newly elected president, took the chair at the evening meeting, when a cordial welcome was offered to the Rev. John Ellis, and a letter was read from the Rev. C. Hargrove, expressing his regret that he could not be present, and his great sympathy with the lay-preachers in their work. The Rev. C. J. Street then gave a stimulating address based on Emerson's phrase, "The one base thing is to receive, and not to give," and Mr. Ellis responded to the welcome accorded to him.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE date of this year's meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, to be held at Geneva, has now been fixed. The meetings are to begin on Monday, August 28, and continue until Thursday, August 31. We are informed by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie that particulars respecting fares and hotels will be furnished to secretaries of congregations and societies in the course of a few weeks.

ON Sunday week, the 19th inst., at the close of the morning service, the memorial brass to Dr. and Mrs. Brooke Herford, which is being placed in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, will be unveiled. The service is to be conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, and the unveiling to be performed by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed.

IN the February number of the Mill Hill Pulpit the Rev. Charles Hargrove publishes a sermon on "A Great Nation," and on the title-page prints William Watson's lines :—

> She stands, a thousand-wintered tree,
> By countless morns impearled ;
> Her broad roots coil beneath the sea,
> Her branches sweep the world ;
> Her seeds by careless winds conveyed,
> Clothe the remotest strand
> With forests from her scatterings made,
> New nations fostered in her shade,
> And linking land with land.

The preacher's ideal for our people is thus expressed :—"Let us have closer Federation, by all means, but let it be for the sake of mankind, and not of English kind only. A federation of peoples united not only by blood and language and interests, but by the common determination to uphold in the world the cause of Liberty and Justice and Peace. Oh, if this could be effected we should be strong indeed; our State founded not upon the shifting sands of policy and force on which all past empires have rested and fallen, but on the solid rock of Divine Law, built up by the faith in the Omnipotence of Goodness, which is the source of all abiding strength and enduring victory. This is the politics not of a party but of the Bible, of the Old Testament and also of the New, which sums up all with the vision of a new kingdom and a new federation of the world under Christ as King. And it is our privilege and our duty to work to realise the vision."

THE Torrey-Alexander Mission to London was opened on Saturday last at the Albert Hall, and for two months the effort is to be made there to work up the excitement of a great "Revival." Those who believe in that kind of religion must be left to their effort. It is too soon to say what the result will be, even as regards the outward success of a big undertaking; but for first impressions we cannot do better than refer our readers to this week's Christian World. The following is the conclusion of our contemporary's account of Saturday's opening meeting :—

It is invidious, perhaps, to compare a Torrey and Alexander meeting with a Welsh Revival meeting, but after being at Welsh Revival meetings the Christian World representative could understand criticisms he heard in Cardiff from sensitive Welsh ministers concerning the "clanking of the machinery" of the Torrey and Alexander Mission. Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander would probably plead that we cannot have a Welsh Revival in London to order, and that without the machinery, and machinery on the big American scale, we should probably get no revival at all. If the machinery accomplishes the end, well and good. To borrow the language of the Welsh Revival, the "Spirit" can doubtless use machinery, as well as dispense with it, but it is a pity that to rouse London machinery of so many thousand horse-power, so to speak, should be required.

DR. WARSCHAUER has embarked with the Rev. Hugh C. Wallace, of Bristol, on an interesting venture, in the joint editorship of a little penny monthly magazine The Message. It is to be a religious message, "of and for the twentieth century," "to express, in a language understanded of the people, the new thought of God, and Christ, and man." The Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, of Bradford, takes charge of a section entitled "Echoes from a Study," in which he offers to the best of his ability to answer questions on Religious and Biblical subjects. The Message, we are told, "will aim at being undenominational in the best sense, and resolutely stand for the widest liberty of the Spirit."

THE first two numbers, for January and February, have now appeared. The first, among other interesting matter, had an "Interview with Mr. B. Seebohm Rowntree"; in the February number Mr. G. K. Chesterton is interviewed. Among their notes the Editors have the following :—

On the subject of revivalism—more particularly with reference to the manufactured article with which London is shortly to be edified—the Editor of the Liverpool Daily Post has recently had some exceedingly sane and wholesome things to say. He rightly points to the absence of any wide or permanent effect produced on London by the Moody and Sankey Missions of former years, but on the other hand admits, not exactly with enthusiasm, the help revivalism can nowadays count upon from a new ally—the cheap and sensational press, always on the look-out for something startling, and ready to make capital out of daily records of experiences and conversions. Probably the distinguished Liverpool journalist, whose interest in enlightened religion is well known, thinks that neither the dignity of the press nor the dignity of Christianity has much to gain from the kind of "booming" that has recently been going on in the halfpenny dailies ; if so, we heartily agree with him.

A BILL has been introduced into the Japan House of Representatives prohibiting the use of any and all kinds of liquor by young persons under 20 years of age, and also prohibiting the sale of any kind of liquor to minors. A strong argument setting forth the harmful effects of alcoholic drinks, especially upon the youth, was attached to the Bill, and was read in connection with it. It is thought by those in touch with such matters that the Bill will become law. The mover, the Hon. She Namote, who is a vice-president of the Temperanee League of Japan, was the framer and introducer of the "Anti-Smoking Bill for Minors," which passed the Imperial Diet and became law in 1900.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

SIR,—In last week's INQUIRER writing on the above subject, Mr. Richard Robinson assumes "a breakdown of our industrial system" and "an utter failure of the Poor Law." Our industrial system, by which I suppose is meant organised capitalistic production on a large scale as against the uncertain and penurious toil, its range limited by the then restricted means of communication, lack of capital and labour-saving machinery, of former times. It is also described as being based on "a margin of unemployed," and Mr. Benson is quoted, with apparent approval, to the effect that it is necessary that there should be hungry unemployed labourers that employers may make profits.

So far from this being true, I affirm, without the least hesitation, that the contrary is the case. Employers always wish to be able to give constant and regular employment. Fluctuations in trade, whether upward or downward, affect them adversely, the latter often disastrously. If it were true as alleged, that such fluctuations were a means of profit, the logical consequence would be that employers would endeavour to produce them, but not even the most eager Socialist or the most sensitive philanthropist has ever ventured to suggest such a thing. On the contrary, it is notorious that all employers desire nothing so much as steady trade.

The real cause of such fluctuations must rather be sought in the fluctuations of harvests, the only fundamental source of wealth. When there is less such wealth produced, there is less prosperity, and consequently less employment, but for this not "modern industrialism," but the Natural Order of things, must be held responsible. Modern industrialism, by its improved organisation, has, to a very great extent, equalised the effect of such local variations, so that they now only spell reduced employment where, in the good old days, they meant famine. Any student of history will agree that the condition of the working classes, and with it, necessarily, the state of employment, are infinitely better to-day than before the era of modern industrialism, and those of us who can look back forty or fifty years will confirm this for that period. Then, the Poor Law is said to have failed, but it is left to be inferred how. It still affords relief, at the expense of the public, to those who cannot support themselves. It may not always do so in the way the recipients desire, but it cannot be seriously argued that "the unemployed" have any right whatever not only to claim assistance from the tax- or rate-payers (often little better off than they themselves), but also to dictate the conditions under which it shall be given. The principles on which the Poor Law affords relief were settled, as may be read in Miss Martineau's "History of the Peace," after very careful inquiry and consideration, with the object of checking the degradation of the poor and the fall of wages, which benevolence, generous then as now, at the expense of others, had produced. Where these principles have been set aside, pauperism, misery, and worse have increased, while often in adjoining unions, where assistance has only been given on settled principles, they have decreased.

The pet remedy just now is voiced in the cry "Back to the Land," but not all of those who use it have considered that the town-bred casual labourer would be of little use there. In "Rural England" Mr. Rider Haggard over and over again relates how greatly the farmers lack and desire more labourers, and how young men and women will neither stay on nor return to "the land."

That those who fail to diagnose the causes should fail to prescribe a satisfactory remedy is not to be wondered at, but probably the most impracticable and harmful proposal ever made is that Government or local bodies should organise useful productive labour. That is, when those who understand such things, whose interest and occupation they are, are unable, owing to want of means or trade, to organise labour productively, government or other officials are, with amateur eagerness, to undertake what they do not understand and perform what is not really required, at the expense of tax payers who already have not enough of their own. Faith in "Collective Wisdom" could not go further. Even supposing that such a scheme were practicable and could be brought to a successful issue, would not its effect be immeasurably evil? If it were once established that the State would, and could, if called on, provide employment for those who asked for it, is it not plain that, from that moment, private enterprise and all incentives to personal industry or thrift would cease?

It will doubtless be said that what I have written is neither helpful nor sympathetic, for I write only to challenge utterances too commonly current. If my views were in fashion I need not have written at all, and I trouble you with this letter because I believe that, before remedies can be found, it is necessary to sweep away these misapprehensions and fallacies, which, however plausible they may seem, only divert energy of thought and action into paths which must lead to disappointment and increased misery.

RICHARD SIMON.

BISHOPS' STIPENDS.

SIR,—It is a pity that such an excellent letter as Rev. H. S. Perris's on "Religious Forces in the Metropolis" should be marred by an exaggeration, but so it is. He speaks of "the wails of its impoverished bishops, poor on £10,000 a year." Now, turning to the Clergy List, we find that only one Bishop (he of London) gets that sum; two others (Durham and Winchester) respectively get £7,000 and £6,500; the majority get £5,500, £5,000, £4,200, or £4,000; finishing up with the recently formed bishopries whose princly income is £3,200, £3,100, or £3,000. The two Arch-bishops are paid, one £15,000 and the other £10,000.

Several new bishopries have lately been founded, but in every case the bishop, relieved by his decrease of duty, has surrendered either £1,000 or £800 a year.

Several Suffragan Bishops are now at work helping their chiefs. Their stipends were fixed by Act of Parliament at £1,000 a year, to be paid by their chief, but they are allowed to hold another post in commendam, such as a Canonry, an Archdeaconry, or a Rectory.

I have often heard complaints of episcopal over-work, but not of episcopal under-pay. I see no cure for the former unless simple presbyters, deans, archdeacons, or eminent rectors were allowed to do Confirmation duty, which must now be done by an Archbishop, a Bishop, a Bishop Suffragan, or a Retired Bishop. But this simple remedy might be opposed as "un-catholic"!

MACAULAY'S STYLE.

MR. JOHN WILLIAM PRESTON, J.P., of Lyme Regis, Dorset, who will be eighty in April, sends us the following note:—

"In THE INQUIRER, Feb. 4, p. 70, col. 2, is the question I have heard before, 'Where did Macaulay pick up his style?' Macaulay was a pupil of my father, Rev. Matthew Maris Preston, then a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, for six years, from the age of twelve to eighteen, when he went to Cambridge. My father's idea of perfection in style was always Robert Hall's sermons, which Bulwer Lytton also admired so much. Anyone who sat under my father, for thirty-two years vicar of Cheshunt, Herts, and familiar with Robert Hall, would at once know where Macaulay got his style. By the way, I possess his first historical essay, which he wrote when twelve years old, a great curiosity certainly, and also his rendering of Ps. cxxxvi., 'By the rivers of Babylon,' into Greek verse."

THE SHEPHERD'S PURSE.

"Filled with corn-like seeds in dull January."

WHAT modest purses by your side!
How pastoral, triangular!
Your light, how fain you'd hide,
Your microscopic star!

Your poor, but flaunting neighbours may—
The crowtoe and his kinsmen all—
Spangle, for mere display,
Bare bank or barren wall.

But you all arid soil relieve,
Your charity can nothing tire,
Purses to all you give—
Quaint purses that aspire.

The farmer's man intent on toil,
Looks darkly on your wallet's yield—
Perchance some barren soil
Was there, still in his field!

A star distinct to childhood's eye,
So careful of its common weal;
"A simple" here they spy
Who mind and body heal.

Sad weeds within the field, and lo!
Upon the waste a starlike brood—
So angels come and go,
Fitting the fateful mood.

E. L. H. THOMAS.

THE CHRIST OF PAUL.*

II.

THE PROBLEM FROM THE JEWISH SIDE.

In considering the elements of Christian thought supplied to the Apostle from the Jewish side, three topics come prominently into view: the powers of good and evil in the world, the significance of the Messiah's person and death, and the ultimate sovereignty of God. Each of these has its Jewish aspect, and the background is in each case supplied by the synagogue.

(1) The teaching of Paul, like that of the Jerusalem fellowship, was in part based upon the Hebrew Scriptures. This was necessary in addressing Jews; and it had its own impressiveness to the Greeks. The conformity of the life of Jesus to prophecy became one of the main props of Christian truth in the first ages of the Church. But in Paul's hands the Scriptures are often handled in a peculiar style. He uses them after the common fashion of his time. Little chains of proof-texts are constituted out of passages wrenched from their context, and grouped in connections to which they did not originally belong, in order to support a view of which their authors knew nothing. As the Apostle passed from city to city, his preaching would naturally repeat itself. In time, his method of argument would acquire a certain fixity, and the prophetic oracles from which he quoted would rise in a certain easy succession to his lips. The series of citations in Romans i., iii., iv., or again in ix.–xi., probably supply typical examples of this practice. In their divorce from their historic meaning they become symbols of new truths, just as the Homeric poems were converted into a repository of morals and religion by the professors at Alexandria. An instance, simple but sufficiently significant, may be found in 1 Cor. ix. 8-10. The Apostle desires to vindicate the right of the preacher of the Gospel (though he had not exercised it himself) to live by the Gospel—that is, to be supported by the gifts of the faithful. He bases this on the precept of Deut. xxv. 4: "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn." The missionary's labour is far from the agricultural interests of ancient Israel, into which this injunction of humanity for cattle was first launched. With entire disregard of the claims of animals thus forced into the service of man, Paul sets aside the obvious application (which is too insignificant for the divine Author of the Law) to find in the labouring beast an anticipation of the worker in the Christian field:—

> Is it for the oxen that God careth, or saith he it, as he doubtless doth, for our sake? Yea, for our sake was it written; because he that plougheth ought to plough in hope, and he that thresheth, to thresh in hope of partaking. If we sowed unto you spiritual things, is it a great matter if we shall reap your carnal things?

This style of treatment rises at times into allegory which appears extravagant under the severer restraints of the present day. Thus in 1 Cor. x. the Apostle fetches a warning for the Church out of the apostasies of Israel in the wilderness. The parallel of deliverance under the divine guidance was not, however, sufficiently close, and the correspondence of the ancient salvation with the new was further emphasised in this strange fashion, vv. 1-4:—

> For I would not, brethren, have you ignorant how that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea; and did all eat the same spiritual meat; and did all drink the same spiritual drink: for they drank of a spiritual rock that followed them, and the rock was Christ.

First, the march between the watery walls of the Red Sea, beneath the protection of the "cloud by day," is regarded as a baptism into Moses. Next, the miraculous provision of manna is designated by the apparently incongruous term "spiritual food," to which corresponds a "spiritual drink." This is explained by the rabbinical fancy concerning the wonderful rock from which Moses drew water, which rolled slowly along after the thirsting people as they traversed the wilderness, and furnished them with a perpetual supply. And lastly, with a sudden and unexpected turn the Apostle completes the analogy by identifying the power in the old dispensation and the new—and the rock was Christ. The modern reader cannot put his mind into the needful imaginative attitude to enable him to tolerate, much less to accept, the picture of the travelling cliff, nor can he endure the combination of such a physical object with a historical person. The difficulty is partly overcome when it is remembered that the Jews believed the early history of their nation to have been under the special guidance of Providence. This Providence manifested itself in the Wisdom which made the world and organised society. Now Wisdom had entered into the soul of Moses. Wisdom was the cover or shadow by day, and Wisdom led a holy people through much water (cp. Wisd. of Sol. x.) But to Paul the supreme manifestation of God's wisdom was Christ; Christ, however, not as the bodily Jesus of Nazareth, but as an ideal principle presiding over the developments of history, and as such capable of participating in its great crises with help and guidance. So Christ might be supposed to have aided the chosen nation of old in their desert pilgrimage, even as now he followed and sustained the wandering soul upon its way through life. These are some of the suppressed links in the imaginative courses which issue in a conclusion to us so grotesque. And the reader who would sympathise with the Apostle's teaching must learn again and again to value his ideas in relation to the spirit of his time, before he can find through them the ultimate truth of his thought and feeling.

(2) The preaching of Paul at Rome was concentrated, according to the book of Acts (xxviii. 21), on two main themes, the "kingdom of God," and "the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ." The kingdom of God was part of the religion of every Jew, though different interpretations might be given of it. As for Jesus, so for Paul, the world as we know it was the scene of continual conflict. There the powers of good and evil were perpetually at work. For no Jew ever thought of man as alone in the universe with God and his dead. The upper and the under worlds were full of mysterious agencies helpful or hurtful, it is not always clear which. In continuous opposition to the will of God is a whole train of active potencies, which will only be subdued when the Messiah reigns. The union of the believer with the love of Christ is endangered in unnamed ways, though it cannot be broken, by angels and principalities and powers (Rom. viii. 38, 39). The powers were probably in some manner connected with the heavenly bodies (Mark xiii. 25), and had their share in the government of the world. Together with every principality (all rule) and authority they must be brought to nought (1 Cor. xv. 24), and this would be the Messiah's task. Their abolition would be, indeed, in one sense, an act of punitive justice, for some of these superhuman activities, as the "rulers of this world," had been concerned in bringing about the Messiah's death (1 Cor. ii. 8). Besides these dwellers in a higher sphere, there were the deities of the Gentile worships, whom, in accordance with a view widely prevalent in the Church in a later day, the Apostle apparently identifies with the demons (1 Cor. x. 20, 21). These were, of course, banded in opposition. And at the head of the realm of wickedness is Satan ever seeking the advantage over the saint (2 Cor. ii. 11); Satan, who can fashion himself into an angel of light—whose business is still temptation (1 Cor. vii. 5)—whose destiny is to be speedily bruised by God beneath the feet of the Church (Rom. xvi. 20). Among all these foes, death is the last enemy to be subdued by the Messiah in the holy war (1 Cor. xv. 26). Are death and Satan different aspects of the same hostile might? The dramatic presentment of the great struggle is not, however, the most prominent in the Apostle's mind. There, the problem of evil assumes a new character, connected with the deep consciousness of sin, which is traced back in one of its phases to the antagonistic elements of human nature, flesh and spirit. These terms were not Paul's invention, though they perhaps more easily recall to us his keen delineation of the conflict which they beget, than the sarcastic contrast of the prophet (Isa. xxxi. 3), or the most poignant utterance of Jesus' agony (Mark xiv. 38). They were part of the accepted expression of the most obvious but withall the most profound facts of the moral life, and they were already connected in the Jewish schools with questions concerning the sin of Adam, the meaning of death, and the relation of the guilt of the race to its first progenitor.

(3) Into the midst of a universe where the divine rule was thus contradicted and defied, where humanity was loaded with a burden of sinfulness which it could not lift off, where one elect nation in proud possession of the Law nevertheless failed to achieve the righteousness which it had been designed to produce, comes the Messiah. But the great fact of his career is its close. The chief event of his life is his death. The Jewish Christian Church presented no very definite view of the significance of the great catastrophe. In one sense it was explained, because Scripture foretold it. "Behoved it not the Messiah to suffer these things" (Luke xxiv. 26). If thought endeavoured to penetrate deeper into the meaning of the prophetic demand, an answer was found in an undefined doctrine of vicarious sacrifice, which assimilated the death of Jesus to that of the ancient "servant of Yahweh," and declared that his "blood was shed for many" (Mark xiv. 24), or that the "Son of man came to give his life a ransom for many" (Mark x. 45). Moreover, tribulation was the appointed way of access to the kingdom (Acts xiv. 22). Even Christ could not reach his glory, but by a path of pain. Trial was inevitable in a world where the Evil One was for ever haunting the footsteps of the saint, and the Messiah could not escape the last most terrible necessity, if he was (as the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews taught) to be made perfect through suffering. Or, once more, an unrepentant Israel gained through the mercy of heaven a longer season for awakening to a consciousness of its guilt, by the postponement of the final crisis through the Messiah's death, and his assumption into the security and peace of heaven till the divine will sent him forth again (Acts iii. 19-21). But none of these suggestions were adequate to the scope and depth of Paul's view of the world and man. It was not enough that the Messiah should die to prolong Israel's opportunity of conversion, or to provide the Jew with a finished type of endurance of undeserved calamity. There were questions that pressed for solution, both within and without the limits of the chosen race. What of the obligations of the Law which had weighed with such heavy pressure on the soul of the Jewish disciple, when he entered into the new sphere of the Christian fellowship? What of the Gentiles, who had been excluded from the benefits of the Law? On what terms should they be admitted to salvation? There was the stern doom that death was the consequence and penalty of sin. In this matter Gentile and Jew shared a common lot. But then so did the Messiah, for he too had died. Moreover, he had died by a punishment which drew down upon its victim, according to the Law, a special curse (Gal. iii. 13). How could the Messiah, who had known no sin,* fall under its condemnation? Here were problems which Jewish theology could readily suggest, but to which the Jewish Christian Church had no answer, because it had not yet raised them. They mark the limit of the Apostle's indebtedness to Judaism. The scheme of thought which he abandoned as inadequate nevertheless opened a new way. It was there that he found the difficulties which his doctrine of Christ afterwards enabled him to overcome. The process by which the action of the law in making the Messiah accursed, destroyed its own efficacy, so that the very power through which Christ was done to death abolished itself—the mode by which the benefits of the Messiah's death were made available outside the chosen people, so as to include all living men who should appropriate them by faith—these inquiries were intimately related to the conception of the person of the great providential agent of redemption. We note them here only to mark the fact that the speculative construction by which Paul finally satisfied the demands of his moral and religious logic, was based upon principles which Judiasm alone could have supplied.

(4) The hope of his forefathers, or at least of his teachers among the Rabbis, also formed the essential ground of all the Apostle's hopes for the future. He reposes with unwavering certainty on the great prophetic conception of the "day of the Lord." The sovereignty of God will at last manifest itself; there is the ultimate reality, and when it is displayed, all opposition must at last succumb. To the wicked it will be a day of wrath; to all it will be "a day of revelation of God's righteous judgment" (Rom. ii. 5). The "judgment-seat of God" (Rom. xiv. 10) is never far out of sight for Paul. It is God's because he ordains it, is the author of the holiness by which the souls of men will be tested, and appoints a high officer who will preside over the sublime assize. This is no other than Jesus Christ (Rom. ii. 16), by whom, says the Apostle solemnly, "God shall judge the secrets of men, according to my gospel." The sons of light, he tells the faithful at Thessalonica, have no need to fear the advent of the Lord's day, though it should come as a thief in the night (1 Thess. v. 2-5); does he not pray continually that their hearts may be established "unblameable in holiness before our God and Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus with all his saints" (iii. 13, cp. v. 23)? The church at Corinth is depicted in the same attitude of expectancy, 1 Cor. i. 8.

> Waiting for the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall also confirm you unto the end, that ye be unreproveable in the day of our Lord Jesus Christ.

And the letter dies away with the call Marân athâ, "our Lord cometh." Years after from his Roman prison he looks forward still with undimmed triumph to the same great consummation (Phil. i. 6, 10)—

> Being confident of this very thing, that he which began a good work in you will perfect it until the day of Jesus Christ . . . that ye may be sincere and void of offence until the day of Christ.

and again (Phil. iii. 20, 21; iv. 4, 5)—

> For our citizenship is in heaven,; from whence also we wait for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory, according to the working whereby he is able even to subject all things to himself . . . Rejoice in the Lord alway . . . the Lord is at hand.

But the "day of the Lord Jesus Christ" is not, after all, the end of the divine revelation. It is, in fact, only the beginning. It opens the discharge of the Messiah's sublime function, who will reign till he hath put all his enemies under his feet. Principalities, authorities, powers, these fall one by one beneath his sway. Even death itself is overcome at last. But with this victory, the Messiah's task is done (1 Cor. xv. 24)—

> Then cometh the end, when he shall deliver up the kingdom to God, even the Father.

The reason assigned is characteristic. It is, in form, an inference from Ps. viii. 6: "Thou hast put all things under his feet." The conclusion is irresistible (vv. 27-28)—

> But when he saith, All things are put in subjection, it is evident that he is excepted who did subject all things unto him. And when all things have been subjected unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subjected to him that did subject all things unto him, that God may be all in all.

This is the vast conception which embraces everything. Behind the solemn history of the Fall and the Redemption, behind the world with its immense multiplicity of forces, lies one sole source of power—from whom all things issue, in whom they all subsist, toward whom they all tend. This One is God. As there is one God and Father of all, there is one creation; and one creation is founded on one plan, works out one purpose, makes for one goal, advances to one end. In that intent all things concerning man and salvation, the kingdom, Jew and Gentile, the rulers of the world, and that dread potentate, impersonation of corruption, Death, are bound up in one; and when God wills it nothing can thwart the issue he decrees (Rom. xi. 36).

> For of him, and through him, and unto him are all things. To him be the glory for ever. Amen.

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

* This was already part of the Pharisaic doctrine, as the "Psalms of Solomon" show.

GOSPEL RECORDS.*

MR. DALLAS wins our sympathy at once by quoting on his title-page the beautiful verse from Christina Rossetti—

> Love is the key of life and death,
> Of hidden heavenly mystery:
> Of all Christ is, of all He saith,
> Love is the key.

He also gives us the impression that the Christian theologians have acted in a way not unlike the Jewish lawyers of old. For when we read his appeal for a more intelligent and sympathetic understanding of the life and spirit of the man Jesus Christ, and when we notice his plea that theological dogma has often led men away from rather than led them towards the true knowledge of Jesus, we are naturally reminded of Jesus' remark about the lawyers who did not enter into the kingdom themselves, but who did take away the key, and so prevent others from entering.

When, therefore, Mr. Dallas tells us that the man Christ Jesus appeals to his brethren along the ages with an intensely human desire to be remembered and understood, and that we can only truly know him by entering, on the one hand, into a like conscious assurance of the presence of God, and on the other into a like intense love for our fellow-men, we can but express our entire sympathy with the views thus boldly set before us by an orthodox writer. We rejoice also in the strong fresh sea-breezes that blow upon us straight from the sea of life as it dashes itself at our feet to-day, and not from the sea of Galilee alone. Mr. Dallas appeals frequently to writers outside the Bible for confirmation of spiritual truths discovered therein. Indeed, he seems frequently to treat heathen writers as equally inspired with Christian and Biblical writers; and gladly recognises that in spiritual experience God has been no respecter of persons, or nations, or set seasons.

Thus we have the newest of new wine set before us, and yet to our utter amazement it is all tied up in the old wine-skins! The particular skins on which our four Gospels have been written are handled with such amazing reverence that all trace of real Gospel criticism is utterly lacking. The fourth Gospel is treated as no less historical than the synoptics, and most of Mr. Dallas' pictures of Jesus' life are taken from it. Once again the miracles—however worthless as evidence—are still retained as historical facts. Mr. Dallas' reverence for these "Gospel Records" amounts almost to a worship of them word by word, and so compels us to call the attention of so great a lover of Jesus to those words in these records which testify that these Gospel stories were often disapproved of by the Master. For we believe that Mr. Dallas will not long accept any interpretation of the Master's life which he believes that Jesus himself was annoyed with.

Let us note then that Jesus himself regarded the craving for miracles in religion as a wicked craving, and as a sign of infidelity. He intimates that, like a faithless husband or a faithless wife, the soul which so distrusts God's providence as to seek to escape from it in some exceptional way, and to enjoy a miracle, is guilty at heart of the spirit of infidelity. Jesus' language is exceedingly strong. The craving for miracle is the offspring of faithlessness; it is the generation of wickedness, of adultery. Thus the "Gospel Records" assure us that Jesus himself wrought no miracles at all. "There shall no sign be given but the sign of the prophet." If then we believe the miracle stories, do we not make Jesus a liar?

Again the "Gospel Records" inform us that such miracle stories as that of Jesus cleansing the leper, raising Jairus's daughter from the dead, and many other stories of a similar kind, including the story of the transfiguration, and the story that Jesus was the Christ—were stories which Jesus forbade people to spread or to repeat. The "Gospel Records" thus criticise themselves, for they first tell the stories and then say that Jesus told them not to tell them! The Gospels, therefore, are disobedient records, and seem almost to glory in their disobedience; for they tell us, as if it were something to be proud of, that the more Jesus charged them not to do so, so much the more a great deal did people publish these forbidden stories about him.

Stories, then, which Jesus contradicted at the time, and denied on the spot, are surely to be rejected at once, on Jesus' own authority, by all true disciples of Jesus himself.

If, however, we still persist in regarding Jesus as a miracle worker, and if we find that his spiritual religion and these miracle stories form a very perplexing combination, ought we not to at least acknowledge that we have only ourselves to blame?

Again, when Jesus says to Peter, "Get thee behind me, Satan." How can we any longer insist upon regarding the inspiration of Peter as being always that of the Holy Spirit? Is a man, whom Jesus rebukes for savouring of the things of men rather than of the things of God, to be regarded as infallible? We do not know Peter as well as Jesus knew him. Would Jesus have believed Peter's Gospel? Is Mark infallible because he depends on Peter. Surely Jesus' criticism is severe!

Again, suppose the Gospel of John really were written by John, was it not John who wished to call down fire from heaven upon the Samaritan village? Did John always understand rightly the message of the Master? Was it not John also who wished with his brother James to obtain for himself the best seat in heaven? Did Jesus believe in the Gospel of John? Certainly not.

Once more, of Matthew and all the disciples, were they not all rebuked by Jesus many times for falsely interpreting his message? Even when they all seriously took counsel together, was not their unanimous answer the false answer? How is it, said Jesus, that ye do not understand my speech? Why reason ye that ye have no bread? Do ye not yet perceive, neither understand? Have ye your heart hardened? Having eyes, see ye not? And having ears, hear ye not? And do ye not remember (Mark viii. 17)? I spake not unto you concerning loaves or bread, but that ye should beware of the leaven of the Scribes and Pharisees!

Thus Jesus used to criticise the "Gospel Records" of these men, and his criticism was sometimes of an exceedingly negative kind. If, however, in spite of Jesus' express disagreement with them, we still persist in regarding the records of these men as infallible; if we discredit Jesus, and put our trust in the contrary statements of Matthew, Peter, and John, must we not once more blame ourselves, and our own deliberate choice of the lower authority, rather than the higher, if, as a natural consequence, we are landed in perplexity?

WILFRED HARRIS.

IN connection with the reconstitution of the Congregational Union, the stages of which have been described from time to time in these columns, we notice an interesting development in the consciousness of the individual churches. Hitherto the Union has not meant much to many of the churches. The feeling of independency has been very strong, and since no tangible and immediate advantage has attached to membership in the Union, numbers of congregations have held aloof. Their isolation was not complete, for they mostly belonged to the County Union; in the case of churches pecuniarily weak there was relation also with the Church-Aid Society. Now the new Congregational Union absorbs the Church-Aid Society, and in other ways becomes a more important factor in the denominational life. Under the new constitution each separate church wishing to belong to the Union must subscribe to its funds, and with subscription naturally goes representation. It is interesting to learn that nearly 200 churches have thus brought themselves into line. Thus a step is taken in the overcoming of the traditional individualism of churches, and towards the growth of a stronger and more sympathetic consciousness of corporate religious life.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE.

DIED AT NORWICH IN 1682.

A CORRESPONDENT has sent us these extracts from the Religio Medici of Sir Thomas Browne, suggesting that they might prove a salutary lectionary for the present Bishop and Dean of Norwich, to show them what a greater Norwich man than they thought of religious tolerance and kindred subjects.

"I could never divide myself from any man upon the difference of an opinion, or be angry with his judgment for not agreeing with me in that from which, perhaps within a few days, I should dissent myself."

"Persecution is a bad and indirect way to plant religion. It hath been the unhappy method of angry devotions, not only to confirm honest religion, but wicked heresies and extravagant opinions."

"I can hardly think there was ever any scared into heaven: they go the fairest way to heaven that would serve God without a hell: other mercenaries that crouch unto him in fear of hell, though they term themselves the servants, are, indeed, but the slaves of the Almighty."

"There is no salvation to those that believe not in Christ; that is, say some, since his nativity, and as divinity affirmeth, before also; which makes me much apprehend the end of those honest worthies and philosophers which died before his incarnation. It is hard to place those souls in hell, whose worthy lives do teach us virtue on earth."

"'Tis true, we all hold there is a number of elect, and many to be saved; yet, take our opinions together, and from the confusion thereof there will be no such thing as salvation, nor shall any one be saved: : . : : Thus, whilst the mercies of God do promise us heaven, our conceits and opinions exclude us from the place."

"Particular churches and sects usurp the gates of heaven, and turn the key against each other."

"I believe many are saved who to man seem reprobated, and many are reprobated who in the opinion and sentence of man stand elected."

"I intend no monopoly, but a community in learning. I study not for my own sake only, but for theirs that study not for themselves. I envy no man that knows more than myself, but pity them that know less."

"I cannot fall out with or condemn a man for an error, or conceive why a difference in opinion should divide an affection, for controversies, disputes, and argumentations both in philosophy and in divinity, if they meet with discreet and peaceable natures, do not infringe the laws of charity."

To love others to the death in absolute forgetfulness of self is the only means, first of becoming consciously at one with God, and secondly, of bringing others into that state of heart which in loving loses self.—Stopford Brooke.

OBITUARY.

JOHN COGAN CONWAY.

WE record with sorrowful regret the sudden decease of our faithful friend Mr. John Cogan Conway, who passed swiftly and peacefully away, on Saturday last, at Ringwood. The event impresses us with a sense of loss both to a wide circle of personal friends and to the religious communion which he strove to serve untiringly, and with all his heart.

Associated, both on his father's and on his mother's side, with that cultured type of Nonconformity which proved so healthy a factor in our denominational life, his character was developed in a religious atmosphere permeated by a love of simple veracity in regard to matters pertaining to religious faith.

Receiving his education at University College School, and sharing the acquaintance both of students and of professors at Manchester New College, then located at University Hall, he was early familiarised with our religious principles and doctrines, and with those whose methods revealed the wisest and broadest grounds for their presentment and propagation. His early experiences of Church life amongst us were gained amongst the congregation worshipping at Clarence-road, Kentish Town, during the ministry of the late Revs. William Forster and P. W. Clayden.

From Mr. Conway's youth until his decease the love of truth was a passion in him, and "the reason of the hope" that was within him was a constant source of interest and delight to him.

In regard for the public services of religion, he set a rare example that every one of our households of faith would find it most advantageous to keep steadfastly in remembrance. It may be said that he was indeed a Unitarian of the Unitarians, and yet his religious hopes and thoughts were held on no narrow basis, but in the most catholic spirit of brotherly reverence for the faith of brethren whose convictions were essentially different from his own. Linked closely with such feelings of respect for others, there was found in him an ever modest estimate of himself that lent sweetness to the quiet courage with which he advanced and pursued his own ways of thought or action.

He seemed as much the minister as the layman. Few better than he could set forth the reasons for the convictions he so deeply and consistently cherished; and, indeed, it is difficult adequately to gauge the loyal and efficient services which it was a joy to him to render in the absence of some minister to our scattered houses of prayer, which, but for such kind and effective help as his, must have been closed altogether. Our ministers and theological students could count on Mr. Conway as a warm-hearted friend.

Passing through the exacting experiences of business life in the Metropolis, he was led to settle where his forefathers had dwelt—in the Hampshire town of Ringwood. Here, by his unremitting succour, the little chapel, dedicated of old to a free faith, has successfully kept its doors open for many a year. He heartily identified himself with the work of the Southern Unitarian Association, first as an active member of the committee and subsequently as its President, upon the death of Mr. T. Chatfeild Clarke, when Mr. Conway was cordially welcomed to that office which for the rest of his life he filled with honour and acceptance.

Appreciating the work of the ministry as he did, he was moved to the endeavour to inaugurate some scheme of pension for aged ministers, the essential characteristic of which should be the right of the minister to reap the advantages of such a pension at a fitting age. The thought stirred long within him, and bore its first manifest fruit in a paper read by him at the Triennial Conference held at Sheffield, in the year 1897. Earnest discussion ensued, and at the next meeting of the Conference held at Leicester, in 1900, a committee was appointed to carry out a scheme, there adopted, for a Ministers' Superannuation Fund. Of that committee, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter was appointed chairman, and Mr. Cogan Conway became its honorary secretary. It is a matter of pleasant history that with certain modifications, and after arrangements with the Equitable Assurance Company through the kindly advice and help of Mr. David Martineau, the scheme took definite form, under the title of "The Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund." For his efforts in collecting (in company with the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter and Mr. David Martineau) an amount of over £20,000 for rendering the plan feasible, Mr. Conway's name will be lastingly and gratefully remembered. Future generations of "faithful and efficient ministers" will have good cause to keep these worthy memories bright, whilst the spirit of Mr. Conway's work in so good a cause stands revealed in his confession that, though unable himself to do great things in the way of material support, he was thankful to have been privileged to urge others more able than himself to take up the work, and to bring it to a successful issue.

In the quiet life of the little country town he loved so well, and amid his co-religionists in the South of England, with whom he worked so heartily and so patiently, it might have been hoped that this useful and gentle life might have long been spared to labour. His earnest efforts for the cause so dear to him were shared to the full by his devoted wife, the youngest daughter of the late John Baker, of Ilminster, who is left now to mourn his loss, and to claim our grateful sympathy in her bereavement.

In his quiet round of life, the end of toil and testimony was solemnly drawing nigh. "God's angel touched him," silently and swiftly, and he slept. All too soon, as the friends left behind him may feel, that bright spirit and that old-world courtesy that marked him as the heir of a generation gone are wrapped in the shadows. The social round, the kindly greeting, the welcome humour in which the well-told tale was set, all are stored now in the heaven of affectionate remembrance.

Faithful to the last, he leaves behind him a memory, already changing to an inspiration to nobler and truer life. In his receding footsteps we, too, are called to press, like him, towards the mark of a high calling; and while the watch is still ours to keep, to take up our duty, and to serve God in our day and generation, even as he strove to do, with a glad, as well as a steadfast heart. A. N. B.

Mr. Conway, who was in his fifty-sixth year, though he removed in 1889 to Ringwood, and from that time was practically the minister of the ancient St. Thomas Chapel there, maintained to the last his connection with the City, being at the time of his death Warden of the Cordwainers' Company, with the expectation of shortly being made, like his father before him, Master of the Company. Before he went to live in the country he served on the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society, and to the last was a member of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The funeral at Ringwood on Wednesday was conducted by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, D.D.

PROFESSOR JOHN KOVÁCS.

OUR brethren of the Unitarian Churches of Hungary have suffered a severe loss through the sudden death on Jan. 27 of Professor John Kovács of Koloszvár. His had been a strenuous life, not without its grievous trials, and being now close upon sixty, he was looking forward to a time of somewhat greater ease and comfort, when the swift messenger came in the evening of that day, as he sat quietly reading his newspaper, and in a few moments he was gone.

Professor Kovács was one of the Hungarian students who came to London, to study at Manchester New College, being there from 1870 to 1872. On his return he was appointed Professor of History and English at Koloszvár, and from 1878 to 1891 he served as Rector of the Gymnasium. He was an ardent lover of everything English, and for the past thirty years, as Professor Boros writes to us, he was the most zealous guide and friend of every Englishman who came to visit Koloszvár. He founded the English Conversation Club, and was from the first its president. His faith was that English would become the universal language of intercourse between the nations of the earth.

In his Chair of History Professor Kovács found scope for the expression of his ardent patriotism and love of the heroic. For Kossuth he had a deep admiration, and once visited him at Turin. A letter received from the great patriot he cherished with pride. As Rector of the Gymnasium, with responsible charge of some 400 boys, Professor Kovács rendered good service, but they were anxious and trying years, which brought him also keen personal sorrow. He lost a promising boy, and his wife, who was the daughter of the late Bishop Kriza, was smitten with long and hopeless illness. Latterly brighter days seemed to be dawning. His surviving son was appointed last autumn Assistant Professor of History in the College, and his second daughter came home from Channing House School with a good record. But those brighter days he was not destined long to enjoy, and the faithful worker has gone to his rest.

At the funeral Bishop Ferencz offered prayer and pronounced the benediction. Professor Gál spoke at the grave, as did also another professor and representatives of the theological and gymnasium students. Great sympathy was expressed throughout the town of Kolozsvár, which will find an echo in the hearts of many friends.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN

THE SACRIFICE.

DOWN in the garden at the foot of a hazel there was a round flat stone. It used to remind me of the crown of a skull, and though it lay there embedded in the grass, big, bald, and white, I knew that it knew that it was not to be moved. Who was I to interfere? There it was, and there it must remain, not less than the stone in the Coronation chair, which some avow was the pillow on which Jacob slept when he dreamed of the angels' ladder, or than the altar in the minster. And for the simple reason that it was an altar, white, ancient, and sacred, and like the Coronation stone it had had a long, eventful history; a history that went back to the days of the dragons, yea, to the time when the giants of fire and water toiled at the building of the earth. Then was this altar made in the depths of the sea, and being made was straightway laid in a treasury white as the crests of the waves above, and sealed until the day when the waves which guarded it retreated, and it was needed.

Now every morning after the dew had crisped the grass, and the sun had summoned his children to wake, there came cautiously over the greensward one who was clad in homely raiment of brown and spotted stuff. All alert for this first duty of the morning he advanced a pace or two and listened; looked keenly round to see whether anyone were watching; spake not a word, but brought from a flowery thicket of the garden, from the cool secrecy of the leaves or from the mossy tangle of gigantic roots, a burden. He laid it upon the smooth, white stone, and with prompt despatch offered his sacrifice in the sunlight and the dew. Soon I knew that it was accepted. He who came to the altar had gone again, but from the croft above a shower of happy praises fell on my ear. 'Twas a lowly, helpless thing that was carried to the altar on the green—a creature of little feeling and less thought—but the holy fire of life had consumed it, and now it was music on the wing. Even so, thought I, for song and gladness must there not needs be sacrifice? For the sake of them that live among the branches the things of the bank and the dyke must be transformed.

One day, when I had been a privileged witness of the rite I have described, I was walking up into the village after breakfast when I met a neighbour hurrying to my gate. "Good morning, Jennings," I said. "'Morning, sir," said he. "See here; our Ted's got his leg broke; the mare kicked him; his mother and Nell are gone to market, and won't be back till night, and there's no one at home but him and me. I must put the mare in, and drive off for the doctor; but there's no one to stay with he. Maybe ye have a little time on yer hands, sir, and wouldn't mind bidin' an hour wi' the lad till I get back." "Certainly," I said, and we went back to the cottage together, where I found the little chap lying on the sofa, his round, teary face not so rosy as usual, but bravely keeping in his feelings, except for an occasional wince when he tried to shift his position. Ted was a bit shy of me, for I had had occasion the previous September to rate him soundly by reason of the disappearance of some of my best apples when he brought the milk in the morning. But bygones are bygones, and after I had settled him a little more comfortably on the sofa, at the same time applying what little knowledge of First Aid I possess so as to keep the broken leg rigid, we drifted into as cheerful a conversation as the circumstances would allow. And so passed an hour—two hours. I knew that we should have to wait some time, for the doctor lived seven miles away, and as it was morning he would probably be on his rounds, and perhaps difficult to catch. It was rather awkward for me, too, and upset my plans for the day; but there, that must not be mentioned, I was glad I was available. I slipped home presently to report, and to order "dinner for two," and returned with Grimm's Fairy Tales to fill in the interval until either dinner or doctor appeared. The first came duly, but the doctor not till between three and four in the afternoon. Well, to cut a long, and for Ted a tedious, story short, the bone was set and splinted, plastered and bandaged, and did its duty by getting itself thoroughly mended in the course of a few weeks. While this process was going on I made a proposal to the father which he received with renewed gratitude, for he persisted in talking as if I had had a hand in mending the boy's bones. The fact was I had often heard Ted's merry chirp as he whistled or sang down our lane, and had come to the conclusion that he had a voice worth training. I had spoken to a friend in town about him, and now had come the opportunity. Ted heard of our project for him with evident wonder, and no doubt, as he had time to think, with expectations large and splendid. These, however, remained sealed in his own bosom. He was packed off to live in town with an aunt, was doctor's boy for two hours a day—this paid for his keep—and received his schooling and training for a chorister free. All that sounds as if things went by clock-work; but they didn't. Ted soon found they didn't. His heart misgave him, and he grew very fearful of the hours and the labours required. "It'll take a long time to learn to sing properly, sir," he would say gravely when I looked him up. "Well, yes," I would say, "but isn't it worth a long time, and lots of pains and patience? Isn't everything that comes out fine in the end worth time and toil and money, and even some of our pleasure? We all have to make our sacrifices, laddie, but if we do so in proper style, we find out by and by that we have got something a great deal better in their place." I dare not say so, but I knew he smelt the ripening hay in the fields around his home that July day, and was longing for a toss and a roll. But I said nothing about that, and went on gravely moralising. "'You and I are fast friends now, Ted; our friendship was worth paying for, wasn't it? But it's all come about through you getting a kick on the shin that broke your bone.'"

Several years have passed, and Ted and I have grown to one another's hearts. Yesterday when I was in town I reserved an hour for the Cathedral, and went to the service, and heard him sing. He is in the choir. I heard him take a solo, and as his clear, strong, ruddy voice rose and fell among those mighty pillars and solemn arches I could think of nothing but the thrush in the wood by his home, and then my mind went back to the altar in the garden and the sacrifice, for the little brown priest was a thrush, and his offering was a snail, whose shell he cracked on a smooth white flint. Time and toil, they are but sullen, crawling things in themselves, but how may we not sacrifice and consume them, and turn them into love and joy! Then has the snail gone to its heaven.

I waited about in the close when the service was over, and before the voluntary was ended the choir boys were leap-frogging across the gravel. "Ted," I said, for he had caught sight of me, and at once broke away from his companions; "Ted, you young rascal, I've no business to say it, but you sing like a cherub—like a bird!"

BRAHMO SOMAJ SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

SIR,—The following extract from a letter just received from the secretary of the Brahmo Somaj school for girls, Calcutta, will be of interest to many of your readers, so large a proportion of the cost having been subscribed and forwarded from England. It is mainly due to this financial support that the plans have been so promptly carried out, and the new building built. ION PRITCHARD.

"I am glad to inform you that the new building of the Brahmo girls' school has been completed satisfactorily, and I hope this month that we shall be in a position to remove the school to the new premises, 294, Circular-road.

"The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has been requested to preside at the opening ceremony, at which also the distribution of prizes to the successful pupils of the year will take place.

"With the removal of the school to the new buildings, we have a mind to improve the educational system. How far we shall be successful I cannot say, as the difficulty is to obtain properly trained teachers. It would be highly beneficial to the Institute if any philanthropic lady would be disposed to come over to India for a short time and teach our lady teachers improved methods of education."

A WORTHY RECOGNITION.

THE Liverpool Domestic Mission received last Sunday evening a public recognition, which was thoroughly deserved, by reason of its faithful services rendered to the poor of that city for nearly seventy years, and of the very admirable character of its present equipment for the work. It was a recognition over which the many friends of the Mission may unfeignedly rejoice, and it was no less honourable to the CHIEF MAGISTRATE who rendered it.

Mr. JOHN LEA, the Lord Mayor of Liverpool, is a Presbyterian, and a member of Dr. JOHN WATSON'S Church, a man of true insight and broad sympathies. On Sunday evening he made an inspection of the Mission buildings and attended in state the evening service in the Mission chapel. A company of some thirty City Councillors and Magistrates assembled in the vestry and joined the LORD MAYOR'S procession into the chapel, where there was a crowded congregation. The Rev. L. P. JACKS, of Manchester College, Oxford, who was secretary of the Domestic Mission during the latter years of his ministry in Liverpool, was the special preacher on the occasion, and took for the subject of his sermon "Purpose":—

"As purpose rises in moral quality," he said, "so it rises in power. Change your purpose in life, and you change the whole world in which you live. Aim at the highest, and the Gates of Heaven will open to you. That Mission, he added, was founded and maintained by comparatively few persons, but it represented a fixed purpose of goodwill, and in it he saw a prophecy of victory over the great evils of the time—evils due to human wrong, and resulting in a position which human effort rightly directed could retrieve. People should not expect God to solve their problems for them, but they should work out the solution for Him, because He was their Friend."

In the congregation was Sir EDWARD RUSSELL, Editor of the Liverpool Daily Post and Mercury, who has long taken a cordial interest in the Mission. On the previous day he had published in his paper a leading article on the Mission and the LORD MAYOR'S visit, from which we take the liberty of reproducing a part of the opening and concluding passages:—

"THE LORD MAYOR, still young in his high office, often does exceptional things, and they are always good things, evincing catholicity of spirit and philanthropic sympathy. To-morrow evening he is to attend in state a service at the Domestic Mission, Mill-street . . . one of the most practical and successful of our beneficent institutions. The Liverpool Domestic Mission was founded in 1836, with the object of carrying the spirit of Christianity to the homes of the poor of this city. In the words of its constitution, the minister was 'to put himself into close sympathy with their wants and feelings—to become to them a Christian adviser and friend; to promote the comfort of their homes and the elevation of their social tastes; to bring them into permanent connection with religious influence; and, above all, to promote an effective education of their children, and to shelter them from corrupting agencies.' Among the founders were some of Liverpool's most eminent citizens of that time—Rev. J. HAMILTON THOM, Dr. JAMES MARTINEAU, WILLIAM RATHBONE (the (fifth), H. BOOTH, S. S. GAIR, GEORGE HOLT, SAMUEL BRIGHT, RICHARD RATHBONE, WILLIAM JEVONS, R. A. FLETCHER, CHRISTOPHER RAWDON, and RICHARD VAUGHAN YATES (the donor of Prince's Park). At first the work was carried on solely in the homes of the poor, without any building as a centre of activity, but in 1838 a house in Greenland-street was used for a small Ragged School and Mechanics' Institute under the ministry of the Rev. JOHN JOHNS, who, in the service of the sick poor, laid down his life during the epedemic of cholera in 1847."

JOHN JOHNS, who is widely known as author of the hymn, "Come, kingdom of our God," was succeeded at the Mission by FRANCIS BISHOP, during whose ministry (in 1854) the former Mission buildings in Beaufort-street were opened. After him came successively, S. A. STEINTHAL, JOHN SHANNON, and H. S. SOLLY, to whom, at the beginning of 1883, succeeded Mr. LLOYD JONES, the present minister, "beloved," says the Daily Post, "by the people of all creeds throughout the district;" while as resident Assistant Missionary Mr. JOSEPH ANDERTON has now completed twenty-five years of devoted service. The present splendid buildings in Mill-street were opened in 1892 by Mr. ROBERT DURNING HOLT, the first Lord Mayor of Liverpool.

Having referred to the spacious buildings, with their beautiful decorations, and the great variety of religious and social work centred there, the Daily Post article concluded as follows:—

"Although its missionaries and most of its supporters and workers are Unitarians, the Mission has no proselytising or sectarian aim; it simply seeks by these varied methods and by personal intercourse with the poor in their own homes to help them, socially, morally, and spiritually, without distinction of sect or creed or party. A sketch of a month's programme of events of interest for the poor people, all of high quality, which may be found in one of the Mission's prospectuses, would astonish any unfamiliar reader of it. Much must be attributed to the indefatigable generosity and endeavours of Mr. WALTER HOLLAND, during his more than twenty years of treasurership. Through his liberality a new wing has lately been added for a girls' gymnasium and cookery classes at a cost of £2,000. The entire cost of the building as it now stands has been £10,000. The LORD MAYOR may well extend the kindly countenance of all good things which characterises him to a work which is a glory of Liverpool, and a glory which gladdens many of our most necessitous fellow-citizens."

It is pleasant to record such public recognition of good work, and we are the more anxious to call attention to this, and to the generous support, both of means and of devoted personal service, given to the Liverpool Domestic Mission, because there is, we hold, no missionary activity in all the world more wholesome than this, or more true to the MASTER'S spirit of self-sacrifice and brotherly love. It is sometimes made a reproach to our churches that they have no missions to the heathen; but here they have a mission to those whose need is greatest, close at home. We must be true to our own light, and do the work to which we are clearly called. Here at least we can forget ourselves in unselfish service, which, the more fully it is equipt with beautiful gifts and all wise means of helpfulness, can make only for the good of the people—a service in which we shall most surely be brought face to face with the realities of good and evil, with grievous and pathetic human needs, and with the power of GOD, in righteousness and love, which alone can truly redeem our common life and bring in His Kingdom into our midst. In our Domestic Missions is the most searching test of the religious vitality and devotion of our people. Do they really care? Will they give amply of their best, both of means and of men, to sustain this work? Their unselfish service finds many channels, but none, we hold, more urgent in appeal or more fruitful of good than in these missions to the neglected poor. We rejoice in the honour done to the Liverpool Domestic Mission. May it be an incentive to more abundant service not in Liverpool alone, but in London and other great cities of the land;

RELIGIOUS FORCES OF THE METROPOLIS.

II.—A REVIVAL (ON NEW LINES) AT "WHITEFIELD'S."

THERE is so much to say of the most inspiring new work which is being carried on at Whitefield's Tabernacle, in the Tottenham Court-road, that, lest space should fail, I had better set down at once the message which I am most moved to address to the readers of THE INQUIRER. It is this: Let all London Unitarians hasten to see for themselves this splendid new venture, attending one of the services, visiting the men's meeting, walking through the various rooms of the new institute, reading the first annual report, and getting into talk with some of the leaders, who will explain and illustrate its methods, principles, and economy. I can imagine nothing better calculated to bring home to us some of the reasons of our own frequent failure in London, and to set us upon lines of thought and activity which will lead to more happy and successful results. Especially let those who have in charge the administration of our London churches and societies make this pilgrimage. If it does not repay them they may put me down as a false prophet.

First a word of the past and present of Whitefield's, as regards its message and point of view. Under the floor of the large hall which extends beneath the chapel lie the bones of Augustus Montague Toplady, author of the famous hymn "Rock of Ages." In the days of the eighteenth century evangelical revival the tabernacle on this spot (then in the fields) was the headquarters of that dry and rigid Calvinism which claimed the loyalty of Toplady and Whitefield, but aroused the heartfelt dissent of John Wesley. Southey calls the place "the high church of the sect." It was of a work by Toplady that Wesley wrote the famous satire: "The sum of all this—one in twenty (suppose) of mankind are elected; nineteen in twenty are reprobated. The elect shall be saved, do what they will; the reprobate shall be damned, do what they can. Reader, believe this or be damned. Witness my hand, A—— T——." And it was of this same Toplady that the poet Southey wrote ("Life of Wesley," p. 439): "It seemed as if he had imbibed the spirit of sectarian scurrility from the truculent libellers of the Puritanical age." If the spirit of Toplady should hover near his grave in Whitefield's Tabernacle to-day, he would hear a milder and more humane Gospel, and breathe a more serene air. The watchword of Whitefield's to-day is Universal Redemption. The merely dogmatic temper is scotched, nay, almost killed. Of theological labels and distinctions there is a wise mistrust in this new "Christian workshop." So far as I am aware there is no theological propaganda carried on within the building. Indeed, there is no room for it. Mr. Silvester Horne, Mr. James Holmes, and their helpers have too much practical work in hand to spare time or strength for the further thrashing out of ancient controversies. As Mr. Augustine Birrell put it the other day, theology is a fine science, but it doesn't seem to have much relation to the problems of Tottenham Court-road. The Congregationalists are happy in having a name which commits them to no theological defensive. Mr. W. H. Brown (the donor of the magnificent institute, which has cost nearly £12,000) revealed the whole heart of the matter when he said that the purpose of the new Central Mission at Whitefield's was nothing more nor less than the bringing of greater happiness and nobler ideals and sincerer brotherhood into the lives of the people in the district. It is "Religion before Dogma" that is being practised here. It is the gospel of the imitation of Christ. Mr. Horne's preaching is of a divinity, realised in Christ, but of which all men are capable and to which all are called. His sermons have the best of the old Evangelicalism in them, but are free from its narrow dogmatism, and are full to the brim of modern instances. That is the note of all the work. Of the men's meeting, which gathers 500 or 600 workers every Sunday afternoon, Mr. E. G. Hemmerde writes: "Of religion, in the denominational sense, there is none. Yet there is in these meetings much robust and vigorous religion of the sort that influences the lives of others as well as the life of him who professes it." Whitefield's of to-day has frankly abandoned sectarianism and all its works, and is content to be "a Christian workshop for the cure of souls."

The huge success which has already been attained in a little over a twelvemonth is the triumph of sane and up-to-date methods. The position, it is true, is a commanding one, and forms one of the best advertising stations in London. Yet it is only now, under the new régime, that its full potentialities have been realised. In 1902 the attendance at the Sunday services numbered 162 in the morning and 253 at night (the chapel is seated for 1,200). A recent census showed 634 in the morning and 1,337 at night; with a men's meeting in between which is rarely smaller than 500 or 600. And in addition to this there is the fine new institute, with its manifold activities. The lesson which the London Congregational Union deserve the credit of having been among the first to learn is that the great city of modern times demands different methods from the small town or village of a century and a half ago. London to-day is a city of great combinations. To use the old-fashioned chapel methods alone in central London is about as useful a proceeding as battering Port Arthur with a popgun, or prescribing a pill for the cure of an earthquake. Here are great stores which set out to be "universal providers." Here are gorgeous gin palaces, in possession of most of the best corner sites and fitted out regardless of expense for the purpose of attracting crowds. A place like Whitefield's is, in the best sense, at once a great "store" and an attractive Public House. It is not stuck in a back street, run on the basis of a petty cash account, and open but for an hour or two a week. It confronts mammon, vice, and commercialism in a way which, it is recognised at once "means business." There has been no pottering half-heartedness in its equipment, and no compromise with antiquarian prejudices in its methods. And the result has been triumphant success, a success which, I venture to think, will prove to be of the highest and most enduring kind.

"One is told," says the first annual report, "that the usual fault of committees is either that they take no interest at all, which is a bad thing, or that they take far too much interest, which is worse. The committee of the London Congregational Union has managed to give us help without hindrance." Suggestive words! The cost of "running" the new work at Whitefield's is, I understand, some £5,000 a year, of which upwards of £1,000 a year is raised on the spot by means of collections, &c. The place has been open as a central Mission for about eighteen months. During this time the old debt of £8,000 on the building has been paid off, and £8,000 in addition raised for alterations, the purchase of a new organ, and the furnishing of the new institute so generously given by Mr. W. H. Brown. These figures represent a great outlay of money. But was ever money laid out to better purpose, or spent so as to give a deeper joy and satisfaction to both donors and receivers? The spirit of faith and love here shown is a spirit which deserves and has already won an abundant blessing. We salute these pious founders with an admiring gratitude, and could wish that their example might be widely followed.

The institute, with its separate suites of rooms for the men's club, boys' club, and young men's and women's club, each furnished in an almost sumptuous style, with refreshment bars, billiard rooms, lounge, "quiet room," and all other conveniences of a modern clubhouse, is open every week-day from 6 to 10.30 p.m., and on Sunday at hours other than those of Divine service. In planning and equipping it, I was told, information was sought, not from the churches (which had little to impart), but from the great business houses and commercial establishments. There is a definite membership, with a subscription of 10s. a year or 3s. a quarter. The limit of membership is fixed at present at 500, but there are already plans of extension on foot. London is a great abode of the homeless and the lonely. Here a home is offered, under the auspices of a humane and practical religion, with sufficient interests and occupations in it to fill, if need be, all the leisure hours. "We stand for a complete salvation," writes Mr. Holmes, Mr. Horne's kindly and indefatigable assistant minister. "People call us an Institutional Church, whatever that may mean. I do not think any name will cling to us or stand in the minds of men and women so much as 'Whitefield's,' known for its 'ever open door' and its living work; a place full of Christ's spirit, stamped with home-likeness, eager to serve, seeking to serve, going forth to serve, keen and quick to note altered conditions of life, and then finding out how to meet those altered conditions." "So at ten o'clock," writes the eloquent and beloved superintendent, Mr. Silvester Horne, "the sound of the farewell hymn closes another memorable Sunday. We go away feeling there is no place like Whitefield's, no opportunity so large and good, no congregation so interesting and inspiring, no work so difficult, perhaps, but none so fruitful and rich in reward." At Whitefield's a genuine and worthy revival is already at work!

H. S. PERRIS.

ASPECTS OF THE PRESENT REVIVAL IN WALES.

I FIND it difficult to comply with the Editor's request to give my impression of the present Revival in Wales, because the movement is composed of so many factors of such different nature that it is difficult, on the one hand, to disentangle them, and quite as difficult, on the other hand, to form a correct judgment of the "whole" which these various factors united exhibit.

And also, one cannot say a word against anything in connection with the movement in the form of criticism without having all kinds of evil motives hurled at him by a large section of the supporters. This is quite evident from many scurrilous letters which have appeared during the past week in reply to the Rev. Peter Price, B.A., an eminent Welsh Congregational minister and a graduate in Honours in the Cambridge Mental and Moral Science Tripos. Mr. Price had ventured to show that there are two revivals in Wales at the present time—one a genuine religious Revival which has affected the Principality apart from—and, indeed, in spite of—the shallow forms which it has taken under the leadership of Mr. Evan Roberts and his girl-supporters. Nearly two months ago I ventured to state that it was necessary to call attention to dangerous elements which were found in the movement, elements which are sure to bring about terrible reactions, and, so drive a large number of the converts further away than before, and also make religion an impossibility for a large number of people even in the Principality of Wales, who are incapable of expressing their religious convictions through the excessive channels of emotion and ecstasy. I claim in a humble manner to be competent to deal with various aspects of the movement. When a Calvinistic Methodist minister I witnessed and experienced on half a dozen occasions these sudden outbursts within a smaller area than the present Revival. I possess the advantage also of living close to the source of the Revival—Mr. Evan Roberts's home—and I have spoken to a large number of converts and non-converts who have attended a number of the meetings. When Mr. Evan Roberts was in the Swansea district I went to hear him, and remained in the meeting nearly until midnight. Let me describe some of these experiences and draw the conclusions which seem to me valid.

There are two levels in the present Revival in approaching the fundamental questions of religion. The lower level is represented by Mr. Evan Roberts and his supporters. The higher level is represented by the Rev. Peter Price and his supporters. Wherein lies the difference?

When I entered the Morriston meeting I found the two levels present in the same meeting. Arriving at six o'clock in the evening, one of the first things I heard was a well-known Calvinistic Methodist minister giving a short address to over two thousand people. It was a worthy spiritual address. The audience sat restrained under it. It was evident that many enjoyed it. Some amount of thought was necessary to grasp its meaning. But under the pulpit some of the girl-supporters of Mr. Evan Roberts were present, and, being of very ordinary intelligence—only on the level of the majority of young girls in the congregation—they felt that this address was not enough. You had to think it in order to feel it. Mr. Evan Roberts and his friends have seen the futility of this. There must be an impression made with the minimum amount of thinking. This impression can be produced by repetition of old hymns which have been sung, many of them, in Wales for over fifty years. One or two verses are repeated perhaps a dozen times. They are mainly pictorial or imaginative, depicting some scene in the Garden of Gethsemane, the cross, the nailing on the cross, the judgment day, the doom of the lost, the glory of heaven, a mother in heaven and her last wish for her son, narrow paths and the possibility of falling over precipices, &c., &c. It is difficult for an Englishman to understand the effect of all this pictorial repetition by thousands of people upon those who are "unconverted," but whose emotions are of the same Celtic quality as the "converted." Most of us Welshmen can be brought to tears by this method, and, as it is fair that I should relate my own experience, I have in the past many times been influenced in this very way. But religion does not appeal to me to-day in this way. I own that I have lost this, but I feel that I have been more than compensated in other ways—in ways which the Rev. Peter Price and his followers point out—as I shall try to show further on. During this time strangers naturally asked, "Where is Mr. Roberts?" The reply I had was that he had been for over an hour in the vestry on his knees praying for the coming of the Spirit. About eight o'clock in the evening Mr. Evan Roberts enters. With a smile, the meaning of which I utterly failed to describe, he looks at the congregation, section by section. He gives me the impression—and here I must differ from Mr. Price—of being sincere through and through. But—and here the crux is reached—if he knew more, if his experience had been broader and wider, he would have presented things on a much higher level. His influence is telling because it is almost on the same level of entelligence and conception of religion as the vast majority of the ordinary men and women of South Wales. God is a personal being somewhere at a distance; Christ is a being who can be seen and felt. The Spirit is a being who can actually through space descend into the hearts of men. The whole conception is anthropomorphic. Mr. Roberts's appeals have their force, I venture to say, from the fact that to him religion is a matter of the ordinary senses, especially of the senses of sight and hearing, and, indeed, the sense of smell, for in one very successful meeting the Spirit was smelt in the meeting. It is natural that people should struggle to get this same evidence of religion as the leader. The senses are the avenues through which we know everything in the world, and if we could know the things of religion in the same way the evidence of religion would be certain. But a strain of the senses is necessary before this evidence can be found. The singing and the repetition with the minimum of thought in it has helped this strain. It is now carried further by the positive assertions of the leader that all that he has obtained can be obtained by the congregation. Various kinds of images gathered from the pictorial aspects of the hymns are now projected into space, and the reality of Christ and the Spirit then are established. First of all it is a question of origin. When that is settled it becomes a question of validity. The Christ established by the evidence of the senses becomes now the Christ of the heart. I gather that this is without a doubt Mr. Roberts's conviction and method. A friend of mine and a friend of Mr. Roberts verifies this statement of mine, and Mr. Roberts believes that he is able to communicate with people at a distance, that they are able a hundred miles away to relate to him their experiences.

Now comes the question, What is the validity of this method? Personally, from experience, personal and general, I am inclined to believe that it has its terrible re-actions in the case of most people. They have built their religion upon a foundation which can only be perceived in an abnormal state of the nervous system. The people have responded to a stimulus which was devoid of thought, which was a matter of the evidence of the senses in an abnormal state; and, as people cannot continue for ever in this abnormal state, their religion vanishes when they come to the ordinary things of life. There is sufficient evidence even now that this is the case, and we shall see that more evidence will come to hand in the near future. However, this level of the Revival has shown us what is the appeal that tells upon the majority of people in Wales to-day. The question arises—and on some future occasion I may deal with it—Is it better to appeal to people on this level of Spiritism and to gain immediate emotional results, or to try to point out higher conceptions of things and try to lead people up gradually to a higher level? That things are as I have stated is proved by the fact that as far as South Wales is concerned all the ministers of ability have failed to make any contribution to the Revival according to Mr. Roberts's method, and the reason is that religion means something quite other to them than to him.

This is certainly the truth which the Rev. Peter Price and several of us in South Wales have been trying to show. We cannot present religion in this anthropomorphic and spiritistic form to the people. And I am glad to testify that, as far as hundreds of young men in this town of Swansea are concerned, religion cannot appeal to them in this form. I have never had more inquirers and never had larger congregations than since the beginning of this Revival, and this although the people of this town and the towns around know full well, through the daily papers, my antipathy to the methods and the nature of religion presented. I cannot speak of other Unitarian churches, and would not if I could, whether Mr. Evan Roberts's anthropomorphic God, Christ, and Spirit (a real tritheism) appeal to them or not. As far as my people—one and all—are concerned—and they are numbered on Sunday evenings by hundreds—these spiritistic appeals have no force whatever, and the only evidence of God and religion for them is the evidence within, the evidence in the conception of the ideals of the True and the Good and the Beautiful, and in living the good life and acting the good will.

"JESUS SAITH."

V.—THE SOUL'S THIRST.

Jesus saith, I stood in the midst of the world, and in the flesh was I seen of them, and I found all men drunken, and none found I athirst among them, and my soul grieveth over the sons of men.

FOR words more pathetic than these we shall look in vain throughout the Gospels; yet the note which is sounded in this fragment is not entirely absent from the canonical narratives of the life, as it could not be absent from the mind and heart, of Christ. A noble soul pours out the treasures laid up within its depths, generously convinced that no more than the offer is needed to secure its acceptance, only to find his invitation declined by many, ignored by yet more, while there will not be wanting those in whom the sole emotion produced will be a bitter enmity towards him who desired only to give to others what he himself prized most. That experience was not spared to Jesus; and one could wish that some great painter might realise for us on canvas his vision of the Saviour standing in the midst of the world, holding out to whoso would his "cool and nowise turbid draught" of heavenly wisdom, which the reeling crowds around him decline with drunken jeers and coarse hilarity. Every reformer and idealist has to learn that he must create that thirst for his message which he is apt to assume as already in existence; that most of those whom he thinks eager to come to him have drunk of other waters than his, which may at best have left them without any present thirst to quench, at worst imbued with a positive distaste for what he is offering them.

And here lies an obvious truth for us to ponder—that as a fountain cannot "send forth from the same opening sweet water and bitter," so in the same mind the true thirst—which Christ would satisfy—and the false cannot co-exist. That is a message needed by an age of weak convictions and facile compromises and agnostic consciences, when too many think it possible to imitate Montaigne's worshipper who lighted one candle to St. George and another to the Dragon. This kind of moral legerdemain is absolutely impossible; broadly speaking, we may indulge our thirst either for whatsoever things are true, honourable, just, pure, lovely, of good report, or for their contraries; but we cannot follow after both, either at the same time or turn by turn, according to the saintly or worldly mood of the hour. People of strong emotions and weak wills please themselves with the fancy that, give them but a temporary dispensation to please the lower, they will presently have no difficulty in obeying the claims of the higher self; people whose temperament admits of easy transitions may similarly flatter themselves that they can at will call up this, or shut out that, set of motives, impressions, inclinations, treating their moral nature as a kind of navigable balloon which an adroit pressure or turn will send up or down according to the requirement of the moment. No greater delusion exists; it is simply a fact that indulgence in the drugged and poisoned waters of sin deprives the soul by degrees of any thirst for the waters of righteousness. At the first taste we shall perhaps shudder with repugnance as the heavy, heady liquid touches our unaccustomed palate; but with each libation the repugnance will weaken, the philtre lay a more potent spell upon us, the very desire for any sweeter and purer beverage grow a dimly remembered thing. "To love the highest when we see it" is the instinct of our unperverted faculties; but, alas! it is possible for men, no longer athirst because drunken with the passions they have allowed to gain mastery, to hate the highest when they see it, resenting the goodness which reminds them of what they have forfeited. The impure spirit is thrown into angry convulsions at the very approach of Christ, and exclaims all too truly, "What have I to do with thee, thou Son of the Most High?"

What we need is, in the first place, to persuade ourselves of our own capacity of being nourished and sustained from spiritual springs, to believe that in those limpid fountains, not in the turbid waters of sense, lie our health and life. We need, in the second place, to give ear to whatsoever voice speaks to the soul the liberating word, "Thou canst!" It is not true that we must drink of the polluted waves that flow between the winding, muddy banks of yonder sluggish stream; it is true that we are fitted to drink of that immortal fountain which shall become in us a well of water springing up unto eternal life. We need, lastly, to understand this essential difference between the true thirst and the false: the false is not, in its nature, even capable of being quenched; the true (if one may say what sounds paradoxical) is its own satisfaction, is allayed just because it is felt. The false cannot be appeased, but by each indulgence is stimulated to more impetuous, more frantic demands, fretting impatiently against a weakened power of control, more furiously unrestrained for each failure to attain to its fancied, its ever-receding goal; the true cannot fail of that which it seeks, cannot miss the satisfaction which it aims at, is in itself not so much an earnest as an act of attaining.

Our duty as well as our wisdom will be to place ourselves under such influences as will effectually quicken our noblest longings and fill us with desires tending upwards. Thank God, there are many such influences to which we have but to turn in the spirit of discipleship in order to feel ourselves lifted above the thraldom of sense and time, and urged on to endeavours after holiness and truth at whatever cost; influences that fill us with a holy scorn for base expediencies, with a desire for the serenity which comes from conscious oneness with the will of God, with a sense of triumphant superiority to the bondage of matter and the tyranny of the body. Yet of all the consecrated host One stands forth, their Leader and Head, the cup of life and healing in his hand, himself the supreme quickener of the spirit's thirst. Not all to whom it has come have heeded his invitation—nay, he himself fell victim to that strange, perverted hatred with which the good inspires the lovers and doers of evil. Yet of all who have offered the waters of life to humanity, he is that one who has kindled a deeper, purer desire for right, a stronger love of God and man in those who have yielded themselves to his guidance, than any other. And more than any other has he prevailed in leading men away from appetites that were destroying them, in resuscitating their finer aspirations, in expelling the profane, enduing them with the sacred thirst. In the midst of the confused and struggling mass of men, drunken with unpurified desires, he stands, full of an infinite and yearning pity; despised and rejected, jeered at and struck by sacrilegious hands, he ceases not to entreat, to wean from death, to woo to life. "Take—drink!" is his exhortation; "refuse not that which is for your healing and your peace. Turn not away from the chalice which I hold to your parched and burning lips, and whose contents are for the renewing of your spirits. Verily, I say unto you, Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst."

BY A MINISTER.

XIV.

THE sermon on the character of Balaam is well known to readers of Butler. His character is explained as the result of self-deceit. I am inclined to ask whether this is a sufficient account. Is there such thing as self-deceit? One person can hardly at the same time deceive and be deceived. It is like saying that a man can pick his own pocket. If he deceives, he knows that he deceives; why then does he not know that he is deceived? If, on the other hand, he knows that he is deceived, he is not really deceived.

May it not be nearer the truth to say that Balaam's character was simply the result of that dual consciousness, of which we have heard much of late? One day he is selfish and callous, the next generous and full of feeling; at one time ready to curse, at another as willing to bless. It is not an uncommon experience. Who has not passed on occasion from self-seeking to self-forgetfulness, from vindictiveness to tenderness, from prejudice to fair-mindedness? Balaam lives two lives, but they are, each for the time, independent; one does not put a cheat upon the other. Now he is the son of Beor, taking thought for himself like his fathers before him, parleying, temporising, catching at that which is tangible and close at hand; and now he is Balaam on the hill-top, "having his eyes open," disengaged from worldly thought and care, looking into the reality and so into the destiny of things—a composite character, no doubt, but plain enough to anyone who has ever steadily examined the complexities of his own personality; for he too has been blind to the angel standing in the way, and he too has had his moments of pure prophetic vision.

Another illustration of this dual consciousness is furnished by Isaiah. He also felt his own divided personality. There was the self which slept, and there was the self which watched. Sometimes the slumbering self would wake and grow restless, and call to the watching self, What of the night? and the watching self, having only uncertain signs to go by, but still watching, would reply, The morning cometh.

What, after all, is inspiration but the discernment which comes of watchfulness? All men have in some degree the prophetic consciousness. "How is it that ye do not discern this time?" was a question put to "the people," "the common people." They and their sons and their daughters might prophesy, and their young men might see visions, if they but knew it and believed it. The hidden consciousness leaps up and asserts itself, and in a moment Saul also is among the prophets. Here, in the upper room, it speaks with other tongues, and there, in the open street, it adds in one day three thousand souls to the new-born church. Saul of Tarsus falls into a trance, hears a voice, and the scales drop from his eyes. Nor does he ever lose the sense of duality. Now he is caught up into the third heaven, and now he is held down by a body which is dead; or the law of his mind is one law, and the law in his members is another; and with one part of himself he serves the law of God, and with the other the law of sin. What is conversion but the triumph of the mind over the members, and what is perversion but the rebellion of the members against the mind? The story of the fall is the story of man's dual nature, and of his disposition for dual service. This disposition leads to double-dealing, but not therefore to self-deceit. The warning that God and mammon cannot be served together shows that there is at least an inclination to make the attempt. I confess, then, to an indulgent feeling towards By-ends, whose grandfather was a waterman, looking one way and rowing another, and towards his kinsmen Mr. Two-tongues and Mr. Facing-both-ways, of the town of Fair-speech. I do not defend them, but I have their blood in my veins. Honestly, I do not think we are hypocrites, though we live a double life, and neither side of ourselves has the entire mastery. We do not play a double part, but unfortunately we have two-fold characters. We mean the good for the time as earnestly as we sometimes mean the bad. "What I would, I do not; but the thing that I would not, that I do." The character of Balaam is the character of all the sons of men. Happy those in whom the prophetic consciousness prevails. "Woe to the sinner that goeth two ways."

IN their annual returns to the Local Government Board the various Boards of Guardians in the country are in future to give additional details with a view to showing the cause which has resulted in the pauperism of persons receiving relief. It has on many occasions been declared that three-fourths of the inmates of workhouses and pauper lunatic asylums owe their position to excessive drinking. Figures already in possession of the Local Government Board, showing that drunken paupers cost the London ratepayers alone over £1,000,000 a year, will, it is believed, be confirmed by the new returns.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE twenty-second annual general meeting of the contributors was held at Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon-square, on Wednesday afternoon, the President, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, in the chair, and there were also present Messrs. David Martineau, S. S. Tayler, John Harrison, John Dendy, and Delta Evans, the Revs. W. L. Tucker and V. D. Davis; Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, treasurer, and Messrs. A. W. Worthington and Frank Preston, hon. secs.

Before proceeding to the ordinary business, the PRESIDENT moved the following resolution:—

The meeting desires to record its deep sense of the loss which the Fund has sustained by the recent deaths of Mr. Charles Harding and Mr. Cogan Conway, whose interest in the Fund has been shown not only by their subscriptions but by their earnest and valuable work as members of the Board.

He spoke with much feeling of the loss of these two friends, both of whom were engaged in good work in very many ways. Personally, he had felt the wonderful power of Mr. Harding's sympathy, and of Mr. Cogan Conway he recalled with special gratitude the earnest and persevering work he had given for years, under many discouragements, which had issued in the successful establishment of the Ministers' Pensions Fund.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, who had been closely associated with Mr. Conway in the work of the Pensions Fund, seconded the resolution, which was passed in reverent silence.

Mr. WORTHINGTON reported letters from Mr. William Long and Mr. Clephan, regretting their inability to be present, and speaking with great sympathy of the loss they had sustained. Other letters of apology for absence were from Mr. David Ainsworth, the Rev. J. E. Carpenter (who was kept away by his lecturing engagements), the Revs. C. C. Coe and William James. A letter from Mrs. Rawson was also read, acknowledging the memorial resolution, on the death of her husband, passed at the last annual meeting.

Mr. WORTHINGTON then read the annual report, as follows:—

REPORT.

In meeting their contributors once more, the managers have to present them with a varied story—of continued effort to help the needy congregations of the country by adequate grants in aid of their ministers' stipends—of the success which has attended the appeal for additional funds to enable them to maintain the liberal level which, in past years, their grants had reached—and of the sad losses by death and resignation which have reduced the numbers alike of the Board of Managers and of contributors to the Fund.

The Board have received a letter from Mrs. Rawson and family returning their sincere thanks for the resolution in recognition of Mr. Rawson's services which was passed at the last annual meeting.

It may be remembered that the name of Mr. John Dendy was suggested as successor to Mr. Harry Rawson on the Board. Mr. Dendy agreed to accept the office, and a resolution, formally renewing his appointment, will be submitted to the annual meeting.

The Board have received, with regret, the resignation of Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, who has been one of the co-opted managers since the foundation of the Fund. The managers desire to express their deep sense of gratitude for the constant and generous interest which Mr. Nettlefold has manifested in the Fund. It will be their duty, at the close of the annual meeting, to appoint a successor to Mr. Nettlefold.

The sudden and early death of Mr. Charles Harding has deprived the contributors of the services of an earnest manager, whose acquaintance with the congregations in the Midland counties qualified him especially for the office. His death occurred so recently that it seemed premature to take definite steps for the appointment of a successor, and the Board submit the question to the consideration of the contributors.

The managers are glad to announce that the appeal made in the last report for an increase of their funds has been met with a liberal response. Donations have been received to the amount of £655 19s. 6d., and the subscription list has been increased by new or enlarged subscriptions to the amount of £80 8s. 6d. In addition, the executors of the late Mrs. Cooke, of Guildford, have paid the net sum of £495, being the amount of a legacy, less duty; and £50 has been received as a bequest from the late Mrs. Yelland. In pursuance of a direction of the Board, all donations of £10 10s. and upwards in amount, together with Mrs. Yelland's legacy, have been invested in the purchase of £686 of Midland Railway Consolidated 2½ per cent. Perpetual Guaranteed Preferential Stock, and with Mrs. Cooke's legacy £650 of the same stock has been purchased, making a total investment of £1,336.

With this addition to the funds, the managers felt themselves justified in paying to the aided congregations the deduction of 10 per cent. made at Michaelmas, 1903, from the first moiety of all grants exceeding £20 in amount; and, in dealing with the applications submitted to their meeting in June, 1904, they ventured to follow their usual method; and thus the expenditure of the year exceeded the income by the amount of £96. This is partly accounted for by the payment of the sums deducted from the grants of the previous year, and has been supplied by the donations which, falling below £10 10s. in amount, were reckoned as income.

The Rev. Douglas Walmsley, having shown considerable interest and taken great trouble to advocate the cause of the fund in Ireland, has been asked to accept the office of local treasurer for Ireland, and has consented to do so.

Mention has already been made of the death of Mr. Charles Harding, Mrs. Cooke, and Mrs. Yelland. To this obituary list must be added, with sincere regret, the name of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., whose active and able efforts to secure the first assembly of the National Conference of our congregations led to the immediate establishment of the Sustentation Fund; and also the names of Mr. Grant Dunsford, of Bristol; Mr. Thomas Gladstone, of Birmingham; Mrs. Oldham, of Gee Cross; Mr. Joseph T. Preston, of London; Mr. J. P. Thomasson, of Bolton; Mr. William Thornely, of Hampstead; and Mrs. James Worthington, of Sale Lodge, Manchester.

The following is the list of grants made for the year 1904-5:—

The committee of the Triennial National Conference, having invited the Board to send representatives to a meeting to consider the possibility of common action among funds for the assistance of non-subscribing congregations and ministers, and students for the ministry, Messrs. Worsley and Clarke were appointed to attend the meeting, which was held at Essex Hall on June 30, 1904. The subject was discussed at considerable length by a number of representatives from various funds; but, as they had no authority from their several Boards to come to any decision, the meeting was adjourned that a scheme might be prepared and submitted to the consideration of the trustees of the funds, and representatives appointed to a future meeting with further instructions and authority.

The Rev. W. James, one of the managers, has called attention to the injury arising to many congregations from the frequent removal of ministers from pulpit to pulpit. The experience of the Board confirms this statement, for during the past year an unusually large number of ministers, to whose congregations grants were made, have removed to other posts, or will shortly do so. Mr. James attributes this, in some measure, to the small stipends received by many ministers, especially in his own country of Wales, and suggests that congregations might make increased efforts for their ministers' support, and so prevent them from seeking a more satisfactory income elsewhere. This fund was established for the express purpose of adding to the stipends paid by small and needy congregations, and has been able to do much for that object. It has always, however, urged upon the congregations that its grants are to supplement their own contributions, and not to justify them in relaxing their efforts to remunerate their ministers adequately. The managers believe that they have had some success in this way, as some congregations have increased their contributions in consequence. But it must be earnestly and repeatedly impressed upon congregations that it rests with them to do the utmost possible for the support of their ministers, and not to slacken their efforts because a small grant may be anticipated from this fund, in addition to the stipend promised to their minster. By such exertions they will help to secure the continuance among them of faithful and acceptable ministers.

Mr. James also gives some interesting details of the extent to which the Welsh Revival has inspired renewed energy in our own congregations, and has, in some instances, led them to unite in action with the orthodox Free Churches. The Revival of 1859, he adds, was a gospel of Terror, and crowds were frightened to the churches by lurid descriptions of hell, but the message now is the love of God as manifested in Jesus Christ.

Other congregations, especially in the South of England, have various trials to contend with, and the difficulty of securing an adequate stipend for the ministry appears, in many cases, to increase rather than to diminish. The assistance of your fund continues, therefore, to be most needful, and the managers will rejoice in any further increase which may be made to the means at their disposal.*

Mr. EDGAR CHATFEILD CLARKE, as treasurer, presented the accounts. On a total of £2,608 4s. 9d., there remained a balance of £163 16s. 3d. in hand. The investments of the Fund amounted to £24,494 4s. 3d., and current lists showed an appreciation of £392 14s. 1d. on the purchase price.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, expressed great satisfaction that the appeal for increased income had met with so generous a response from friends in the country, but he pointed out that their list of contributors was again diminished through the losses sustained, and they must hope that there would be others found to take the vacant places. He joined in the hope expressed by their colleague, Mr. James, that congregations would do their own part of the work to which that Fund was devoted, by increasing the stipends of their ministers. It was a very hard fight for their poorer men to face the world with the income they received. The difficulty of obtaining men for the ministry would undoubtedly be less if men could look forward to securing in that service the ordinary comforts of life. As it was, unless a man had private means, he could not be quite sure of finding that to be the case. He would not say more, because after all that was not the chief consideration, and men to whom it was so, would certainly find disappointment in the result of their labours. He was glad to see the note as to the revival in Wales, feeling that earnest religious work always led to wider sympathies and recognition of the common aims they all had in view. He had great pleasure in moving the adoption of the report.

The Rev. W. L. TUCKER seconded, and said that, as a minister, he wished to thank the managers for what they had done for the ministry. He hoped their efforts would succeed in placing ministers in the South on a level with their more fortunate brethren in the North. As one who had benefited by the labours of Mr. Conway for the Pensions Fund, he joined in the expressions of sympathy in the loss sustained.

The resolution was unanimously passed, and the retiring managers, Messrs. David Ainsworth and E. Chatfeild Clarke were re-elected. Mr. John Dendy was elected to the Board.

The president, treasurer, and secretaries were re-elected, with warm expressions of gratitude for their services. Thanks were accorded to Mr. E. W. Marshall, the honorary auditor, and to Dr. Williams's trustees, and a vote of thanks to the president brought the meeting to a close.

* Mr. Cogan Conway's death was so recent that no reference appeared in the draft report; a tribute to him was, however, to be subsequently added.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Chowbent.—On Sunday afternoon last, at a special meeting of the Sunday-school, a fine large portrait of the minister, Rev. J. J. Wright, the gift of the scholars and teachers, &c., of the Sunday-school, was presented to the authorities of the school, as a mark of appreciation and esteem of Mr. Wright. Mr. H. A. Hope presided; the presentation was made by Mr. Robert Greenhalgh on behalf of the donors; and the superintendents, Messrs. Barlow, Gregory, and Partington received the gift on behalf of the school. Suitable addresses were given by those taking part, to which Mr. Wright gratefully responded. There was a large attendance. A religious service preceded and concluded the presentation.

Crewe.—We have been very glad to receive an encouraging report of progress both in the congregation and school at the Beech-street Free Christian Church since the settlement of the Rev. H. Fisher Short.

Great Yarmouth.—The annual meeting of the congregation, held after evening service last Sunday, was well attended. The Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S., presided. Councillor J. Williment presented the report and balance-sheet, which were unanimously adopted. Steady progress and continued improvement had been made in connection with the Old Meeting, which for many years had been considered in a state of hopelessness and decay. Special services and lectures had been given by the minister, and by the Revs. John Page Hopps, Alfred Hall, and Lucking Tavener, with good result. The Social Union had done excellent service in providing social gatherings, lectures, and concerts, with the practical result of adding useful equipment to church and school. It was announced that the Ladies' Society, recently formed to interest the people in the life and work of the church, had in hand a bazaar and sale of work to be held in April next, and members and friends were asked to help to make it a success. The treasurer's accounts had a balance in hand, which had not been the case for many years before. At Filby the minister had regularly conducted the services on Sunday afternoons with good congregations and revived interest.

Halstead.—The members of the Free Christian Church held their annual meeting after service on Sunday week. Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, of Streatham, presided, and in supporting a vote of thanks to the band, said he could always promise anyone coming to preach there good music from the old masters, well rendered by the orchestra. One new member had been added, and there was a little better balance in hand than last year.

Hull. — At the second of Mr. Carpenter's lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," in the theatre of the Royal Institution, the Mayor had promised to take the chair, but before the evening came he changed his mind, and the Rev. F. H. Vaughan presided in his place. In an opening address, speaking of those lectures as designed to present the results of modern criticism on the life of Jesus, and to aid in that reconstruction of theology for which Sir Oliver Lodge so eloquently pleaded, Mr. Vaughan said they had been glad that the Mayor was coming to wish them God-speed in their effort; but the Mayor had withdrawn, and whilst they might respect his Worship's sensitive desire not to hurt the feelings of the orthodox they could not help regretting that he had unconsciously cast a slur on a body of Christians whose House of God had stood for 200 years in Hull for clean living and honesty of thought and action and the worship of the Father.

Leeds: Mill Hill.—The February "Mill Hill Chapel Record" contains the following note by the Rev. Charles Hargrove:—"From Adelaide, in South Australia, comes a parcel of clothing sent by the ladies of the Unitarian congregation for the poor children connected with our Sunday schools. There are in all 273 articles, from babies' caps to boys' jackets, and they come as a welcome present at this season of the year. The Secretary writes:—'With every seam of them we have sewn kindly thoughts and as much of our lovely Australian sunshine as we could.' I told them at the meeting held to bid me farewell, that for whatever profit or pleasure they had received from my short stay among them it was to Mill Hill they were indebted, and I interpret this gift as a kindly acknowledgment that they recognise the obligation, for, as the letter continues—'whatever else we be wanting in we have warm and sympathetic hearts.'"

Liverpool: Hope-street (Appointment).—The Rev. H. D. Roberts has received and accepted a very cordial and unanimous invitation to the ministry of Hope-street Church, in succession to the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong, with whom he had latterly served as co-pastor, after three years as missionary of the Liverpool District Association. Mr. Roberts enters at once on his duties.

London: Essex Church.—In connection with the Martineau Centenary, the Rev. F. K. Freeston announces four lantern lectures on "The Life and Teachings of Dr. Martineau," to be given in the Essex Church Schoolroom, on Tuesday evenings, February 14, 21, 28, and March 7. The titles of the four lectures are:—"From Boy to Man," "Minister of Religion," "Preacher and Professor," "Author and Leader." The lectures begin at 8.30, and admission is free.

London: Islington.—On Monday evening Mr. Mackey gave a very successful concert in the lecture hall of Unity Church, this being the twenty-ninth annual concert which he had arranged in connection with the church.

London (Mansford-street).—The annual meeting of the congregation was held after evening service last Sunday, Mr. Alfred Thompson presiding over a very good attendance of members. The report and balance-sheet were read and adopted; and the committee and officers for the ensuing year were elected. A resolution of welcome and sympathy with the Rev. Gordon Cooper was carried with acclamation.

London: Stoke Newington.—A conference was held on Saturday, February 4, under the auspices of the N.U.T.A. Mr. T. Pallister Young presided, and there were present two congregational ministers, the Revs. Elvet Lewis and H. Johnston, besides the Rev. W. Wooding and many other local friends. Mr. Charles Wakely, secretary of the U.K.B.H. Union, gave the address, in the course of which he made a number of useful suggestions as to varied evenings on subjects touching the fringe of the temperance question. Besides those mentioned above, Mr. F. W. Turner, Mr. Hesler (leader of a local Wesleyan Band of Hope), Mr. J. Bredall, and Mr. Harris took part in the discussion. There was a good attendance.

Maidstone (Resignation).—The Rev. S. S. Brettell, M.A., has sent in his resignation, and will terminate his ministry here (which began in 1900) at the end of June.

Middlesbrough.—The Rev. W. H. Lambelle has accepted a unanimous invitation of the congregation to remain for a further period of two years as their minister.

North Lancashire and Westmoreland Unitarian Association.—On January 28 the annual Sunday-school conference was held at Chorley. After tea in the schoolroom, the delegates and friends adjourned to the chapel, when the President (the Rev. J. Channing Pollard) opened the subject of Sunday-school work, and the Rev. Chas. Travers, of Preston, gave a very interesting address on "The Leakage from the Sunday-school," and Sunday-school work generally. After much discussion, an enjoyable conference was brought to a close by a hearty vote of thanks.

Norwich.—The Guild held a special service of consecration in the Octagon Chapel on Sunday, January 15. The members of both the junior and the senior Guilds were present to the number of 130, and filled the middle of the chapel, the officers occupying the front seat. The lessons were read by two members of the Guild, Mr. Prime and Mr. E. L. King, and a solo was rendered by another member, Miss Edith Batterbee. The Rev. Alfred Hall preached from the text, "Have that mind in you which was also in Christ Jesus!" and spoke of the way in which the life of Jesus was consecrated by his consciousness of God and his considerateness for others. The singing was hearty, and the whole service pervaded by a deeply religious spirit. Mr. Hall has established a Sunday afternoon young people's class, which meets in the chapel, and with 43 members has had an average attendance of over 30 during the last two months.

Swinton.—On Saturday last the congregation had the pleasure of receiving a second visit from the governing body of the Manchester District Association. The afternoon service in the chapel was conducted by the Rev. G. Knight, of Failsworth, and the sermon preached by the Rev. W. Holmshaw, of Blackley. This was followed by tea in the schoolroom, served to about 150 people. In the evening a public meeting was held in the Co-operative Hall, Pendlebury, and was presided over by the Rev. Dendy Agate, President of the Association. A cordial welcome was offered to the visitors, on behalf of the Swinton congregation, by the minister, the Rev. W. E. George, and interesting addresses, which were much enjoyed by a good audience, were given by the chairman, the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and N. Anderton, and Mr. Richard Robinson. This meeting served as an introduction to a special series of religious services, which the congregation have arranged to hold in the adjoining district of Pendlebury. For the four Sundays in February they are holding their evening services in the Co-operative Hall instead of their own chapel, with the object of attempting to reach those people who are not attached to any place of worship. The series was very successfully inaugurated on Sunday by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who preached on "What shall we believe about the Bible?" to a congregation of more than 200, of whom about one-third were strangers from the neighbourhood. Mr. Bowie visited Swinton as "Special Preacher" from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and conducted the morning service in the chapel as well as the evening one in the hall.

Tamworth.—The Rev. J. Howard occupied his old pulpit on Sunday, Jan. 29, previous to his removal to Shrewsbury, where his daughter is about to take up work in connection with the Unitarian Chapel. At the close of the service the congregation remained to bid farewell to Mr. Howard, who for eighteen years had been actively associated with the work of the Colehill Chapel. Farewell gifts were made to Mr. and Mrs. Howard, and to Miss Howard, who had been for eighteen years their organist.

THOUGH not a partizan, a Church of Christ is keenly political, it discerns the principles that should actuate government and the comities that should unite nations. It is not afraid to criticise rulers, but is always in evidence for upward legislation and public-spirited administration. It is the people's Church, and its worthy preacher is one of whom it might be said, as it was of Jesus, "the common people heard him gladly."—Alexander Webster.

MR. SIDNEY TRIST, editor of the Animals' Guardian (13, Regent-street, S.W.), is anxious to trace the following quotation from a sermon:—"I would not give much for that man's religion (or Christianity) whose dog and cat were not the better for it." "This," he says, "has been variously attributed to Charles Spurgeon, Mark Guy Pearse, Newman Hall, Morley Punshon, Norman McLeod, and either Charles or John Wesley. What I want is the name of the preacher who first enunciated the declaration, and the exact reference, and anyone who can give it to me will place me under a very deep obligation."

CADBURY'S COCOA

THE ABSOLUTELY PURE COCOA

IS A FOOD-BEVERAGE THAT SUSTAINS THE SYSTEM IN STRENGTH AND HARDIHOOD, AND KEEPS THE BRAIN CLEAR AND ALERT FOR ALL EMERGENCIES.

"HEALTH" says:—"Cadbury's Cocoa has in a remarkable degree those natural elements of sustenance which give the system endurance and hardihood, building up muscle and bodily vigour."

N.B.—Cocoa is strongest when pure, but if treated with alkali a dark coloured article is produced, which appears stronger to the eye. Some doctors consider this addition of alkali to be injurious; it also destroys the delicate flavour. This can be detected by comparing the scent when a tin of Cadbury's Pure Cocoa and a tin of alkalied cocoa are freshly opened.

ADVERTISEMENTS 115

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

FRIENDS in London will remember that the memorial brass to Dr. and Mrs. Brooke Herford is to be unveiled at the morning service in Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, to-morrow (Sunday), the 19th inst.

THE centenary of the birth of James Martineau, which falls on Good Friday, April 21, will be celebrated on that day at Norwich, his birthplace, and at Manchester College, Oxford, on May 1 and 2. On the evening of Monday, May 1, there will be service in the College Chapel, conducted by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, and Dr. Drummond will be the preacher. On Tuesday there will be lunch at an Oxford hotel, to which it is intended to invite Trustees, old students of the College, and others. On Tuesday evening there will be a public meeting and soirée at Manchester College, when it is hoped that an address will be given on Dr. Martineau's influence and work. Full particulars of the Norwich and Oxford meetings will be announced in due course.

AT a Conference at the Westminster Palace Hotel on Monday, convened by the Balkan Committee, a resolution moved by Mr. Herbert Gladstone was passed, affirming the direct responsibility of this country and of other Powers for the establishment of order in Armenia and Macedonia; and a further resolution moved by Mr. James Bryce, demanding, in view of the failure of the recent attempted reforms, the appointment of a European Governor for Macedonia and Adrianople, independent of the Sultan and responsible to the Powers. The Bishop of Hereford and fifteen members of Parliament were present at the meeting, over which Lord Stanmore presided.

PARLIAMENT was re-opened by the King on Tuesday, with the customary ceremonial, but neither the speech from the throne, nor the speeches of the mover and seconder of the Address contained any reference to the Fiscal question. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, however, pressed for a decision on this vital matter, and said :—

> It is in the interest of trade and of national prosperity that we should be relieved as early as possible from the confusion resulting from metaphysical sophistications. You cannot go on with your formulas and resolutions for ever. You cannot go on feeding the country on these Dead Sea apples. A Parliamentary majority is a great instrument, it is a necessary instrument for the performance of some things, but it is not everything. There is something behind it greater than a parliamentary majority, greater than Parliament itself—and that is the public conscience.

THE opening of the new Mission House of the London Missionary Society is an event of some importance. The new and commodious premises are situated in New Bridge-street on property, first of the ancient royal palace of Bridewell and then of the workhouse for vagrants, founded by the City of London in the sixteenth century. The contrast is indeed a striking one between the new central offices of the Society and the small room over a warehouse where it began what one of the speakers described as a splendid experiment. A century of experience has abundantly justified the enterprise of faith, for the London Missionary Society to-day is represented in almost all parts of the non-Christian world, and carries out a work which is large even when compared with the giant undertakings of the Metropolis of commerce.

THE full significance of this external symbol of a growing energy is only perceived, however, when we look away from the central offices to the churches throughout the country, for, although the cost of the new buildings has not fallen directly on the churches, the need for them is an immediate result of a spirit of unselfish enthusiasm which vibrates through many congregations in great and little towns and country villages alike. The evangelical churches undoubtedly derive great strength from their share in this foreign mission work. It is so entirely disinterested. To a great crowd of otherwise commonplace men and women participation in this work is the one avenue into the larger life that transcends all rational limits. In this work they feel and respond to the claims of our common humanity. And just in proportion to the sincerity of their zeal here is the reaction of a mightier zeal in pursuit of the religious aims in their own neighbourhood. They learn to pray and spend as one man, and for no narrow personal result, and they gain the power of common loyalty and action in many directions. This is the history of numerous churches in connection with the London Missionary Society.

THE Rev. H. D. Roberts, who has succeeded the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong as minister of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, and preached last Sunday for the first time after his election, is a man in the prime of life, and we wish for him a ministry of much happiness and of growing power and influence in the Church, which must ever be illustrious with its memories of James Martineau and now of Richard Armstrong. Mr. Roberts is a Londoner, born at Clerkenwell in 1858, and brought up in strictly evangelical Church of England surroundings. From early years he had the wish to be a preacher, but the difficulty of subscription barred him from the Church. An accident prevented him from going to Cambridge as he had hoped, and he became a grammar school master, as such taking evening courses at Owens College, Manchester, 1877—80. Then in 1884, for reasons of health, he went to Australia and obtained good teaching appointments there, his last post before finally returning home being as extension lecturer in connection with the University of Sydney. While in Australia Mr. Roberts frequently preached, as a layman, but grew more and more heretical, and finally his thoughts turned to the Unitarian ministry. Coming home in 1892-3, he got good tutorial work at Wimbledon, and then for the first time made the acquaintance of Unitarians. He saw Mr. Bowie at Essex Hall, and in 1894 entered for the theological course at the Unitarian Home Missionary College at Manchester. In 1896 he became minister at Chester, and while there wrote the history of Matthew Henry's Chapel. In 1900 he moved to Liverpool as missionary to the District Association, and three years later became co-pastor with Mr. Armstrong at Hope-street Church. Taking now the sole charge, Mr. Roberts is happily not alone, but has in his wife one who is admirably endowed to strengthen and sustain his ministry.

A PROCESS is slowly working itself out by which the evangelical churches are being drawn into relations of closer co-operation, and which may conceivably issue ultimately in further unions of bodies at present separate. An illustration of the tendency is presented by the Congregational Western College, which has recently been removed from Plymouth to Bristol. One reason for the change is the advantage of affiliation with the Bristol University; another the possibility of partial union with the Baptist College in the latter city. The students of the Western College are now associated with their Baptist brethren "in the greater part of their theological work." The one point of separation between the two denominations is the not very vital one of the age and mode of baptism. Probably a more real cause for these churches continuing unamalgamated is to be found in the somewhat different social classes from which they respectively derive their strength, and this fact may long prevent the closer union of either of these bodies with the great Methodist bodies. But the intercourse is close already, many Congregationalists being members of Baptist chapels in small places where there is no room for two so closely similar congregations. The Congregationalists under like conditions welcome many Baptists. This movement towards a consolidation of the evangelical churches, this firmer organisation of the evangelical as opposed to the episcopal idea, is an interesting phenomenon in the religious life of our times.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN this month's Nineteenth Century and After, Baron Suyematsu, in supplement to a previous article on the Religions of Japan, writes on "Moral Teaching in Japan." The cardinal points of Oriental ethics, he says, are loyalty and filial piety. The latter takes precedence in China, but loyalty in Japan, with which patriotism is closely linked. Human nature and culture, the Baron urges, are much the same in the West and the Far East, and he asks that an unfair and hostile estimate of Japan's national existence may not be formed. Another article of great interest is the account by the Rev. W. Carlile of what the Church Army does for the Reclamation of Criminals, both through visitation of prisons and the offering of homes and help to discharged prisoners. The Prison Commissioners bear high testimony when they report: "So far as prisons are concerned, the Church Army has grown by steady and cautious development into one of the great reclaiming influences of the age." Sir George Arthur, writing as an uncompromising Churchman on "The Bishops and the Reformation Settlement," is very severe on the bishops and on undenominational religious teaching, which even Church people now have to endure in the schools, "the tenets of a brand-new religion obligingly invented for their benefit by a scratch committee of theological amateurs in 1871." If the bishops had possessed a little more grit, he holds, they would have defeated the fateful Cowper-Temple clause. He appears to think of the Lux Mundi men as Liddon did, and writes in hot championship of the Athanasian Creed.

Mr. Augustine Birrell writes in the Contemporary on "Patriotism and Christianity." A true patriot, he says, does not hate the foreigner, even though as nearly related as the Germans are to ourselves.

If we are to talk of ideals, and dream dreams as we are now often invited to do, let us "hitch our wagon" to the right star. The Brotherhood of Man is a long way off; it may never be reached; but as an ideal it is better worth having than that of half-a-dozen sullen empires, trading only within their boundaries, shut up behind high tariff walls, over which they peer suspiciously, scanning one another's exports and imports with jealous eyes, and making from time to time fawning alliances with one rival, whilst cultivating enmity with another, maintaining millions of men under arms, and spending billions of pounds in armaments, and all the time waiting, waiting, waiting for an affrighted sun to rise upon the day of Armageddon. If this were to be the destiny of the human race, far better would it be if the planet could be spun off its axis and allowed to disappear into the "illimitable inane." But nobler things lie before us, and a brighter dawn.

In the same number Dr. Emil Reich writes in a very superior tone on "The Bankruptcy of Higher Criticism," and thinks that he has demonstrated by the potency of "geo-political" considerations the complete folly of the critics. Miss M. Loane's account of "Husband and Wife among the Poor" is full of human nature, and, therefore, by no means deficient in humour. Mrs. Barnett's plea for "A Garden Suburb at Hampstead" should be also noted.

To the Independent Review Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson contributes another of his thoughtful articles, asking under the title "How Long Halt Ye?" whether we are really Pagan or Christian, or perhaps both? Certainly not Christian, he answers, according to the received idea of Christianity, and then sets forth an ideal in which health and strength and beauty and leisure really to live shall lay the foundation on which a complete spiritual life may be built, and shared by all. That "shared by all" brings in the Christian element. Mr. J. A. Hobson utters a warning on the subject of "Millionaire Endowments," and the Rev. Arnold D. Taylor writes earnestly on "The Village and the Unemployed." Dr. Rashdall, in a review of the Life of Liddon, referring to his greatness as a preacher, says: "Liddon's Sermons share with Robertson's, Newman's, and possibly Martineau's, the distinction of being the only sermons of the nineteenth century that retain an acknowledged place in literature."

In the Monthly Review the illustrated article is a second contribution by the Earl Egerton of Tatton on the "Papal Medals of the Italian Renaissance." The Rev. E. B. Ottley writes on "Religious Instruction in Primary Schools," claiming that authorised teachers must be allowed to give proper teaching to the children in accordance with the parents' convictions and wishes.

The World's Work and Play is chiefly devoted to all manner of motors.

TO JOHN W. CHADWICK.

BY THE REV. THEODORE C. WILLIAMS.

A HERO, thou! a warrior! not one
Who smites his brother's life with sword or fire,
Nor of the strife where gold is lost or won
In the world's cock-pits of inflamed desire.

The lonely study was thy haunt of war,
The word thy weapon, and thy long campaign
Was argument or book. Thy conqueror's star
Was if God's truth through thee could speak out plain.

Gold could not buy thee, nor light praise allure,
Nor lust of action from clear honour swerve,
Not thine the fluent phrase on lips impure
That parcels truth some low born end to serve.

Therefore true hearts discerned thee; and at last,
Seeing thy worth shine bright in honoured eyes,
The dull, blind world its vote of homage cast,
And all men called thee good and brave and wise.

The same number of the Christian Register (January 19) which published these lines, by Mr. Williams, read at the Ministers' Association on January 9, republished from the Outlook the following lines by Mr. Chadwick:—

LATE KNOWLEDGE.

LIFTING mine eyes unto the hills from whence
My help doth come through the long summer days,
They throng enfolded with the silvery haze
Which seems more spirit than a thing of sense;
And lo, a wonder!—that they borrow thence Clearness of outline: not the day-star's rays,
Illusion spoiling with their ruthless blaze,
So fix each hill, sharp, separate, immense:

And, when to my death-hallowed friends there clings
A tender mist of unavailing tears,
That trembling veil such revelation brings
As never life's full glare! straightway appears
Divinely clear, seen in that softened light,
What life's hard blaze had hidden from my sight.

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

WE have received from Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A., of Bombay, formerly a Brahmo student at Manchester College, Oxford, a letter expressing the sorrow of the members of the Brahmo Samaj at the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and his own personal sense of loss. Mr. Shinde adds that Mr. Armstrong "has made his name dear to many a young student of the different colleges in this vast country through his beautiful little book, "God and the Soul," liberal grants of which have been made by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

THE CHRIST OF PAUL.

III.

THE PROBLEM IN PERSONAL EXPERIENCE.

WHATEVER may have been the Jewish elements of thought which appear in the Pauline interpretation of Christianity, there can be no doubt that the Apostle believed passionately in the independence of his own gospel. The persistent opposition with which he was afterwards assailed on his great mission to the Gentiles, led him to state his own claims in the most emphatic manner. Challenged by his adversaries, he replies with a vehement vindication of his own authority. It has been conferred upon him by no human agency; he has been called by God Himself, who marked him out from birth for this great end. Writing to the churches of Galatia, he thus states his own view of his commission (Gal. i. 1, 11, 12) :—

Paul, an apostle, not from men, neither through man, but through Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who raised him from the dead. . . . I make known unto you, brethren, as touching the gospel which was preached by me, that it is not after man. For neither did I receive it from man, nor was I taught it, but it came to me through revelation of Jesus Christ.

Whence did it come, and what was the revelation? The answer to the first question is clear; its source was God, when it was His good pleasure to reveal His son in him (i. 15–16). The answer to the second is not so simple. Paul started from Jerusalem an enemy of Christ. He arrived at Damascus a follower of Christ. Was the change that befel him on the way summed up in the intellectual acceptance of the proposition that Jesus was the Messiah? The glimpses which we have already gained into the Apostle's mind have shown how difficult it is to isolate any one single process of thought from the moral and emotional issues which all the great terms of religion suggested for him. In trying, therefore, to understand his attitude towards Jesus and the conception which he was led to form of him, we must not forget that it arose out of a complex state of inward experience in which various ideas and feelings worked together.

(1) The Apostle's "manner of life in the Jews' religion" was notorious enough for it to be a familiar story even to those who were remote in distance, and after an interval of years. Trained as a Pharisee, he had far outstripped the moderation of his teacher, Gamaliel. The rush of his impetuous nature had carried him beyond the recognised standards of his sect. He had devoted himself to the law with a zeal greatly exceeding that of many of his contemporaries. The traditions which generations of Rabbis had elaborated around its commands and prohibitions had been positively welcomed. Concentrating himself on the attempt to fulfil the will of God by scrupulous obedience to his legal demands, he had found in this the meaning and the object of his life. Looking back afterwards, he saw that he had failed, and this consciousness of failure had long been stirring, it might be dimly and inarticulately, within him. Outward conduct could be controlled; the holy actions could be scrupulously performed, the sacred prayers punctually recited. But could the law regulate inward desire? From immemorial antiquity the Tenth Commandment had said "Thou shalt not covet." How many had noticed it? How many more had found it lay on them an intolerable strain? In memorable words, which can hardly help having an autobiographical significance whatever more general application they may also possess, the Apostle has told us how the burden of the Law thus came to press upon him (Rom. vii. 7). The vivid imaginative language which he employs, only heightens our sense of the struggle in which he was involved. "Sin came to life and I died"; "sin, finding occasion, through the commandment beguiled me, and through it slew me." The effort to master sinful impulse seemed to defeat itself. The more he endeavoured to repress it, the more active it became. The motions of temper, feeling, passion, could not be subdued by rule. The commandment which in itself was good, became the occasion of evil; the Law seemed to lose its power just where it was most needed.—Over against the rigid strenuousness of the Pharisee stood the followers of Jesus. He had died by a Roman sentence, but he had first of all been condemned by the Sanhedrin of his own people. And the motive of condemnation had in great part been hatred of the man whose conduct showed that he thought there were laws above the Law. With eager haste to strengthen aposition which the action of his own conscience was fast undermining, Paul had engaged in the persecution of the Christians. He sought to beat back his own difficulties by committing himself irrevocably against the leader whom his party had succeeded in bringing to the cross. He received the garments of the witnesses when Stephen was stoned. He promoted (so runs the story in Acts viii. 3) a rigorous inquisition against the new sect; himself headed the search from house to house; and filled the prison with his victims, both men and women. The more uneasy he was privately, the more violent were his public operations. But in the meanwhile he was learning, though he knew it not, from the religion which he hated and despised. The patience of the sufferers, the high joy with which they bore their testimony, the unswerving loyalty of their readiness to follow their Lord even unto death—here was a type of character, a way of holiness, unlike anything which he had seen before. True, these Christians had not abandoned the Law. They still served it, but it was plain that they lived above it. They had a Master on whom their hearts were stayed in love. Did they possess the secret which Paul had sought so long? Had they discovered how to harmonise all impulse and overcome the inert or reluctant will in the glow of one great affection? And if so, who was the Christ in whom they trusted? Some such thoughts as these may have arisen in his mind from time to time, before he undertook the memorable journey to Damascus. The details of the event which marked it, have not been related by himself. Three accounts are contained in the Acts, ix. 3–8, xxii. 6–11, xxvi. 12–16. They stand at many removes from the Apostle, and differ in some particulars which are not unimportant, but they all concur in representing Paul as hearing a heavenly voice address him, while a sudden light shone forth from heaven. It was Jesus whom he had persecuted. So does the story attempt to picture by outward symbols the occasion and agency of a great inward change. The might and nearness of a new spiritual force broke in upon his soul. The appeal which God had made to him so long through Christ, was understood at last. A life in spirit flashed before his gaze, in which the war between ruling mind and unsubjugated members died away into peace, as love and trust went forth to the Messiah who died upon the cross and rose again. That the presence of which he became conscious should seem to him that of Jesus rather than God, resulted inevitably from the fact that Jesus was the supreme object which then filled his view. At last he knew him as he truly was. The opposition and hatred which had driven him into violence suddenly ceased as he saw the real nature of Jesus, apprehended his character, and found new meaning in his work. God had revealed his Son in him; surely it must have been that Son who called.

(2) One supreme moment, then, sufficed to alter the Apostle's relation to Christ, and in that moment intellect, feeling, impulse, will, seemed all to be baptized anew. A fresh world of spiritual possibilities was, as it were, unveiled. So powerful a nature could not immediately adjust itself to a change which was nothing short of revolution. Time was needed, and solitude and silence, to follow the new thought to its issues, and shape and order the fresh hopes which came surging up so swiftly towards the light. In the streets and bazaars of Damascus, or in a synagogue full of curious eyes, there was no place for the Apostle to possess his soul in quiet, and learn whither the great deliverance would carry him. In the retirement of Arabia he found the opportunity he sought. There he could watch and meditate, there give thanks and pray; and there he could think out the full significance of the experience through which he had passed. Slowly he gave form and definiteness to his conceptions. Slowly he tested them by Scripture, confirmed them by new proofs, and brought them into line with beliefs which he still cherished because nothing had happened to weaken or destroy them. How much he then knew of the traditions about Jesus, Paul nowhere tells us. Alone, it would seem, without aid or sympathy from man, he reconstructed the whole fabric of his religious thought. Hence came his sense of independence, his consciousness of a fresh and separate gospel, the unexpected imaginative forms in which his ideas are clothed. Most prominent of all is the sense of moral change. The laborious and fruitless efforts with which he had strained after an impossible righteousness, are needed no more. He felt a sense of freedom, he entered into a large and ample liberty, begotten by the surrender of all previous aims in the rush of affection for Christ. Just as before sin sprang to life in him, and that worthier self with which he served the law of God had died, so now the love which Jesus had shown upon the cross passed into him, took possession of him, worked, lived in him, and the old passions faded out, the unworthier self passed away and ceased to be. This could not indeed happen without suffering. The past, as he saw it now, was full of painful memory, and the future involved great renunciations. But in the new life he was conscious of a new spirit. Sometimes it seemed to him as though his whole soul were remade. The fresh thoughts, fresh affections, fresh purposes which welled up within him, belonged to another order of being; he could say of himself that he was born again, he did not move in the same world, he had (as it were) been created anew. Sometimes he felt as if some outside power, some fresh energy, some higher principle, had been implanted within him, and was being formed into high and holy shape to guide and control him. To this, with his habit of thinking, he gave a personal name: it was Christ in him. So his sufferings and sacrifices were assimilated to that gracious type of self-surrender which he discerned in the cross, and he boldly identified himself with his Lord: "I have been crucified with Christ" (Gal. ii. 20). But if crucified, then dead, dead to the world, and the world dead to him—it tempted him no more (Gal. vi. 14); and yet withal he was alive, raised above sin, raised with the risen Christ. And this change, as he came to perceive afterwards, was shared by others also. When he began preaching he found that the experience of his converts resembled his own. Men and women, Jews and Greeks, slaves and freemen, alike received the divine grace; the wondrous life was begotten in them all. He saw in baptism the mystic death of the old man, as they entered into sympathy with the self-denying death of Christ. He saw them rise above the old trials, the old weaknesses, the old sins, in the strength of a spiritual fellowship with a heavenly Lord. The old man was buried in the grave of the past. There issued forth a new man with fresh hope and power. This is not the language of reasoning or argument, but of religious passion. It belongs to a type of experience which can never be common at the pitch of intensity with which it was realised by Paul. There are natures of rare elevation that seem to dwell above it; a process of continuous growth saves them from such agonising crises. There are others which can humbly recognise its majestic force, yet shrink from demanding from themselves or others a precise conformity to its inner stages or its outer formulæ. But in the case of Paul it had this immense significance. It led him to frame his thought about Christ on the basis of his sense of what he believed Christ had actually accomplished. His conception of what Christ was, resulted from his conviction of what Christ had done. His estimate of his person was founded on his interpretation of his work.

(3) The relation thus established had far-reaching consequences. By its aid the Apostle could explain satisfactorily to himself the mode in which the Messiah's death through the Law finally abolished the Law. In obedience to its supreme demand he carried the gospel forth to the Gentiles, that to them also the way of salvation might be declared. But his preaching could not have consisted solely in the recital of his own experience, and the exposition of the beliefs which were founded on it. Independent he might assert himself to be in office and authority. He derived neither his mission nor his message from Jerusalem. Yet he could not have remained indifferent to the teaching of those from whose example (it is not unreasonable to suppose) he had learned so much. There were, on the one hand, the traditions of Christ's life and preaching; there was, on the other, the continually increasing body of prophetic proof. In the enthusiasm of fellowship with the risen Christ he did not rest his faith on the character or claims of a career which had closed on earth before he knew it. Yet had it no significance for him? His own knowledge of Jesus begins after his death. But he carefully enumerates the manifestations which had convinced the Apostles that the Christ had risen; he prefaces the list with the statement that he does but hand on what had been delivered to him (1 Cor. xv. 3), and he includes under this head alike the facts of burial and re-appearance, and the scriptural justification of Messiah's death and resurrection. This was the gospel which Paul had made known at Corinth (1 Cor. xv. 1), on its outward and historic side. Another tradition was connected with the memorial meal, in which the participants proclaimed "the Lord's death till he come" (1 Cor. xi. 23–26). It is, indeed, sometimes doubtful whether the Apostle's announcements of the word of the Lord depend on a past tradition or on a present assurance. They may be the permanent contents of Christian instruction, or they may be inferences and results from principles or expectations which he believed Christ to have sanctioned (cp. 1 Thess. iv. 15, 1 Cor. vii. 10, ix. 14, xiv. 37). In either case they have a basis in the oral record which was taking shape during this age within the memory of the disciples. The preaching of Paul cannot have wholly ignored the personal characteristics of Jesus, even though the stress of his thought fell on the Messianic function. He carried back his biography far behind the moment of Christ's entry into the work through David's seed, just as he carried it forward to an era indefinitely in advance of his impending descent from the skies. But in this vast sweep from past to future the earthly years had served to create the type of the new life, to fix its features and determine its ideal. The summaries of apostolic addresses in the Acts show that the missionary's task was first of all to present the large and general aspects of the Christian faith. To Paul these opened problems more numerous and intricate than to the fellowship at Jerusalem. They, therefore, more constantly engage his thought. But this does not imply that he had not been profoundly moved by the detail of Jesus' word and deed. Whatever be the interpretation of the difficult passage in 2 Cor. v. 16, it cannot be taken to exclude the acts and qualities in which Paul had come to recognise the supreme revelation of the love of God. Whether Ananias and the disciples at Damascus were his first instructors, whether his first brief visit to Jerusalem (Gal. i. 18) opened to him the stores of apostolic reminiscence, or whether even before his conversion reports of utterance and incident had sunk into his mind, we cannot tell. It is not, perhaps, possible to determine what sayings of Jesus, whether now lodged in the records, or overlooked or discarded by the evangelists, may have prompted the counsel and exhortation of Paul. But few readers of the persuasive words in which again and again he summons the believer to become a follower of Christ will feel that he was not well aware along what paths of behaviour Christ had first led the way.

(4) One other aspect of the apostolic experience must be briefly noted. That revelation of the Son of God within him, how far was it a single event, a crisis of vision, how far was it a continuous process, a permanent communion? Along one line of imaginative interpretation, the disciple has Christ formed in him. Along another, he is the temple of the holy spirit. Do these terms designate different inward conditions, or the same? And if the latter, how is it that like effects can be ascribed to diverse causes? The peculiar relations between the Pauline conceptions of Christ and the Spirit will claim attention by-and-by. For the present it must suffice to remark that just as he believed that he was called to be an apostle through Jesus Christ and God the Father, so he also believed that he received teaching through the spirit (1 Cor. ii. 11–13):—

> For who among man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of the man, which is in him? even so, the things of God none knoweth, save the spirit of God. But we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God; that we might know the things that are freely given to us by God. Which things also we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which (the) spirit teacheth.

He lived in a solemn hour of the world's history. The mystery which had been kept in silence through times eternal was now displayed (Rom. xvi. 25, 1 Cor. ii. 7); it formed the very core and essence of his gospel. Well might he need an equipment of divine wisdom to comprehend it and to set it forth. If he is to be accounted a minister of Christ, he is in that capacity a steward of the mysteries of God (1 Cor. iv. 1), the lesser secrets of the vast design. Such a disclosure can he unfold to the Church at Corinth (1 Cor. xv. 51), concerning the destiny of the faithful when the last trump should sound. Like other functions, the word of wisdom, and prophecy which was distinguished from it (1 Cor. xii. 8, 10), were given by the same spirit, administered under the same Lord, wrought by the same God who worketh all things in all. But he was conscious that knowledge and prophesying, after all, were but in part. They had their season, like the thought and speech of a child. The operation even of God could not be more perfect than the medium which he used. No inspiration could transcend the limits laid on the present lot. The believer sees not the reality, but the reflection (1 Cor. xiii. 12); though the key of human destiny be in his hand, he is conscious that it unlocks only a part of the great riddle; not till that which is perfect is come will that which is in part be done away.

LITERATURE.

THE EVOLUTION OF THEOLOGY IN THE GREEK PHILOSOPHERS.*

FOURTEEN years ago Dr. Caird delivered two courses of Gifford Lectures at St. Andrew's University, which were afterwards published under the title of "The Evolution of Religion." To many readers who were still partly under the influence of Herbert Spencer those lectures were an epoch in their thought. They maintained that the true nature of religion is to be found, not in its germ, but in its completion, not in the beginning, but the end, not in a residuum or greatest common measure which exists in all religions from the lowest to the highest, but in the full flower of the most perfect thought. Dr. Caird was not afraid to apply the scientific doctrine of evolution to religion, and the result in his hands was not to break religion up into poor unworthy elements, to show that it was based on dreams or superstitious fears, but to vindicate the claims of the highest and most developed religions to be nearest to reality.

Now we have two further courses of Gifford lectures dealing with the development of theology instead of religion, and restricting the subject to the development of theological thought from the time of early Greek philosophy to the time of Plotinus.

Dr. Caird makes very clear his conviction that theology is of secondary importance to religion, but he also makes clear his conviction that at the present day no religion is safe without a theology. "Theology is not religion; it is at best the philosophy of religion, the reflective reproduction and explanation of it; and, as such, it is the product of a time that has outgrown simple faith, and begun to feel the necessity of understanding what it believes. Early religion does not trouble itself about its own justification; it does not even seek to make itself intelligible. Nevertheless man is from the first self-conscious, and he is continually on the way to become more clearly conscious of himself and of all the elements and phases of his being. : . : Even if we allow that reflective thought cannot originate any entirely new moral or religious movement, yet it is inevitable that it should become continually more powerful to disturb and modify religious faith, and that man's hold of beliefs which he cannot justify to himself should become more and more relaxed. Nay, it is inevitable that the results of reflective criticism should enter more and more deeply into the very substance of religion itself, so that it becomes scarcely possible for those who hold it to avoid theorising it."

Then he goes on, a little later, to make the rather startling statement that "Christianity was from the first what we may call a reflective religion" (i.e., a theology), "a religion which gathered into itself many of the results of both Eastern and Western thought. Strictly speaking, it has never been, and can never be, a religion of simple faith; or if it ever relapses into such a faith it immediately begins to lose its spiritual character, and to assimilate itself to religions that are lower in the scale. If a man yields to a fear of the dangers of reflection, with the doubt and perplexity that attend it, and declines into the easier path of reliance on some kind of authority, he will inevitably turn his creed into a dead formula, and his worship into a superstition." Dr. Caird does not offer any proof of his statement that "Christianity was from the first a reflective religion." He does not try to show, as one could have wished, that Jesus was a philosopher as well as a prophet. Presumably Dr. Caird must mean that Jesus initiated not only a new feeling towards God and man, but a new thought about God and man; that he was a great reflective thinker as well as a deeply inspired teacher. This position will hardly commend itself to those who lay chief stress on the simplicity and child-like spontaneity of Jesus, but we believe that Dr. Caird's conception of him as a noble intellect as well as a pre-eminent prophet is nearer to the truth than that of those who think of him mainly as a channel of divine grace, remarkable only for gentleness and love.

Dr. Caird is deeply concerned to show that religion has nothing to fear from reason, and believes that the reasoned dread of reason is one of the chief follies, and one of the chief dangers to religion, at the present day. "The movement of unconscious construction, faith, and intuition, and the movement of reflective analysis are not essentially opposed, but rather form the necessary complements of each other in the development of man's spiritual life. As it is essential to faith that it should develop into reason, so the criticism of faith, as it is a criticism by reason of its own unconscious products, cannot be ultimately destructive or merely negative in its effects." Dr. Caird's whole work is written in the spirit of Plato's famous words: "To hate reason is the greatest evil that can befall you." "In the long run," says Dr. Caird, "a living faith will absorb into itself the elements of the criticism which is directed against it, and will grow by their means into a higher form of religious life." Faith in the human faculties as in agreement so that one does not stultify the other is fundamental with Dr. Caird, and further he believes that the true needs and longings of the soul are one with the ultimate reality of things. "To hold that what we regard as best and highest is also the ultimate reality—the principle from which all comes, and on which all depends, is the great religious spring of moral energy." We are inclined to say, "Fiat justitia, ruat cœlum," as though man's moral nature were at irreconcilable war with the nature of things, as though we were alone moral in an immoral universe. We "forget that justice sustains the universe and cannot be the cause of its ruin." Herein the philosopher relying on reason is at one with the poet. It is the same teaching as that contained in the great lines of Wordsworth upon Duty:

> Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong;
> And the most ancient heavens, through Thee, > are fresh and strong.

In a much later part of the book, where Dr. Caird is speaking of Stoicism, he says: "The inmost secret of each man's heart is the secret of the whole world, and if we only go deep enough we can evoke an echo in every breast. It is this apparent paradox, that the most individual is the most universal which the Stoics brought to light, and by means of which they changed the whole tone and temper of earlier individualism."

We cannot deal in any detail with the lectures on Socrates or Plato or Aristotle. His remarks on Socrates are full of interest and modern significance. "Living in an age of enlightenment when the old guides of life, religion and law and custom, were losing their hold upon the mind of man, he was compelled to find a substitute for them by reflection upon the meaning and object of human existence. Hence he is the prophet of clear self-consciousness, who takes the Delphic epigram, 'Know thyself,' as his motto, and maintains that virtue must always be founded on knowledge." "A life without reflection upon the meaning of life," says Socrates, "is unworthy of a man." This revolt against authority is too individualistic and universal in its effect. It takes no account of unconscious morality or of the relationship of a man to the community. It puts aside the revelation of God through society or in history. It leads to a contempt for healthy social conventions, and to a rejection of everything that is old which makes for moral chaos. Dr. Caird shows how the teaching of Socrates, when accepted without support from a deeper religious philosophy in the place of that which he rejected, led in Cyrenaics and Cynics to a reductio ad absurdum of the Socratic idea of independence.

The lectures on Plato aim especially at describing and illustrating "two principles or tendencies, the union or coalescence of which gives its distinctive characterr to the Platonic philosophy. In the first place, his thought is always moving from the particular to the universal, from the part to the whole"; he is trying to show "the relative and illusive nature of the former as separated from the latter, and to reach a principle of unity deeper than all the differences of thought and things, a principle on which they depend and in relation to which alone they can be understood. And, in the second place, he is bent on establishing an ideal or spiritual conception of this principle of unity; or, in other words, on proving that thought or mind is the ultimate ground, at once the first and final cause of all reality." In other words, Plato believed in a principle of unity which comprehends thought and things, the mind and the universe, and he believed that this principle, this absolute, this ultimate ground, was thought or mind.

In a deeply interesting final chapter upon Christian theology Dr. Caird urges that the great controversies in the early Church about the Trinity and Incarnation were not controversies about words or vain subtleties introduced by degenerate Greek philosophy, as is sometimes supposed: "I do not believe that controversies about words ever occupy a great space in human history, although it is true that the controversies of the past often seem to us mere controversies about words. . . . The truth is that the question of the early Christian centuries was simply the great problem as to the relation of the human to the divine, of the spirits of men to the absolute Being, which is the greatest theme of modern philosophy; but in that age the opposing views could only take the form of different conceptions of the person of Christ." Dr. Caird is always optimistic in his reading of the history of thought. Where others would look with unintelligent and scornful eyes, and find only endless subtleties and ignorant wordiness, Dr. Caird finds real thought struging for expression. In the very difficulty of the attempt to express the truth amidst alien Greek ideas he finds encouragement. "Neo-Platonism," he says, "tended to break the unity of life and thought which Christianity sought to establish. . . . Yet even so it discharged a very useful office. In the region of spirit a victory won too easily is of little value. An optimism established without any difficulty becomes worse than any pessimism; an idealism that has not entered into all the differences of antagonism of the real is futile."[2] In an earlier lecture he had pointed out that "ancient philosophy was at once and almost without effort free, and perhaps its imperfection was partly due to the very ease with which it won its freedom. . . . As it did not pay a great price for its freedom, as it gained that freedom without any hard struggle with faith and social authority, its emancipation made it lose hold of reality."[2]

This certainly cannot be said of early Christian theology. As the early Christians had to defend their characters and Church in the face of a hostile world, so early Christian theology had to strive for a true expression of the new conceptions of life and God given through Christ, with the Greek philosophies which held the field of thought. Even though Christian theology may have been tinctured by alien elements, it is better so than that Christians should have speculated without interference or conflict. Greek philosophy, so we understand Dr. Caird to mean, had many truths to teach the early Christians, but even when its teaching appeared to be untrue it was yet rather a help than a hindrance to Christian theology, through the very effort which was required to rise beyond it.

Dr. Caird's book is, we need not say, the work of an eminent scholar and thinker, deeply read in Greek philosophy, and with great power of describing simply many different types of thought. It is also the work of a man who believes profoundly in the divine, and who finds in all great intellectual movements a witness to the reality of God and the greatness of man. Henry Gow.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

Sir,—I have read Mr. Simon's letter with great interest, but the first impression which it leaves on my mind is that of hopeless inability to suggest any remedy for a state of things admittedly serious and productive of much evil and distress. The natural order of things which brings about periodical fluctuations of harvests is apparently responsible for the existence in our midst of some ten million persons always on the borderland of dire poverty, always insufficiently fed, clothed, and housed, and liable, as regards great numbers of them, to slip at any time into entire want of work and wages, food, or any of the necessaries of life. It is a strong indictment against the natural order of things which might make us adopt John Stuart Mill's famous alternative that God could not be both omnipotent and all good, but must be either all good but not all powerful, or all powerful, but not all good. There is, however, an initial fallacy underlying the whole of your correspondent's arguments.

It is admitted that production, aided by the enormous increase in productive power which the modern industrial system has brought about, is sufficient to keep in the enjoyment of all that is necessary to a full and rich life all the human beings which exist upon the surface of the earth. Or, if the width of this statement be too vast to be adequately proved, let us confine it to the case of our own country. The national income has been variously estimated by different authorities, but the most recent and most reliable gives it as about £1,750,000,000 annually. This is what the natural order of things, aided by modern industry and exchange, places at the disposal of the people of this country. How is it distributed? The same authority gives the income of some six millions of the population in 1901 as £835,000,000, leaving £915,000,000 for thirty-five millions of the population.*

Wealth is the effect of labour of all kinds, all human energy and activity exercised upon land, with the assistance of capital. Is it seriously urged that this is a fair distribution? That the labour of the six millions or the use of their land and capital is justly remunerated by the share of nearly one-half of the total production of forty one-millions of human beings? I, for one cannot accept such a conclusion, and I therefore transfer the responsibility for the condition of affairs as regards poverty and unemployment from the natural order of things to the unnatural and man-made laws which govern at present in the distribution of wealth.

I have already occupied too much of your space on this subject, but I feel that I must deal with one point raised by your correspondent. It is not at all necessary to suppose that employers, knowingly and of set purpose, keep up fluctuations of employment in order to maintain a margin of unemployment at their disposal. No such supposition was stated in Mr. Benson's pamphlet or intended by me. Mr. Benson bases his argument upon a quotation from Mr. Charles Booth's "Life and Labour[2]: "Our modern system of industry will not work without some unemployed margin; some reserve of labour."[2]

It will be admitted that it is the interest and to a large extent the object of employers to obtain labour at as cheap a rate as possible, and that the competition of unemployed labour enables them to do this more effectually than if there were no unemployed labour to fall back upon. If no "blacklegs" were obtainable the strikers would always win, at least in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred.

We have an historical case in point. A study of the plague known as the "Black Death," in 1349, as detailed by Professor Thorold Rogers in "Six Centuries of Work and Wages,"[2] shows that the scarcity of labour brought about the fact that "the labourers were masters of the situation,"[2] and not even the severe terms of the Statute of Labourers, drawn up by a parliament of employers and enforced by the whole power of the Government, quite neutralised these effects. Parliament, says Professor Rogers, "constantly complained that the Statute of Labourers was not kept."[2] Wages and conditions of labour did not go back to those in existence before 1349, not, at least, until the last half of the eigtheenth century.

Abolish unemployment by giving that free access to the land which even the native in Africa has where the white man has not taken forcible possession, in the interest of and for the benefit of the community, and you give power to labour to insist that a fair share of the united production should be distributed to the thirty-five millions; and, leaving for separate treatment the question of the incorrigible, idle, and lazy at both extremes of the social scale, the problem before us at the moment would be solved.

Richard Robinson.

Sir,—I should have thought that the advantage to the capitalist of having a surplus of labour to draw upon whenever required was too obvious to admit of a moment's dispute. The whole system of capitalist commercialism, if not actually based on this "margin of unemployed," is clearly dependent upon it for its prosperity and success. Mr. Richard Simon maintains "without the least hesitation that the contrary is the case. Employers always wish to be able to give constant and regular employment." Well, of course they do. It is of no advantage to an employer to have to discharge hands. But just devise and carry out any scheme that would absorb every unemployed labourer for the benefit of the actual workers, and see whether the capitalist employer, for his own benefit, would not soon be crying out that you were bringing up wages and bringing down profits, and crippling the commercial enterprise of the country.

Mr. Simon says that the real cause of business fluctuations is the fluctuations of harvests. No doubt it is the greatest cause, because harvesting is the greatest by far of all our industries. But there are innumerable other causes operating all over the world, wars and the dread of wars being among the most potent. "When there is less wealth produced," says your correspondent, "there is less prosperity and less employment." Quite true. What, then, in the long run must be the effect of the destruction of "wealth" on such a scale as we recently had in South Africa, and are witnessing now in the Far East?

But the most curious thing in Mr. Simon's letter is that while he recognises that the world's harvests are the only fundamental source of wealth, he yet seems to deprecate the idea of getting the unemployed back to that fundamental source. He seems to sneer at the "pet" remedy raised in the cry "Back to the land," and urges again that the town-bred casual labourer is of little use there, and if he were of use could not be induced to stay there.

I have been maintaining for more years than I care to think about that "Back to the land" is the only true remedy for all the greatest of our social troubles. Men will stay there if the conditions are what they ought to be and easily might be, and they will prosper there. What the necessary conditions are is too large a question to enter upon here, but I cannot help saying that it is a great pity that, on so momentous a question as that of unemployment, those who can write, in one sense, so ably and lucidly as Mr. Simon does, should do so with so slight and superficial a knowledge of the subject. His letter is, as he admits, neither helpful nor sympathetic, and is likely, I fear, to be very misleading.

MR. N. M. TAYLER also sends us a letter on this subject, which concludes with the following alternative:—"Is a nation best off with production artificially low in price (caused by railway preferences) and with a great diminution of their natural labour? Or, Is a nation best off with no diminution of its natural labour and productions at prices caused by the natural flow of trade? That is, free trade not artificially interfered with by duties or by preferences over national highways, or in other unfair ways.

OUR readers will see with regret the announcement of the death of Mr. Frederick Fordham, which occurred at his residence, The Old Bank House, Royston, on Sunday morning last. He was one of the few whose active, energetic life, extended from quite the beginning of the nineteenth century, on into the twentieth, and linked the present with an age that has passed into the realm of history. We shall give some short accounts of his life next week.

EXILES as yet from the spirit of unanxious joy, we catch but echoes of that heavenly peace, yet even now the free heart of the happy and triumphant shall be ours, in proportion as we are true to the conditions of faithful service.—Martineau.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN

THE MASS OF THE FALL.

A GANG of rooks were perched on the topmost branches of the warden oaks as I reached the edge of the wood one brilliant October morning. Like their human cousins, that other class of beings who go on two feet and wear black coats, these grave counsellors know that a festival is not duly kept without the help of something indigestible to eat—be it mince-pie, haggis, or acorns. They chose the last to celebrate the fall of the leaf, and so wrapt up in the subject were they and so talkative, as though bragging to the idle porkers below that an acorn-digestion was no monopoly of theirs, that for awhile they paid no attention to me. Ah! the porkers—he and she with as sturdy a farrow of sixteen piglings as you ever saw free of the stye, and all as black as crows, too, were munching, crunching, burbling, and grunting, rooting and racing, with a day-long zest and industry which would have graced a higher cause, and therefore was all the more commendable in such a lowly pursuit as theirs. But see! pigs and rooks may go where they will. The forest on fire! Every branch a cresset, every leaf a tongue of flame. On through avenues which of late were the solemn haunt of shadows, the green abode of peace, now glowing like a potter's furnace. But no; these flames burn not. It was the pageant of the Spirit of the Woods, whose palaces were blazing through all their glorious arcades, their halls and galleries and cloisters with a dazzling mosaic of garnet and amber and topaz set in shields of burnished copper and gold. Hither came the Sun and the Wind to hold the High Mass of the Fall. This was the day of the Sun, and his very heart went out to the children whom he had raised to bless him.

Next day came his brother High Priest the Wind. The Sun sat on his throne, and watched and heightened with his smiles the lively ceremony. The word went forth, the boughs were swaying, and in a flickering, flashing stream down came the leaves—myriads, myriads of glittering wings in ceaseless flight. Amber and garnet and topaz were shaken out of their places, flung on to the earth in handfuls by the whistling giant. The branches grew bare. I stood at the feet of the King of the Beeches, and, looking up, saw, as it were, the fair blue land of heaven traversed by deep dark rivers. Then, as the last of the host flittered to the earth, I sought of them their secret and all the meaning of the pageant. I cannot tell you all they said, but this I will tell you to-day. High on the great waving boughs where, six months since the buds uncurled, the leaves had grown and greened, and then sat watching every shifting shadow, following every moving form in earth and sky. Day by day they had peered up into the blue ocean above, or at the rolling billows of storm-driven clouds. Night by night stars had travelled over them, flashing hints of time and eternity. Again and again the moon had played before them her drama of the Sickle and the Shield, while the sun had set them shadow puzzles on stem and ground. Raindrops with pattering shoes had lightly danced and slid over them, while the wind was playing the music for the waltz. And last, but not least, in their midst had sung the birds, telling everything they knew—the ditties of the brooding and the hunger of the fledglings, the call for call of woodland mates, the challenge of the sentries of the trees, the chorus of the mornings, and the rush of wings. And so said the leaves as they fell: "We have seen all the sun-gleams; we have heard all the wind's words; we have learnt all the bird-songs; we have watched the never, never-resting stars. And all we have seen and heard we have treasured up, and now that we can hold no more—for, see, how we're loaded with golden secrets—we are taking them down to our great mother Earth that she may feed with the harvest of the air the flowers and fruits which presently she will cherish on her breast.

Then came the woodfolk with barrow and cart and sack, men, women, and children, raking together the precious leaves from dawn to dark, gathering up with handboards, gathering up by armfuls, labouring fast and labouring long to forestall the rain, storing and stacking this dry, comfortable bedding for their beasts, this food of life for their orchards and gardens.

On one of these mornings as I came out on to the green I caught sight of Moses, the village neatherd, with his bleached curly hair and his russet face, with his smock and his stick, and his ancient felt hat, a perfect waterproof surely, and which no one has ever seen off his head, unless by accident, either indoors or out. "Ah, Moses," I said, "is that you? A breezy day; the woods have been in splendid form this autumn."

The old peasant stopped till I came up to him, and then, in his deliberate way, said. "We do read in the Book as 'ow the bush were afire, but never so much as scorched, as Moses saw. 'Moses' be my name tew, and seems to me, master, there's a power o' God in these here woods, but ne'er a branch He'll hurt what tempers the wind to the shorn lamb."

THE Rev. Joseph H. Crooker, D.D., and his wife, the Rev. Florence Kallock Crooker, have just taken charge of two churches in Boston, Mass., which are less than two miles apart, and easily ministered unto from a common home. Mrs. Crooker is minister of the Jamaica Plain Universalist Church, and Dr. Crooker, of the Roslindale Unitarian Church, an off-shoot of the old West Roxburg parish, of which Theodore Parker was minister. The present Roslindale Church is only about half a mile from the meeting-house in which Parker preached. The present address of Dr. and Mrs. Crooker is 7, Alveston-street, Jamaica Plain, Boston, Mass., U.S.A.

A TRUE REVIVAL

THE dangers of Revival excitement are pointed out, with a note of wholesome warning, in the Rev. GEORGE CRITCHLEY'S address, here published in full. Mr. CRITCHLEY speaks from long experience, going back to earlier Revival movements, with which, as formerly a Congregational minister, he was in close personal contact, and his testimony should be considered with very serious attention. From Wales, also, the scene of the present great Revival, we have received several testimonies of great interest, telling how this extraordinary movement has variously impressed earnest observers. We have the opportunity now of studying, amid present-day conditions of life, the phenomena of intense excitement, which have repeatedly made their appearance from the earliest times in connection with religious movements, and by no means always within the circle of Christian faith.

In Wales the latest sensation appears to be "an ordinary peasant woman," Mrs. JONES, of Egryn, who yet is celebrated as "the Welsh Seeress," for she is accompanied by strange lights, and is said to refuse to go to any meeting unless her star is there to go before her. And this thing grows. Mr. BERIAH G. EVANS, who declares that he has himself seen the lights, and from whatever source derived, knows them to be objective realities, gravely reported in Thursday's Daily News that on Saturday at a village near Dolgelly "the brilliant effulgence of a star paled the lights of the room" occupied by Mrs. JONES, and that as she returned from a meeting "her carriage was suddenly bathed in brilliant light descending from a radiant ball in the heavens." After another meeting a professional gentleman on his way home "suddenly saw a gigantic figure rising over a hedgerow, with right arm extended over the road. Then a ball of fire appeared above, a long white ray descended and pierced the figure, which vanished." The implication is that the "gigantic figure" was not the man's own shadow in a mist, for it is said to have been seen simultaneously by "a prominent local farmer" from another standpoint. EVAN ROBERTS also has his visions, if we are to trust the newspapers. Quite early in the movement one correspondent reported ROBERTS as telling how (apparently as a common experience) when he went out into the garden he saw the devil grinning at him, but was not afraid; for he went back into the house. and when he went out again he saw JESUS CHRIST smiling at him. "Then I know all is well."

We may be inclined to turn away from such reports as due to crazy hallucinations, or may be interested to find that the "Welsh fires" have a perfectly natural explanation; but such considerations must not blind us to the fact that the Revival, in spite of these strange accompaniments, has far-reaching practical results, which we are encouraged to think will be of permanent good in the life of the people. As long ago as Dec. 15 "J. B." wrote in the Christian World of the intense happiness this Revival had brought to the common people, and of its moral effect upon their lives:—

"In Wales just now the people are deserting the theatres, the public-houses, even the football matches. Why? Simply because they have found a joy, a mental fulness so engrossing, that these things have in comparison become suddenly inferior. And is it not something for those toil-worn, grimy colliers to enter into an inner paradise whose beauty not the gloom of the pit can dim? To give men a gladness of the finest type, a gladness independent of wealth, of position, of luxury, of climate, is not this something? There is nothing in the world so great, so wonderful. These people have received that glimpse of the eternal world which, as a great writer has said, 'is enough to turn to nothingness all that this world can give.'

"And this joy is the power-centre of morality. It is here that the Christian revival is so differentiated from those earlier pagan ones. The point is that the emotion centres round the New Testament ideas, and they represent always the highest ethic. In the Welsh valleys, under this influence, we hear of reconciliations, of family reunions, of a sudden stop to drink, blasphemy, and brutality, And that is an old story. It is the story of Quakerism and of Methodism. It was the early Christian story. Far back in the early centuries ATHENAGORAS thus writes of the work in his time: 'But among us you will find uneducated persons, artisans and old women who, if they are unable in words to prove the truth of our doctrine, yet by their deeds exhibit the benefit arising from their persuasion of its truth; they do not rehearse speeches, but exhibit good works; when struck they do not strike again; they give to those that ask of them, and love their neighbours as themselves.'"

We must hope that when the great excitement of the Revival dies away, the hold of the better life that it has given to the people will not be relaxed, but they will know that it is always better to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with GOD, even in His ordinary world as He has ordered it for normal folk. For ourselves, we recall the old prophet's experience, that GOD was not in the earthquake or the fire, but in "the still small voice," and that other great word with which Mr. CRITCHLEY concludes his address, that "the Kingdom of GOD cometh not with observation."

IN MEMORY OF FRANCES POWER COBBE.

WITH the idea of commemorating the work of the late Miss Frances Power Cobbe in those fields of religious thought, where she was a helpful and inspiring guide to many men and women of our time, a Committee has been formed to collect a fund and found a Memorial Prize.

Miss Cobbe's writings on religion were devoted to the preaching of that Natural Religion which is embodied in every form of creed. All those who recognise a divine life and order in the world may join in honouring her name. The evidence of a Divine Will and purpose in nature and in man, the testimonies of conscience and experience to the realities of the spiritual life; it is on these great matters that her books turn, and through two generations of English people she did much to deepen faith and to uphold the standard of truth.

The Committee aim at the collection of a fund sufficient to supply an annual prize, open to all students and members under six years' standing, in the colleges for women connected with the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and Trinity College, Dublin; the prize to be given to the best essay on any subject ethical, psychological, or philosophical, bearing on the evidence of Natural Religion.

Such a prize, open to such candidates would, the Committee believe, be an appropriate means of continuing the work, as well as perpetuating the memory of a representative woman, distinguished for her wise advocacy of the rights of woman to equal treatment in higher education, as well as in the broad field of civic life.

REVIVALISM.*

BY THE REV. GEORGE CRITCHLEY, B.A.

THE subject for our consideration this evening is "The Good and Evil of Modern Revivalism." I sincerely wish that the task of opening this conference had been placed in abler hands than mine, and that some authorised representative of rational religion had been commissioned to speak the word of counsel and direction needed by the public on this matter at the present time. However, since nothing of the kind seems to be forthcoming, and the movement is now actually in course of progress, I venture to direct attention to certain features of it which appear to me worthy of remark. And in the first place I would say that there are circumstances in which the wakening of enthusiasm, even of excitement, is by no means to be deprecated, for it is by this means great causes are often carried on to victory; and few, perhaps none, achieve success until the fires of emotion rouse the energies of intellectual conviction and overcome the difficulties which prejudice and ignorance, apathy and self-interest, are sure to place in their way.

Awakening Force of Emotion.

This is abundantly confirmed by past experience. The Reform Bill of 1832, the Abolition of Slavery under Wilberforce, the Repeal of the Corn Laws in 1846, and many measures of a similar character were carried amidst whirlwinds of excitement, and without the forces of emotion, which were behind them, the intellectual arguments would have had very small effect.

Hence, if Revivalism means no more than the wakening and kindling of enthusiasm for a solid truth or a just cause, it is altogether to the good. We ourselves are, of course, ideal specimens of sweet reasonableness, but a little "fire" would not do us any harm.

Good Servant: Bad Master.

But at the same time there is an ever-present danger in emotionalism, for like all other "fires," while a good servant, it is a bad master; it is a first-rate driving power, but it is very apt to run away with the machine. It easily passes over to hysteria, breaks utterly loose from the control of reason, and when people are brought together in any considerable numbers is a disease of a terribly contagious character. A specialist in mental pathology could tell us, no doubt, how and why one passes over into the other, but the fact that they do so, and do so, under certain circumstances with quite startling regularity, is manifest to every intelligent observer. We are not so far away from those sad and disgraceful days, which added the new word "mafficking" to our language, as to be forgetful of this fact.

But, unfortunately, it appears that the religious emotions are most in danger of contracting this disease of contagious hysteria, and whether they are aware of it or not, it is at inducing this condition the ordinary revivalists aim, and on it they depend for their success. Regularly, since Peter the Hermit preached the First Crusade, since the Flagellants sprinkled the road from Perugia with their blood, since the great upheavals accompanying the Reformation, the two things have always gone together.

Nay, right back to that dim past in which religion is traceable at all, and right down to the present time, revivalism has been so closely associated with these abnormal mental conditions, that it is with difficulty to be distinguished from them, and, indeed, there has been little care to make any such distinction, for as a rule the revivalist regards the unbalanced, hysterical state of mind as identical with the work of the Spirit of God upon the human soul. And more, he often lays himself out deliberately to produce it, either by sensuous descriptions of celestial joy or by preaching the awfulness of God and the terrors and torments of an eternal hell. In this connection, much use is made of the words which the author of the fourth Gospel puts upon the lips of Christ, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth, so is every one that is born of the Spirit"—as if that passage settled the question, and compelled us to refer these phenomena to the realms of awe and mystery, almost of miracle, before which it was sheer irreverence to say a word.

Of What Spirit?

But apart from the inaccuracy of that statement, and the consequent futility of its comparison, there is this fact to be observed. Granting, that within the limits of Christianity these manifestations of excited emotion are effected by the Spirit of God, whence do they come when they appear in other religions? Is the fervour of a Mohammedan Revival, the faithfulness even unto death, which has characterised Persian Babism, the passionate self-devotion recorded again and again in connection with so many of the great religions of the world, all to be set down to insanity and the devil, while what are essentially phenomena of the same kind, occurring within the boundaries of Christianity, are to be counted as the work of God? All scepticism and scorn for those, all reverence and respect for these?

It is a question to be asked. For in anything else but religion, we should regard all such strikingly similar manifestations as proceeding from the same source; we should take it for granted that they were ruled by the same laws; we should eliminate the idea of the miraculous from them altogether, and then submit them to the same kind of examination. It is only in some such way that their real nature and value can be properly ascertained.

Now it will be found, I believe, that when these Revivals are closely investigated, they fall into two pretty clearly defined classes, viz., those that are spontaneous, rising among the people on the spot, and usually originating with some peculiar personality; and those that are brought in of deliberate purpose from outside, and are avowedly designed to bring people over to a certain set of feelings and beliefs. In comparison with the spontaneous movements, these appear to be artificial manufactured, and carry the stamp of their origin upon them from first to last. Curiously enough, we have a specimen of each before us at the present time. The Welsh Revival appears to be thoroughly spontaneous, a genuine home-growth, saturated through and through with the peculiar characteristics of the people among whom it has arisen. The movement of Dr. Torrey is as distinctly an importation, and presents some features which invite remark.

Manufactured Revival.

1st. There is the rather unpleasantly business aspect which the movement has assumed; long preliminary announcements; extensive advertisement; large expenditure, £17,000 for the London campaign alone, I understand; distinguished patronage; use of one of the most imposing buildings in London; choir of 3,000, and all the rest. All things well calculated to stir excitement, to bring vast crowds together, to disturb the mental equilibrium of the susceptible, to secure success of a certain sort; all things singularly in line with the methods of the American hustler, but as singularly alien to the methods and temper of the Man of Nazareth as can possibly be conceived.

Oliver Wendell Holmes once said, that "he wondered whether it was the destiny of America to vulgarise the world." Certainly this seems like vulgarising religion, turning it into a common show.

Mischievous Obscurantism.

2nd. There is another matter, however, of much more serious consequence. Dr. Anderson quotes Sir Leslie Stephen to the effect that "Every revival of religion is characterised by an intellectual reaction"; and the Doctor asks the question, "Is it necessarily so? Is religion inevitably retrograde?" I should be sorry to think it was, for in that case, since intellectual progress is one of the few certainties of the future, religion would ultimately become an impossibility for educated and thoughtful men and women. But I am bound to say that the religion with which Dr. Torrey's revivalism is identified is obscurantist and reactionary to a very remarkable degree.

Some time ago very considerable interest was aroused by a series of articles in the Clarion newspaper from the pen of Mr. Blatchford. It was, as of course you will remember, a wholesale attack on religion in general and Christianity in particular. Now one strong point in the defence made by such men as Dr. Warschauer and others, one most effective point was that so far as Christianity was concerned, Mr. Blatchford had levelled his assault on doctrines which the churches had long outgrown; that he was fighting the ghosts of defunct dogmas, not the living ideas of the religion of to-day.

But in Dr. Torrey's teaching, it is these very doctrines which re-appear: Substitutionary atonement in its crudest form; verbal inspiration of the Scriptures; miracles as a violation of natural law; resurrection as the actual resuscitation of the body of Jesus after three days, and of the bodies of believers at the last day; and the eternal torment of all those who reject Jesus as their Saviour.

* A Paper read at the Central Postal Mission Conference at Essex Hall on Thursday evening, February 9.

Surely, if these doctrines are the gospel of this revivalist, and are to become fundamental in the English Christianity of the future (which they will, in so far as Dr. Torrey is successful), then Mr. Blatchford did not attack what was outworn and outgrown, and we are lifted back to the darkness of fifty or sixty years ago.

This is a serious matter, for one of two things will result, either the progress of religious thought will be indefinitely arrested, and the work of two generations will be undone; or, what is far more likely, after a little there will come a great awakening to the monstrous nature of these doctrines, and the revolt against Christianity will become more absolute and more determined than it has ever been before.

The Stamp of Intolerance.

3rd. There is, in this particular movement, something which to my own mind is darker still. I mean the utter want of kindliness and charity with which those who differ from Dr. Torrey are treated in his remarks. Specimen passages are doubtless familiar to you already, as, e.g., this:—"The Bible is God's word. Show me one who denies it, or persistently questions it, and I will show every time a man who is living either, I don't say all, either a life of greed for gold, or a life of lust, or a life of self-will, or a life of spiritual pride, and I will challenge you to show me an exception."

And this about ourselves. "Jesus Christ was God incarnate, God manifest in the flesh possessed of all the perfections of Deity. The heaviest, most decisive, most damning sin was the sin of rejecting the only begotten son of God. Jesus Christ himself would be their judge. It would be an awful day for the men who tried to make people doubt Christ's well-proven Deity, who trampled him under foot and rejected him because they loved sin."

We read in the old story of one who looked on a great city and wept over it, because the things which made for its peace were hidden from the people's eyes. There is no weeping here! It is all hard, merciless, cruel; the temper which in other days would have meant persecution; and even now, in so far as it spreads abroad, will mean strife, alienation, bitterness of feeling, the saddening of many souls which the Lord hath not made sad.

The Welsh Revival Spontaneous.

The Welsh Revival is of a different kind. It is of the class I have ventured to call spontaneous. It was heralded by no noise and flourish. It has been marked throughout by a certain simplicity which compels one to lenient criticism. It is pleaded that it is thoroughly Welsh in character, and should be judged with a sympathetic recognition of the highly strung constitution of this fervid race. Evan Roberts, with whom it appears to have originated, is a young man of twenty-six, who was earning his living as a coal miner. His characteristics are certainly not those of the ordinary professional revivalists, but rather reveal strong affinities to those of the visionaries who have played so large a part in the religious history of many lands. He has recently been giving an account of his experiences, in which he says: "I said to myself, I will have the Spirit. One Friday night last spring, when praying by my bedside before retiring, I was taken up to a great expanse without time or space. It was communion with God. I was frightened that night, but never since. So great was my shivering that I rocked the bed, and my brother being awakened took hold of me, thinking I was ill."

Then Mr. Roberts tells how he went to school at Newcastle Emlyn, and one morning, with others, held a prayer meeting at a Welsh village. "As one and another prayed I put the question to the Spirit, 'Shall I pray now?' 'Wait awhile,' was the reply. When others prayed I felt a living force come into my bosom. It held my breath and my legs shivered, and after every prayer I asked, 'Shall I now?' I fell on my knees with my arms over the seat in front of me, and the tears and perspiration flowed freely. I thought blood was gushing forth. A lady came to wipe my face. For about two minutes it was fearful. I cried 'Bend me, bend me.'"

Now I desire to speak very gently of all this. For the mind is carried back to Paul, to Mahommed, to Joan of Arc, to George Fox and others in the one direction, but it is also carried to hysterical manifestations of a much lower character upon the other. And I am sure, that if it were not connected with religion, we should regard that description as symptomatic of mental disturbance and disease. Such a subject, endowed as he is with undoubted gifts of persuasive speech, set amongst a people of high nervous susceptibility, is bound to become the centre of wide-spread influence, and we learn that up to the present time something like 70,000 "conversions" have been the result. I cannot judge. I think the man is honest and sincere. But I cannot think that it is wholesome religion. It seems to me an instance of hysterical contagion on the largest scale presented to us in modern times.

Effects that are Good.

Turning now to the effects of these movements, I note two certainly upon the side of good. First, anything that arouses a vivid interest in the subject of religion is distinctly to the good. Our deadliest foe is not ignorance, not opposition, not even falsehood, but apathy and indifference. These will, for the time being, be broken up to a very considerable extent. A breach has been made in the solid wall of selfish materialism, which was imprisoning and even stifling the finer faculties of human nature. Questions of the spiritual life will become possible of discussion. Matters of experimental religion will receive attention. And good must come of the fact that thought has been directed to those subjects which lie underneath the external interests of human life.

Then, secondly, so far as the Welsh Revival is concerned the ethical effects seem, upon the whole, distinctly to the good. I do not attach very great importance to the surrender of games, amusements, and the like, but we are told that debts are being paid, drinking has decreased, the police-courts are less frequented, men are giving more care and affection to their families and their homes, and if that be so, and the impulse to these better ways outlives the period of excitement, so that they become the habit of these people's lives, then we should be churls and fools did we not confess that this is to be counted on the side of good.

Evil Effects.

On the other side the evils to be counted are as follows:—

1st. Both the Welsh and American forms of the present Revival tend to fix false and superstitious ideas of religion upon the public mind. The theology of both is essentially the same, and, though the repulsive features of it are put forth less obtrusively in the Welsh than in the American variety, yet the same blighting influences are there, and the same demoralising effects will sooner or later be produced. These movements are far less a revival of religion, than a revival of barbaric ideas about religion, and to just the degree to which they prevail so will they inevitably produce mischievous reaction along all the lines of human life and thought.

2nd. They both tend, although the tendency is far more manifest in the American variety than in the other, yet they both tend to generate a narrow, bitter spirit toward all who differ from certain particular views of truth. Says Dr. Torrey: "Find a man who has entirely surrendered his will to God, who is leading a life of self-renunciation, of devotion to God and his fellow-man, of humility and prayer, and in every instance you will find a man who is fully convinced that the Bible is God's word. An exception to this cannot be found." Mark the implication there: Every heretic is potentially or actually a bad man, or at best not so good a man as he who agrees with the orthodox view. There it is, "Stand by thyself, for I am holier than thou." This proud, self-righteous spirit lives and breathes at the heart of all revivalism, and easily passes over into injustice, cruelty, and wrong.

3rd. States of high emotional excitement are as a rule followed by corresponding degrees of depression. The reaction comes. People feel that they have been through the whole experience, exhausted all its possibilities, and presently discover that they are less capable of feeling than before. Mr. Stead has given a list of what he calls the "Fruits of Revivals." There seems to me as much connection between some of these events as between the Goodwin Sands and Tenterden Steeple. But instances can be given beyond dispute upon the other side, that so far as religion is concerned, these great waves of excited feeling have been followed repeatedly by disastrous seasons of reaction and decay. My own experience of those years which followed the Moody and Sankey movement in London was that they were some of the most unfruitful and troublesome that I have known. The people who came into the church from those great, excited assemblies, found the ordinary church life tame and commonplace, they became discontented and sometimes disputatious, and in a year or two most of them were gone. And I very much suspect that the majority of them drifted out of religion altogether.

4th. There is another point which I mention with all due caution and reserve. I mean the question of insanity as a very possible result from these periods of high-strung excitement. The evidence is conflicting up to the present, and statistics will not be available for some time to come. But as I have already pointed out, the whole thing is on the borderland of the hysterical, and that easily passes over into graver forms of mental disease. I repeat it is not wholesome religion.

I turn from this noise and stir, these strange coarse passions, these vociferous appeals, and from the dim past there comes another voice: "If any shall say unto you, Lo Christ is here or there, believe them not, for the kingdom of God cometh not with observation."

MUSINGS.

By a Minister.

XV.

In the writings of St. Paul "Doctrine" may be taken as the language of thought; "Speaking in a Tongue" as the language of feeling; and "Prophesying" as the language of thought and feeling combined.

As to doctrine, or teaching, there can be no doubt. It was definite instruction. In three places teachers are spoken of as recognised workers. Soundness was to be aimed at, and by "sound" doctrine was meant doctrine that was "healthful."

As to speaking in a tongue there is less certainty. We need not suppose that the Apostles and their immediate followers, under direct inspiration, spoke foreign languages which they had never learned, but it is easier to say what glossolaly was not, than to say what it was. It was impassioned utterance, vehement, incoherent, often inarticulate. Outwardly there was little to distinguish it from raving. It needed an interpreter. A bystander would sometimes catch its meaning, or the congregation would divine it for itself, but more frequently the sounds uttered were wholly unintelligible. And yet the effect of this rapturous babbling may well have exceeded that of the highest eloquence. It was, to begin with, a sign of supernatural possession. Apart from this, interpreted or not, it told its own tale sufficiently well. For indeed there is no grammar of emotion. It is best understood when it is exhibited, and not described. A look, a gesture, the catching of the breath, the breaking of the voice, move us more than the most finished declamation. Cries and shouts and groans make the whole world kin. Children tell us most about themselves before they learn to talk, when grief and joy are not yet stifled, and sobbing and laughter alike are uncontrolled. Nature also affects us more by mysteries of sound than by revelations of sight. Even in her silence there is significance—

> . . . the silence and the calm
> Of mute insensate things.

Wind and sea and rain and riving frost and muttering thunder speak in a tongue. There is neither speech nor language, but their voices are heard. There may be something of this in the Apostle's mind when he says: "There are, it may be, so many kinds of voices in the world, and nothing is without voice." Animals also are not slow to interpret. To natural notes they have nature's key, and artificial sounds they learn to discriminate. The so-called Gift of Tongues may have been nothing more than exuberant emotion expressing itself in natural, undesigned ways. This unpremeditated, almost involuntary, escape of feeling could not be forbidden, but neither was it to be encouraged; all that the Apostle can do is to compare it with prophesying, with preference for the latter.

Prophesying was the communication of thought exalted by feeling, or we may say that it was the communication of feeling tempered by thought. It had nothing to do with prediction. It was not preaching, for it was a gift which every member of the congregation might exercise in turn. It was the happy power of imparting to others your own earnest conviction of God's own truth—as intimations reached you of His will, and apprehensions of His word. It was the mean between two extremes—intellectualism on the one side, emotionalism on the other. The Apostle felt that he could with confidence say, "Despise not prophesyings"; "he that prophesieth speaketh unto men edification, and comfort, and consolation"; for there can be no edification without the language of thought, and there can be no comfort, and consolation, without the language of feeling, and in prophesying both languages are moderated and preserved.

Of doctrine in modern worship there is no lack. Whether, as the exposition of correct thinking, or, as the exposure of incorrect thinking, it is always "sound," i.e., "healthful," is another matter. Speaking in a tongue we also in some measure possess. Music is a tongue, to some interpreted, to some unknown. Anthems, to those who listen, are mostly songs without words, yet not without meaning. Sermons, it sometimes happens, are not heard, or not followed, and yet are understood. The rise and fall of many voices in praise or prayer is a confused sound, but it conveys a sense, not to be mistaken. It would be wrong to say that the spirit has not its own avenues of intelligence, and another medium than that of articulate speech.

But what of prophesying? The very word has passed out of use. Nor would I like to say that the primitive practice ought to be revived. The conditions of the upper room in Corinth or Thessalonica are not those of the churches of to-day. And yet feeling amongst us may have been too much repressed. Then has come recoil into the glossolaly of the revival meeting and the mission hall, where the language of thought is in its turn almost lost. Something between frigid reserve and weak effusiveness—fervour without frenzy—is sadly needed. "They that feared the Lord spake often one to another." Ministerial doctrine may be very well, but congregational prophesying, with or without the name, is a vital thing, absolutely necessary for edification, comfort, and consolation.

THE WILL TO BELIEVE AND THE DUTY TO DOUBT.

The first of the two phrases which are coupled together at the head of this paper stands as the title of a famous essay by Professor William James, of Harvard, republished together with a number of other essays from his pen in a volume under the same title in 1896. This volume is of moderate size, but of very great importance since it seems likely to initiate a movement which is calculated to effect a deep change in the methods of philosophic thought, and a change which will do much to commend those methods to the average Englishman.

In order to have the question fairly before us we must begin with a few quotations.

Mr. James vigorously preaches "the liberty of believing," "the lawfulness of voluntarily adopted faith," "the right to adopt a believing attitude in religious matters in spite of the fact that our merely logical intellect may not have been coerced." "I wish to make you feel," he says, "that we have a right to believe the physical order to be only a partial order; that we have a right to supplement it by an unseen spiritual order which we assume, on trust, if only thereby life may seem worth living again." "The thesis I defend is briefly stated thus:—Our emotional nature not only may, but must, decide an option between propositions whenever it is a genuine option which cannot by its nature be decided on intellectual grounds; for to say, under such circumstances, 'Do not decide, but leave the question open,' is itself an emotional decision just like deciding yes or no, and is attended with the same risk of losing the truth." The statements thus broadly made require of course, certain qualifications and limitations. "I admit," says Professor James, "that if I were addressing the Salvation Army or a miscellaneous popular crowd, it would be a misuse of opportunity to preach the liberty of believing as I have in these pages preached it. What such audiences most need is that their faiths should be broken up and ventilated, that the north-west wind of science should get into them and blow their sickliness and barbarism away." But other audiences have a very different need. "Paralysis of their native capacity for faith and timorous aboulia in the religious field are their special forms of mental weakness." Further, the liberty of believing covers only "genuine options" which the intellect of the individual is unable by itself to resolve. What is a "genuine option"? Let us give the name of hypothesis to anything that may be proposed to our belief; and just as the electricians speak of live and dead wires, let us speak of hypotheses as either "live" or "dead." A live hypothesis is one which appeals as a living possibility to him to whom it is proposed. "If I ask you to believe in the Mahdi the notion makes no electric connection with your nature; it refuses to scintillate with any credibility at all; as an hypothesis it is completely dead. To an Arab, however (even if he be not one of the Mahdi's followers), the hypothesis is among the mind's possibilities—it is alive." Let us call the decision between two hypotheses an "option."

Now a "genuine option" is one which is "living," which is "forced," which is "momentous." "A living option is one in which both hypotheses are live ones. If I say to you, 'Be a theosophist or be a Mohammedan,' it is probably a dead option, because for you neither hypothesis is likely to be alive; but if I say, 'Be an agnostic or be a Christian,' it is otherwise; trained as you are, each hypothesis makes some appeal, however small, to your belief." "Next, if I say to you, 'Either accept this truth or go without it,' I put on you a forced option, for there is no standing place outside the alternative"; but if some one says, "Either love me or hate me," the option is avoidable, for you may remain indifferent to him. "Finally,"[2] says Mr. James, "if I were Dr. Nansen and proposed to you to join my North Pole expedition, your option would be momentous; for this would probably be your only similar opportunity, and your choice now would either exclude you altogether (from reaching the North Pole) or put at least the chance of it into your hands. He who refuses to embrace a unique opportunity loses the prize as surely as if he tried and failed. Per contra, the option is trivial when the opportunity is not unique, or when the issue is insignificant, or when the decision is reversible if it later prove unwise." In such questions as those at issue within the realm of physical science this is almost always the case.

Once more: the author applies his principle only to genuine options which are of such a kind that they cannot and never could be decided on "intellectual" grounds alone. The word "intellectual" is here carelessly used; he means on grounds of what science calls "observation and experiment," that is, by appeal only to visible and tangible facts of the material world.

Such an option, living, forced, and momentous, is the acceptation or rejection of the religious view of life. What are the essentials of this view? They are stated first in a very general and then in a more definite way. "Perfection is eternal: the morally best things are the more eternal things, the overlapping things, the things in the universe that throw the last stone, so to speak, and say the final word." "The so-called order of nature, which constitutes this world's experience, is only one portion of the total universe and there stretches beyond this visible world an unseen world in its relation to which the true significance of our present mundane life consists." "That God be conceived as the deepest power in the universe; and that He be conceived under the form of a mental personality. The personality need not be determined intrinsically any further than is involved in the holding of certain things dear, and in the recognition of our disposition towards those things, the things themselves being all good and righteous things." "A power not ourselves which not only makes for righteousness but means it, and which recognises us." "In whatever other respects the Divine personality may differ from ours or may resemble it, the two are consanguineous at least in this—that both have purposes for which they care, and each can hear the other's call."

There is no "scientific evidence" by waiting upon which we may hope to have these beliefs proved or disproved. To wait, or to doubt, is to reject them, because if we really doubt them they cannot influence our lives; to accept them is to allow our intelligence to enter into their meaning, and to realise them in our total conscious life, and then they come to be our chief working power. We have willed to believe. What is the result? Our attitude towards concrete evils is entirely different, in a world where there are none but finite demanders, from what it is in a world where we joyously face struggle and even tragedy for an infinite demander's sake. "This is why, in a merely human world without a God, the appeal to our moral energy falls short of its maximal stimulating power. Life, to be sure, is even in such a world a genuinely ethical symphony; but it is played in the compass of a couple of poor octaves, and the infinite scale of values fails to open up. Many of us, indeed, like Sir James Stephen, in those eloquent "Essays by a Barrister," would openly laugh at the very idea of the strenuous mood being awakened in us by those claims of remote posterity which constitute the last appeal of the religion of humanity. We do not love those men of the future keenly enough; and we love them perhaps the less the more we hear of their evolutionised perfection, their high average longevity, and education, their freedom from war and crime, their relative immunity from pain and zymotic disease, and all their other negative superiorities. This is all too finite, we say; we see too well the vacuum beyond. When, however, we believe that a God is there and that He is one of the claimants, the infinite perspective opens out. The scale of the symphony is incalculably prolonged. The more imperative ideals now begin to speak with an altogether new objectivity and significance, and to utter the penetrating, shattering, tragical note of appeal. They ring out like the call of Victor Hugo's Alpine eagle, qui parle au précipice et que le gouffre entend, and the strenuous mood awakens at the sound." Such is the issue of the Will to Believe. Every sort of energy and endurance, of courage and capacity for handling life's evils, is set free in those who have religious faith.

After this brief but sympathetic exposition of the point of view which Professor James is concerned to defend, let us hear what is said by his critics on behalf of the Duty to Doubt. Professor D. S. Miller says: "No one can retort that the mind does not arrive at convictions in the way indicated by Mr. James; the process is all too easy, the issue with many tempers all too assured. The Will to Believe is a thing to be absolutely separated from the will to know the truth. The former is a desire for a purely subjective result, a state of our own minds that we seek in the first instance for its own sake and may be willing to take an efficacious intellectual drug to produce. The latter is a desire that our convictions may correspond with reality, and naturally leads us to seek simply, with inflexible directness, for the fact. The Will to Believe is the will to deceive—to deceive one's self; and the deception, which begins at home, may be expected in due course to pass on to others. It is the will to hold that thing certain which we now feel to be uncertain; it says, This thing seems to my best intelligence doubtful; but I will subject my mind to such a course of treatment, I will so tempt and beguile it by presenting this one matter for its credence and withholding rivals, I will so hypnotise it by keeping its gaze on this one brilliant object, that I shall presently find myself reposing in the peaceable possession of a full belief." And the late W. K. Clifford, in a passage which Mr. James quotes from the essay on "The Ethics of Belief,"[2] speaks in the same strain: "Belief is desecrated when given to unproved and unquestioned statements for the solace and private pleasure of the believer. If a belief has been accepted on insufficient evidence [even though the belief be true, as Clifford on the same page explains] the pleasure is a stolen one. It is sinful because it is stolen in defiance of our duty to mankind. That duty is to guard ourselves from such beliefs as from a pestilence which may shortly master our own body and then spread to the rest of the town. It is wrong always, everywhere, and for everyone to believe anything upon insufficient evidence." Here we come upon the essential meaning—if, indeed, it has any essential meaning—in the gospel which is being disseminated at the present time under the name of "Rationalism." We have no right to suppose anything about the unseen part of the universe merely on the ground that to do so may favour what we are pleased to call our highest interests. We must always wait for sensible evidence for our beliefs, and where such evidence is not forthcoming we must not only refuse to believe, but we must frame no hypotheses whatever: Such is the issue of the Duty to Doubt.

THE "HIBBERT JOURNAL."*

THE Hibbert Journal for the present quarter opens, as we have already noted, with two articles on the Church Crisis in Scotland. These are followed by an article by Mr. Pickard-Cambridge, of Winchester, on "The Christ of Dogma and of Experience," dealing with the subject from the broad-minded Churchman's point of view. It must be remembered, he says, "that the battle no longer centres round the problem, What is the Apostolic Tradition? but, What is the Truth?" a position enforced by a palpable hit in his reference, not without sarcasm, to the Bishop of London's recent "public repudiation" of Canon Hensley Henson's theory of the Resurrection. There is a growing disinclination, Mr. Pickard-Cambridge says, to regard mere antiquity as in itself a guarantee of value, and when it is urged that the accumulated weight of centuries of experience entitles the dogmas to respect, "it is a fair reply that there is no disrespect in letting go of the hand of a guide, however old, if he be blind." The number of centuries a dogma has stood is no guarantee of its truth. "Many more centuries have probably believed that the sun went round the earth than have asserted the Divinity (in the ordinary dogmatic sense) of Jesus.'' So he holds that there is good ground for a re-interpretation of the New Testament conception of the life and work of Christ.

''A Plea for Mysticism,'' by the Rev. G. W. Allen ((Vicar of St. James's, Bradford), and the Rev. C. J. Shebbeare's article on ''The Inner Meaning of Liberal Theology,'' are two more interesting contributions from Churchmen making in the same direction of progress in religious thought.

Then there are three articles, of which that by Sir Oliver Lodge on ''Mind v. Matter,'' is most within the reach of the ordinary reader, which the editor suggests should be considered as forming a group. The first on ''The Warp of the World,'' by Mr. Newman Howard, of Aberdovey, will for the most part certainly be ''caviare to the general.'' Towards the end we seemed to perceive a glimmer of something profound and beautiful, and have little doubt that it is there, but we shall not pretend to write about what we have so far failed to understand. That Professor Keyser's article on ''The Universe and Beyond: the Existence of the Hypercosmic'' is equally profound and well-grounded in truth we are not prepared to admit; but neither shall we deny it. We congratulate the men of subtle mind who can move easily in such regions, and the Hibbert on its fearless launching into deep waters. From Sir Oliver Lodge we quote one brief sentence: ''A premature and cheap Monism is therefore worse than none at all.''

There are two other articles relating to New Testament questions, one by Professor Kirsopp Lake, of Leiden, in ''The New Sayings of Jesus and the Synoptic Problem''; the other by Professor Bacon, of Yale, on ''The Johannine Problem,'' which is his third and concluding article on the subject, dealing with the indirect internal evidence. Professor Bacon finds it impossible to accept the traditional view of the authorship of the Fourth Gospel. The Gospel and Epistles he calls the ''X Literature;'' and this is his conclusion:—

Some nameless Elder-theologian of Ephesus seems a meagre substitute for the bosom Apostle, especially when the colours for his portrait are all borrowed from the literature in debate. In reality we have in the five writings of the Ephesian canon a literature which should be viewed as the exponent of the life of one great branch of the Church in its most critical period. Especially the X literature in its whole structure reveals to us the effort of Paulinism in the second generation after the great Apostle, and in the principal seat of his activity, partly to define itself over against the pseudo-Paulinism of the Docetic Gnostics, partly to find solid anchorage, like that of the Mother Church, in the historic life of Jesus, and the "new commandment which he gave unto us."

The ''Discussions'' in this number open with an extremely interesting contribution by ''Romanus'' on M. Loisy's ''Type of Catholicism.'' His attitude is shown in the following sentence: ''The conservatism of the Roman Church has preserved, it is said, the faith of the simple. It may be so. What is certain is that it has undermined that of the educated. From no religious body is the leakage so large and so significant.'' ''By the Church herself,'' says this liberal Catholic, ''we understand mankind viewed from the religious standpoint; by her teaching, the religious consciousness of mankind as a whole; by her infallibility, the fact that this consciousness in the long run justifies itself.'' After this it was, perhaps, hardly necessary to add, ''Such conceptions are, indeed far from those embodied in Papal and similar definitions. The contribution of the Rev. C. T. Dimont, of the Leeds Clergy School, on ''The Degrading of the Anglican Priesthood,'' in reply to the Rev. W. Manning, should be also noted.

THE report submitted to the meeting of shareholders of the First Garden City (Limited) on Feb. 9, stated that the share capital subscribed amounted to £105,778. Arrangements with tenants did not permit the directors to deal freely with the land until September last, and the water and sewerage works required time, but those are now so far advanced as to permit the development of a large area of land. There are thirty-six houses erected, or in course of erection, and agreements have been made for further buildings to the value of £20,000. Arrangements have been made with five firms to take up land on lease for the erection of manufactories. The industries thus arranged for are the making of mineral waters, asphalte, geysers, printing, and engineering.

A COMMITTEE of lady members of the Garden City Association is engaged in raising funds for the erection of a Public Hall in commemoration of Mrs. Ebenezer Howard. Arrangements have been made for the construction of works by men taken from the ''unemployed'' lists of the Mansion House. The ''agricultural belt'' is maintained as such. The directors have endeavoured to remain on amicable terms with existing tenants, but two farms which came into their hands at Michaelmas have been sub-divided, and let at increased rentals. There are now ten small holdings, whereas there was only one when the estate came into the hands of the company, and a large development is expected in this direction during the present year.

AMONG other items of interest in the report are the statements that Letchworth Hall is to be opened as a hotel in March; and that the Fox Inn, Willian, has been let to the People's Refreshment Association. Arrangements are being made for the Cheap Cottages Exhibition to be held July to September this year. In accordance with the voting of the great majority of shareholders the new town is to be called Letchworth (Garden City).

——

The February Sunday Magazine opens with an article on Antoinette Sterling, by Constance E. Thomas, personal recollections of the ''Christian and Singer,'' in which some charming stories of the warm-hearted woman are told. Good Words has an illustrated article on ''Hymns Ancient and Modern,'' and another on ''The Centenary of the London Cab.''

THE moment we see a nobleness which is above us, we recognise it and own its claim, and are fired with possibilities we never guessed before.—James Martineau.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Brighton. — The Rev. Priestley Prime, having been duly elected minister at a meeting of the trustees and subscribers to the Free Christian Church, is to enter upon his ministry to-morrow (Sunday), the 19th inst.

Chesterfield.—On Thursday evening Feb. 9, Professor Carpenter delivered his first lecture on "How to read the Gospel," in the school-room of Elder Yard Chapel. There gathered together an audience of 300, all the town's churches and chapels being well represented. Among those present were the Rev. E. C. Stukeley, rector of Brampton, and the Rev. Stanley Shergold, Congregational Minister. The chair was taken by Miss Markham, the leading Anglican lady in the town, who introduced Mr. Carpenter to the meeting in a most stirring and appreciative address. The lecturer was in his best mood and held the audience spell-bound for an hour and a half. At the close cordial expressions of gratitude and satisfaction were forthcoming from all quarters, and without the slightest exaggeration we may say that the town of Chesterfield has been profoundly impressed by Mr. Carpenter's visit.

Colyton.—The annual tea and meeting in connection with the Sunday-school was held on Wednesday, the 8th inst. After tea the chair was taken by the Rev. Rudolf Davis (district minister), who gave a most interesting and instructive address. A programme of music and recitations was rendered by the scholars, and the prize books were distributed by the minister.

Congleton.—On Wednesday evening, Feb. 8 a successful entertainment was given in the Town Hall by members of the Cross-street Unitarian Sunday-school, the chief item in the programme being the operetta "Hawthorn Glen."

Crewe.—The annual congregational tea and business meeting of the Free Christian Church were held on Wednesday, Feb. 8, about 150 being present. Mr. Alderman J. Briggs, who presided, said that for many years the prospects of their church had not been so bright, and this he attributed to their new minister, the Rev. H. F. Short. He urged on everyone to give all the help in their power to further the interests of the church. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. H. Fisher Short, and the Rev. D. Davis, of Nantwich, and the officers were re-elected. The choir, under the leadership of Mr. J. Delves, rendered appropriate music at intervals. During the present month large congregations are assembling, and Mr. Short is giving special sermons on Blatchford's "God and My Neighbour."

Horwich.—The annual congregational business meeting was held on the afternoon of Jan. 28. An increase of members was reported, and an improved average attendance in the Sunday-school, but there had been a slight falling off in the attendance at evening service as compared with the previous year, during a part of which a spirited controversy was in progress. After tea an evening meeting was held which was well attended. Addresses were delivered by the chairman, Mr. C. J. P. Fuller, F.C.S., the Revs. W. Harris and John Evans of Bolton, the Rev. R. C. Moore, minister in charge, and Messrs. W. J. Dale and R. Riley. A hopeful tone pervaded the proceedings. It was announced that a bazaar and sale of work would be held in the autumn. On Sunday evening, Feb. 5, the Nonconformist ministers had their annual exchange of pulpits, when collections were taken for the local Nursing Association. The Rev. J. E. Whittaker, of New Chapel (Congregational), occupied the pulpit, and the Rev. R. C. Moore preached in the Independent Methodist Chapel. Afterwards a united communion service was held in Lee Chapel (Congregational) at which all the churches were represented and in which all the ministers took part.

Hull.—At the third of Mr. Carpenter's lectures an audience of over 400 were present, Mr W. R. Locking, a member of the Hull Education Committee, being in the chair. At the last social meeting the congregation presented to the late secretary, Mr. Thomas Hirst, a silver cake basket, &c., in token of their sincere appreciation of his valuable and untiring services during a period of over seven years. The presentation was made by Mr. S. Harris, in the unavoidable absence of the Rev. F. H. Vaughan.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—A meeting was held in the Hope-street Church Hall, on Saturday afternoon, the 11th inst., when there were over sixty members and friends present. After tea, the chair was taken by Mrs. H. D. Roberts (vice-president), who read a letter from the president (Rev. J. Morley Mills), regretting his enforced absence through illness, and referring to the great loss the society had sustained in the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. The Rev. T. Lloyd Jones then moved the following resolution: "That this meeting of the Liverpool Sunday-school Society desires to express its deep sense of loss in the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., who was president of the society in 1888, and again in 1898; and who consistently gave the society the benefit of his valued and inspiring presence at its council and general meetings. His wise counsels, his ripe judgment, his wide experience, were always freely placed at the disposal of the officers. His vivid sense of the great importance of Sunday-school work, and the frequent services which he ungrudgingly gave to the Sooiety's interests, notwithstanding the arduous and pressing calls upon his time and energies, rendered him an example to all in the way of personal effort and attendance. This meeting further expresses its deep sympathy with Mrs. Armstrong and her sons in the great loss and sorrow which has befallen all, and its conviction that the Society's best memorial of him will be increased enthusiasm in this work, which was so near to his heart." Mr. F. Robinson seconded the resolution, which was passed in reverent silence. Mrs. Odgers then gave a most interesting paper on the St. Sulpice system of Religious Instruction. She narrated the origin of the system, and its objects, which were with the originators in Paris, to give definite instruction to children on (a) Dogma, (b) moral obligations and worship, and (c) the Sacraments and beliefs pertaining to the Priesthood and the Church. This has been modified and adapted to the Anglican system, and obtains in several English churches. Mrs. Odgers described the system as carried out in two churches she has visited in Bath and Bristol. She proceeded to give an account of the methods of procedure, which was listened to with much interest—particularly the details of the system of instruction by questioning and recapitulation. The paper was followed by a discussion, in which Mr. Cooper, Rev. J. Collins Odgers, Rev. H. D. Roberts, Miss O. M. Rawlins, Mr. Thomas and Mr. Robinson took part. Mr. Odgers, who gave an account of certain experiments of his own, based on this system, was asked to give a specimen lesson at some future meeting.

London Guilds Union.—The annual meeting was held at College Chapel, Stepney, on Monday, February 6. Between sixty and seventy Guild members were present from Essex Church, Highgate, Mansford-street, Stratford, Stepney, and Walthamstow. Half an hour devoted to refreshments and social intercourse was followed by a devotional service in the chapel, conducted by Mr. C. A. Ginever, of Stepney. The annual business meeting was held in the schoolroom, and in the unavoidable absence of the president, the Rev. J. Ellis, the chair was occupied by the Rev. F. K. Freeston. In moving the adoption of the reports the chairman said that the London Guilds Union was the only local union at present in existence under the auspices of the National Conference Guilds Union; but he hoped other local unions would soon be formed. Mr. Alfred Thompson, in seconding, spoke of the help which the Union might give to individual guilds, the strength and encouragement that come from co-operation, and trusted that before long more of our London churches would come into line with the Union. Mr. Alfred Thompson was elected president, the Rev. F. K. Freeston vice-president, the Rev. W. H. Rose secretary, and M. E. Noel treasurer. The business being completed, a most interesting address was given by Miss Punnett, B.A., of Mansford-street, on "The Place of Amusements in Life," followed by a discussion, after which votes of thanks to Miss Punnett for her address, and to their Stepney friends for their hospitality were passed; and the meeting was brought to a close with the benediction, pronounced by the Rev. F. K. Freeston.

London: Peckham.—The annual tea party and prize distribution of the Avondale-road Sunday-school was held on Tuesday, February 14. About seventy scholars and friends sat down to tea, and a large gathering of parents and members of the Church assembled at the later meeting. A children's operetta, "Cinderella" was performed by the junior scholars, and the prizes were afterwards distributed by the Rev. George Carter. Mr. W. R. Marshall, on behalf of the children and teachers, then made two presentations—to the minister and the retiring superintendent, Mr. J. C. Griffin. As "an institution is the lengthened shadow of a man," so the Sunday-school, he said, was the counterpart of their superintendent's geniality and loving sympathy. The presents—framed groups of the scholars and teachers—were the outcome of the children's thanks to both. Mr. J. C. Griffin, in acknowledging the gift, said that his twelve years of labour as the acting-superintendent was a period of real loving toil, and he would gratefully remember the dear children when he looked upon the photograph. The Rev. G. Carter then thanked the scholars for their touching tribute to his efforts, and assured them of his continual sympathy and affection. Reference was made to the work of the Sunday-school Guild, which, under Mrs. A. S. Bright's efforts, has done yeoman service on behalf of the children.

Mottram.—The annual party and concert of the Band of Hope took place on Saturday, February 11. Over 160 sat down to tea, and about 200 attended the concert. A most interesting programme of songs, recitations, action songs, and dramatic dialogue was well carried out. The young people in the six action songs were trained by Mrs. and Miss Smith, and took the parts well. The recitations, dialogue, and speech by the chairman (Rev. H. Bodell Smith) were on Temperance subjects.

Ringwood.—On Sunday evening, February 12, a memorial service was held in St. Thomas Chapel, when the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Bournemouth, preached a beautiful sermon, and spoke of the helpful life and unselfish work of the late Mr. Cogan Conway, who for several years ministered to the congregation. Affectionate friends had decorated the old chapel with lovely flowers, and Miss Siddons, of Bournemouth, rendered the solo "O, Rest in the Lord." A large congregation assembled to do honour to one who was beloved by the whole town, Sheffield: Upper Chapel and Attercliffe.—The annual report of Upper Chapel for the year 1904, just issued, states that in October last the Rev. C. J. Street completed the first year of his ministry there, a year which has witnessed a revival of activity in the numerous institutions connected with the chapel and Sunday-school. The improvement in the attendance at the morning services has been gratifying, although there is still much to be desired in this respect. The evening congregations are always better than those of the morning, and often large. The steady attendance of the same people, a few of whom have already joined the congregation, is very encouraging. There is a net increase of 26 seatholders for the year, some of these having passed through the minister's preparation class for young people. The question of the retention or otherwise of the new "Seven Services," which have been in use since Easter, will come up for consideration at the approaching annual meeting. Sunday morning services are conducted monthly at the Hollis Hospital (Almshouses), by the Sheffield Unitarian ministers. The report of theAttercliffe Mission shows that progress has been made in spite of difficulties. The great drawback of having no place of its own in which to meet, on week-days as well as Sundays, must inevitably retard progress. The first need of the mission is suitable premises in a convenient situation. Attempts are being made to find a site, and it is hoped that a practicable scheme for building a school-chapel will be forthcoming before long. The relationship with the mother church has been drawn closer. Upper Chapel being now responsible for the ministry, the Rev. Henry Dawtrey (in succession to Rev. G. E. Jenkins) assistant minister at Upper Chapel, acts as minister-in-charge at Attercliffe, under the supervision of Mr. Street. The envelope offertory, which was introduced as the basis of membership, has been a decided change for the better. The number of enrolled members is now 41. All local expenses have been met; the sum of £119 8s., representing special income, has been set aside as the nucleus of a building fund; £10 has been paid as a contribution towards the cost of ministerial services; and £5 has been lent to the sewing society for the purchase of material in view of the sale of work or bazaar, which it is intended to hold in October next. On Tuesday evening a lecture on "Food and Body Building" was given in the Channing Hall by Mr. Charlton Short, of the Ivy Leaf Society, to the members and friends of the Band of Hope and Mercy. The Rev. C. J. Street presided. There was an attendance of about seventy.

Wakefield.—A memorial service was held in Westgate Chapel on Sunday morning last, in reference to the death of Mr. Cogan Conway, who had long taken a deep interest in the work and welfare of the congregation, and had preached the school anniversary sermons about three years ago. In the afternoon the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, who had assisted the Rev. J. E. Odgers in the funeral service at Ringwood, spoke to the teachers and scholars on the impressive tokens of esteem, gratitude, and affection shown by all classes of the people on the occasion of their friend's interment. A resolution of sympathy and condolence was passed, and forwarded to Mrs. Conway, whose sad bereavement has caused deep sorrow among her friends in Wakefield.

To live with God, it is necessary to be like God, and unfaithfulness in earthly duty cannot but poison the purity of heavenly communion. This is so great a thought that we only partially realise it.

SUSTENTATION FUND.

For the Augmentation of Ministers' Stipends.

At the ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING of Contributors, held in DR. WILLIAMS'S LIBRARY, London, on WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8TH, 1905, Rev. S. A. Steinthal, President, in the chair,

A letter was read from Mrs. Rawson, acknowledging the Resolution in memory of the late Mr. Harry Rawson, passed at the Annual Meeting on February 10th, 1904.

It was RESOLVED, on the motion of the President: "That this Meeting desires to record its deep sense of the loss which the Fund has sustained by the recent deaths of Mr. Charles Harding and Mr. J. Cogan Conway, whose interest in the Fund was shown, not only by their subscriptions, but by their earnest and valuable work as members of the Board.

The Managers were directed to endeavour to provide for filling the vacancies thus created on the Board.

The ANNUAL REPORT and BALANCE-SHEET were presented, and the following Resolutions adopted, viz.:—

That the Report and Accounts, as now read, be adopted and printed for circulation among the Contributors and Friends of the Fund.

That the retiring Managers, Messrs. David Ainsworth and E. Chatfeild Clarke, whose term of office has expired, having been nominated, and the requisite number of voting papers having been produced, be and are hereby re-elected as Managers of the Fund.

That Mr. John Dendy, who was proposed at the Annual Meeting in 1904 as successor to the late Mr. H. Rawson on the Board, and who has been pro forma nominated by the President, Treasurer, and Honorary Secretaries; according to Regulation VIII., be and is hereby elected a Manager of the Fund for the next three years.

That the Rev. S. A. Steinthal be elected President for the year 1905.

That the cordial thanks of the Contributors be given to Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke for his services as Honorary Treasurer during the past year, and that he be re-appointed to the office for the coming year.

That Mr. A. W. Worthington and Mr. Frank Preston be thanked for their labours as Secretaries, and re-elected as Honorary Secretaries for the year 1905.

That the services of Mr. Edwin W. Marshall, as Honorary Auditor, be gratefully acknowledged, and that he be requested to accept the office for the year 1905.

That the Contributors heartily thank the Trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, who have generously granted the use of rooms for the meetings of the Fund during the past year.

That the thanks of the meeting be given to the Chairman for his services in the chair.

A. W. WORTHINGTON, FRANK PRESTON, } Hon. Secs.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN connection with the Martineau Centenary celebrations, we are very glad to be able to announce that at the soirée to be held at Manchester College, Oxford, on Tuesday evening, May 2, an address on the significance of Dr. Martineau's Philosophy will be given by Professor Henry Jones, of Glasgow.

THE Lord Mayor of Liverpool, whose official visit to the Mill-street Domestic Mission we recently reported, has this week done another gracious thing. He is himself superintendent of the Sunday-school of the Sefton Park (Presbyterian) Church, and on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings he gave two "At Homes" at the Town Hall to the Liverpool Sunday-school Teachers of all denominations. An invitation was sent for a representative of every four teachers in all the schools, and over a thousand teachers were present on each occasion.

PROFESSOR BRUINING, of Amsterdam, preached on Sunday morning at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, and on Tuesday evening gave a lecture on "Immortality," which was well attended. On this subject a handbook by Professor Bruining was published last autumn by the Protestantenbond, and is already in a second edition. Next month the Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz is to preach and lecture at Austin Friars.

OF the Torrey-Alexander Mission, now in progress at the Albert Hall, the Rev. H. S. Perris writes in our present issue. On Tuesday, during the luncheon hour, the redoubtable Doctor gave an address to business men at the Cannon-street Hotel, and, according to the Daily News reporter, favoured his City audience with some "scathing sentences," which referred "to Unitarians, to David Strauss, to Ernest Renan, and to the 'Higher Critics' who attempted to shatter the authority of the Bible." We wish, for our delectation, that these enlightened remarks had been more fully reported. A measure of the Doctor's mind may be taken from his reported assertion, before he began the scathing process, that "there was good reason to believe that the apostles took notes in Aramaic and Greek of the words that fell from their Master's lips" One would like to hear a comment on this address by the minister of the City Temple.

MASSACRE of unarmed people in the streets of St. Petersburg on January 22; murder of the Grand Duke Sergius, the most remorseless and reactionary of the uncles of the Tsar, at Moscow, on February 17, such are the tragic incidents in the history of a people cruelly oppressed, marking their passionate struggle to be free. The assassin declares that he acted "in the interests of an oppressed people." Can we say that the balance of guilt is on his side? The same papers which reported the murder published an appeal presented by the women of Moscow to the Empress:—

> Peace is being violated, not only beyond the frontiers of our country, but even in the heart of the Fatherland. We see with terror in the recent troubles the beginning of calamities that may crush all Russia if the Emperor does not seek, in unity with his people, to avert them. All the bases of life are shaken, and all moral foundations are trembling. Mothers, those who have to bring up the young generation, are saddened, and their task made impossible. It is beyond their power, beyond all possibility, to train children up on bases of unshakeable truth and love of duty when the social life of the country does not rest on these for its foundation. The youth of the country, on entering life, constantly meet contradictions to what was taught them in their families. They thus lose all faith in the principles taught them, seek new faiths, and fall into extremes. Our best forces are perishing. Mothers' hearts are breaking. They cannot remain silent. They feel that many more lives will yet be sacrificed, for what is happening is not spasmodic, but the result of earlier calamities. The Emperor can still save Russia by his puissant will. Be our pleader, and pray the Emperor that he may listen to the voice of the country and the cry of its mothers.

THE committee, consisting of Sir Edward Fry, the Bishop of Stepney and Lord Welby, appointed to inquire into the charges of appropriating funds subscribed for the maintenance of the hospitals to the support of the medical schools has now issued its report. The object of the inquiry was threefold: to decide whether money "subscribed for the relief of the sick poor" has been diverted to medical education; whether any equivalent return has been made by the schools to hospitals; and, lastly, whether there is justification for so diverting the funds. The last question is too large a one for even a strong committee to decide. On the questions of fact submitted to it the committee's report is clear and merits serious consideration. In brief, it is an ample confirmation of the charges which have been so vigorously pressed by Mr. Stephen Coleridge. The medical schools have received money subscribed for the sick poor.

THE report as to the relative value of hospitals, with or without schools, should put an end to the preference hitherto shown to the former in the allocation of the funds. The Committee recognise that the past must be left alone. "But for the future the matter is different, and we venture to submit that the distinction between the hospital and the school should in every case be drawn, not only definitely and exactly, but with such clearness that it may be understood by the general public, and so that no question may arise as to the distinction and application of moneys contributed, whether by the King's Fund or from some other source." The reading of the report confirms our conviction of the need for constant criticism of these philanthropic institutions, and its publication will indeed be of considerable value if it serves to direct public attention to the many serious problems connected with the administration of our medical charities.

THE report of the Royal Commission on coal supplies is reassuring reading. The individual householder is chiefly concerned with the number of pounds he has to pay for his winter supply, or the number of pence she must spend for her week's or day's consumption; and to this immediate out-of-pocket conundrum, the Royal Commission gives no answer—to do so would be beneath its dignity. The questions with which it is concerned are on a larger scale, as, e.g., how many thousand million tons of coal are to be got at depths not exceeding four thousand feet? The depth of four thousand feet is taken because, beyond that, it is supposed that it may not be practicable to go, indeed, at that depth the temperature is somewhat excessive. But the difficulty is the less because of mechanical devices which are being introduced to cool and dry the air, and because of the growing utilisation of coal-digging machines so that the physical toil of the miner would be lessened. It is interesting to notice that the number of these machines is increasing, and that their output in 1903 was over four million tons, not a large amount, of course, compared with a total output of forty-six times the quantity. In the result of many calculations it would appear from the report that we need not fear the failure of the supplies for at least some four or five centuries, and before then many things may have happened.

THE New Year's number of Theologisch Tijdschrift (Leiden: S. C. van Doesburgh) opens with the address given by Professor F. Pijper, of Leiden, at the opening of the session last October. The address was a defence of the freedom of the faculty of Divinity in the University against the Orthodox attack, which has made itself heard in the debates on the Government's Universities Bill. In the proposed sectional universities the theological teaching will be strictly bound to the creed of the founders, and if the teachers in the present national universities cannot be brought under the yoke of Orthodoxy, there are those who would prefer the entire abolition of the faculty. Professor Pijper makes a noble plea for the true honour of theology, as concerned with the highest interests of mankind, and insists that its teachers must be free. "In freedom," he concludes, "truth shall prosper!" This number of the Tijdschrift contains also an article by F. Dijkema on the attitude of Prophets and Psalms towards the subject of "Sacrifice," and another by Professor Meyboom, of Groningen, on the Magi. There are a number of interesting book reviews.

Teyler's Theologisch Tijdschrift (Haarlem, de Erven Loosjes) begins its third year with the January number, and is published quarterly. It opens with an article by Professor J. C. Matthes on the customs of mourning and honour of the dead in Israel. Professor Bruining of Amsterdam has an article on Neo-Hegelianism and Gospel preaching, strongly deprecating what he regards as the concealment of the use of the old Evangelical phraseology by those who offer what is no less than Neo-Buddhism, an entirely different teaching of religion. Another interesting article is on "The Religion of the German Classics," a notice of Professor Sell's book in the series of "Lebensfragen," edited by Professor Weinel, to which we have recently referred in these columns. The number concludes with book reviews, and a useful classified list of recent publications.

THE BISHOP OF SOUTHWELL ON UNITARIANISM.

PREACHING in St. Mary's Church, Nottingham, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 14, Dr. Hoskyns, the Bishop of Southwell, dealt with the question of Bible teaching, and urged the need for Churchmen to stand firm on that question of the instruction of the young in the truths of the Bible. He made, in particular, one statement which gave rise to the following correspondence between him and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, minister of the High Pavement Chapel.

To the Editor of the Nottingham Guardian.

SIR,—The following letters have been exchanged between the Bishop of Southwell and myself:—

"8, Colville-street, Nottingham,
"February 15, 1905.

"MY LORD,—In to-day's Nottingham Daily Guardian you are reported to have said at St. Mary's Church last night: 'It was for that reason that it seemed to him that they would have to stand, as they stood before, for that old faith against the spread of Unitarianism, against that indifferentism, and against that spread of undenominationalism which bred Unitarianism, which was emptying the places of worship and leading men into carelessness and sin.'

"Before making any public reference to this passage I write to ask whether the report is accurate, and, if not, to invite you to correct it.

"I am, yours faithfully,
"J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

"The Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Southwell."

London, February 17.

"DEAR SIR,—I have no reason to suppose that the report in the Guardian is otherwise than fairly accurate. Of course, the word 'was' in the closing sentence ought to be 'were.'—Yours truly,

"EDWYN SOUTHWELL."

I regret that the Bishop could not disclaim the accuracy of the report. He should have realised that to Unitarians their religion is their salvation from indifference, carelessness, and sin. I venture, therefore, to ask his lordship acting in the spirit of the Master we all strive to serve, to consider for how much that is Divine Unitarianism stands to many truth-seeking souls. Having done this he will, I am sure, take an early and conspicuous opportunity to withdraw the bitter reproach of his words and repair the breach he has made in the courtesies that should prevail among Christian gentlemen.

I am, sir, &c.,
J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

Nottingham, February 17, 1905.

The Bishop's reply, in the Nottingham Guardian of Feb 21.

DEAR MR. LLOYD THOMAS,—Though I could not deny the accuracy of the report in the Guardian, yet I should wish now, in answer to your courteous letter, to add that in my sermon I was using the word "unitarian" in a sense somewhat different to that understood by yourself. I had not in my mind that definite Unitarianism, which you rightly spell with a capital U, which stands for much that is cultured and refined in thought, and beneficent in action, but rather for that spirit which is frequently referred to as unitarian, standing for what is vague and indefinite, ready without search to deny Our Lord. Such a spirit has crept in the Christian world today, into the Church itself, and is now leading many of those in authority to treat lightly and carelessly the whole subject of the religious instruction of the young.

My argument, briefly, was that the keenness of St. Paul was due to the definite faith in the Risen and Ascended Christ. Take this truth away, and paralysis creeps over men, with all the miserable consequences. I think that the context to the passage quoted made quite clear to my hearers what was in my mind.

For any who do not now hold the same faith as the Christian Church, but who are taking trouble to search for truth as lovers of God, I had not a word to say on this occasion. —Yours sincerely,

EDWYN SOUTHWELL.

Mr Lloyd Thomas's concluding letter.

8, Colville-street, Nottingham,
February 20, 1905.

MY LORD,—It is a pleasure to acknowledge the kindly tone of your letter, which will go far to remove any remaining dissatisfaction.

I was certainly not aware that it was customary to speak of what is vague and indefinite as "unitarian." Having regard to the present misapprehension, I feel sure you will agree with me that such a custom is much to be regretted, and ought to be discontinued.

To prevent further mistakes, I should like to add, without argument, that though our endeavours to follow the Spirit of Truth have led us away from the older theology, we do not consider ourselves to have forsaken the faith of the Christian Church; and, though we reject a particular theory of the personality of Christ, we do not regard ourselves as having become thereby in any sense deniers of Him who is the Lord and Master of us all.

It would help the public to a better understanding of your lordship's attitude if you gave me permission to publish this further correspondence.

I am, sincerely yours,
J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

The Right Reverend The Lord Bishop of Southwell.

ON February 17th, the sixth anniversary of her death, the statue of Miss Frances Willard was presented to the United States Congress by the State of Illinois, and placed in Statuary Hall, in the Capitol Building at Washington. For the first time in its history the United States Congress suspended business on that day to honour the memory of a woman. The National Women's Christian Temperance Union officers and many leading members were in Washington, and in the evening a great Frances Willard commemoration meeting was held in the Metropolitan Church. The statue is of Carrara marble, a little more than life-size, and represents Miss Willard standing in an easy, graceful position. The right arm is slightly extended, the hand resting upon a reading desk: the left arm is at her side, with a few pages of manuscript in the hand. The pose of the head is very life-like, as Miss Willard appeared when looking out upon an audience. The face is strong and spiritual. The pedestal is of Vermont marble, and bears the following inscription in Miss Willard's own words:—"Ah! it is the women who have given the costliest hostages to fortune. Out into the battle of life they have sent their best beloved, with fearful odds against them. Oh, by the dangers they have dared; by the hours of patient watching over beds where helpless children lay; by the incense of ten thousand prayers wafted from their gentle lips to heaven, I charge you, give them power to protect along life's treacherous highway those whom they have so loved."

THE CHRIST OF PAUL.

IV.

THE PERSON OF JESUS.

IN the hour of his conversion Paul accepted Jesus as the Messiah. What conception did he form of him in his own mind, and how did he present it to his hearers? That it constituted the centre of his preaching is apparent. His gospel is a "gospel of Christ"; and its first peculiarity is that it compels him to preach a Messiah crucified (1 Cor. i. 23).

(1) A slight acquaintance with the Apostle's letters suffices to awake attention to the fact that the designations by which the Messiah is described recur much more frequently and with much more emphasis than in the Evangelic records. "Christ" has almost ceased to be a title, and has become a personal name. "Jesus Christ" and "Christ" and "Christ Jesus" are equally natural forms of speech; and while the historic appellation "Jesus" rarely stands by itself, its counterpart "Christ" (sometimes with, but more often without, the definite article) is the Apostle's favourite term. The Christian confession is not, however, completed by the recognition of Jesus as Christ; it further involves the acknowledgment of Jesus Christ as Lord (Phil. ii. 11). Of such high consequence is this function, so much follows from its admission, that it carries with it the disciple's destiny (Rom. x. 9):—

> If thou shalt confess with thy mouth Jesus as Lord, and shalt believe in thy heart that God raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.

This title also, therefore, both alone and in various combinations, appears with great frequency. One other name, of high significance but of much less common use, is the term "son of God"; it is found only once in combination with the compound Jesus Christ.* The Apostle's view of Jesus must be gathered in part from his use of these terms, together with the attributes and functions ascribed to their bearer.

(2) Compared with the Jerusalem apostles, Paul's knowledge of the Messiah had been gained in a different way, and involved peculiar issues. They had been associated with him in personal companionship; to Paul he had only been revealed after death. He had no recollection of him, therefore, in human form; no likeness was hung in the chamber of memory; no tone of his voice was ever recalled to enforce a command, to point a rebuke, or to assuage a grief. He never thought of him sitting teaching in the synagogue, or on the hill side, or in the boat upon the shore. He knew him only as risen; and in that aspect his first quality was not flesh but spirit. This is the first point of divergence from the conception of the Jerusalem fellowship; and its consequences were far-reaching. The "brethren of the Lord" and their associates clung to the notion of a Messiah reserved in heaven, while the spirit, poured forth by him in accordance with his Father's promise, set the seal of heaven on the believer's conversion. But Paul persistently fixes on the consciousness of the new life as his starting point. Using the terminology with which the Scriptures provided him, he speaks of the holy spirit as the energy or working of the ever present God. As such it manifests itself in power, it is a kind of moral and religious force, showing itself in wonders of repentance, in signs of a changed heart (Rom. xv. 13, 19). It was the characteristic of the Apostle's preaching to produce such impressions, not by persuasive words of wisdom, but by demonstration of spirit and of power (1 Cor. ii. 4). It was by this agency that God condescended to dwell in human hearts (1 Cor. iii. 16-17: cp. vi. 19):—

> Know ye not that ye are a temple of God and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you? . . . The temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

There seemed, indeed, to be an actual physical presence of Deity under certain conditions; for, in a church meeting, the outburst of prophecy would convict the stranger, and he would "fall down on his face and worship God, declaring that God is in you indeed" (1 Cor. xiv. 25). But if the spirit is in the believer, in another sense the believer is in the spirit. Its nature is contrasted with the solid matter of flesh, and with the rigid constraint of law. It is possible to be yet in the body, but not "in flesh"; and he is "in spirit" who has God's spirit dwelling in him (Rom. viii. 9). But from another point of view similar language might be used of Christ. Christ is the principle both of outward and of inward holiness. They that have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ (Gal. iii. 27); and this high investiture is the security for walking honestly as in the day (Rom. xiii. 13, 14). Is this only one of the Apostle's glowing imaginative expressions? Consider the startling phrase, "It is no longer I that live, but Christ that liveth in me" (Gal. ii. 20), or the Apostle's anxiety for his "little children" in Galatia until Christ be formed in them (Gal. iv. 19). The Corinthians he urges more strenuously (2 Cor. xiii. 5):—

> Try your own selves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Or know ye not as to your own selves, that Jesus Christ is in you? unless indeed ye be reprobate.

It is through this continuous presence and action in the disciple's soul that he is realised as "life-giving spirit" (1 Cor. xv. 45); and it is by this inner union that all believers are bound together in membership of one body, where all gifts and graces flow from Christ who is the head. To be "in Christ," therefore, is the summary expression for participation in these saving energies; there only is the gift of eternal life (Rom. vi. 23). For Christ belongs to another world than that of sense, a world of spiritual creation, where he can, as it were, re-make those who confide themselves to him (2 Cor. v. 17):—

> Wherefore if any man is in Christ, he is a new creature (or, there is a new creation).

Such an one, joined to the Lord, is one spirit (1 Cor. vi. 17). So it comes about that the "spirit of God" and the "spirit of Christ" are interchangeable terms, and the presence of either in the believer is equivalent to the immanence of Christ (Rom. viii. 9, 10):—

> But ye are not in flesh, but in spirit, if so be that God's spirit dwelleth in you. But if any man hath not Christ's spirit he is none of his. And if Christ is in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life because of righteousness.

On these high themes language loses its precision; clearness of definition is impossible where every form moves in a kind of radiant haze which baffles distinction, so that one continually seems to pass into another. In 2 Cor. iii. 17 the Apostle boldly identifies the two terms which he has employed as symbols for the same inward forces:—

> Now the Lord is the spirit, and where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.

Yet even here the emphatic statement which unifies the Lord and the spirit passes into some fresh aspect of discrimination as the "spirit of the Lord" enters into the field as guardian of liberty.*

The limits of these expressions are still undetermined. All that can be asserted is that they have as yet no fixed forms or unalterable relations; thought, feeling, speech, are all still fluid. How far Christ, conceived as spirit, could be said to possess any shape or visible mode of being, the apostolic language hardly enables us to decide. We hear, indeed, in 1 Cor. xv. 44, of a "spiritual body"; but its nature is not described. To God, indeed, the incorruptible (Rom. i. 23), belongs a glory which is presented imaginatively under the emblem of light. That light, under the old covenant, was reflected in the face of Moses (2 Cor. iii. 7); the Christian beholds it in the face of Christ (2 Cor. iv. 6). But it is apparently something more than a figure; for the Apostle anticipates that in the process of time—perhaps by the great change when this corruptible puts on incorruption—all his true followers shall in their turn with unveiled faces reflect the glory of the Lord. Passing from him to them, it will transform them into his image (2 Cor. iii. 18: cp. Rom. viii. 29, v. 2), and those that have borne the image of the earthy shall be raised in glory to bear the image of the heavenly (1 Cor. xv. 49).

(3) For while the Messiah is spirit, it would seem that he is still man. His is, however, a heavenly humanity. The "pillar" apostles at Jerusalem had known the Messiah only within the conditions of an earthly form. Then, he had of necessity lived in a particular country, and belonged to a specific people. As a Jew, he had been under the obligations of the Law. But in entering the world of spirit he left Judea, and escaped from the control of its historic institutions. All that was local, all that attached to him by race or family, fell away. He ceased to be counted simply among the children of Abraham; he laid down the national dignity of Son of David. Only what was universal and

* The variations in the apostolic phraseology in the six letters selected for consideration, may be roughly grouped thus:—Jesus, 12; Jesus Christ, 32; Jesus Christ our Lord, 5; Jesus our Lord, 2; Christ, 156; Christ Jesus, 35; Christ Jesus our Lord, 3; Lord (sometimes doubtful), 106; Lord Jesus, 12; Lord Jesus Christ, 34; Lord Christ, 1; Son of God (his son, &c.), 15.

* In ver. 18 Weiss and Beyschlag both understand the last words to mean "the Lord of the spirit"; this interpretation, if correct, supplies further proof that these large elastic religious expressions must not be pressed into false harmonies of logic.

essential survived in him. From the spirit-world he was able, therefore, to come as near to the Greek or the barbarian as to the Jew: he stood in the same relation to all, or, in Pauline phraseology, all were one in him (Gal. iii. 28: cp. Col. iii. 11). A manhood thus capable of unifying all the characteristics of sex, nationality, and social circumstance, was obviously not the manhood of the corporeal frame. It belonged to another order. It represented the type which had originally come into being in the creative mind of God. For there were two possible forms of existence. There was, first, the bodily and visible, which ran its course on earth, and passed out of the flesh through the gate of death to the under-world; this took its rise, historically, in Adam; it was of the earth, earthy, yet it had been made, so Scripture taught (Gen. i. 26), in the image of God; and in virtue of this august origin, Adam could be called the son of God (Luke iii. 38). But, secondly, neither world nor man could have been made, till it had been thought. That which is first apprehended by us through sense, is first constituted by mind. In the processes of our experience the natural man stands first. But for him to be at all, he must correspond to some intention or design on the part of God. Some conception, as we say, some idea, must have preceded him. The Jewish philosophers had already begun to concern themselves with these pictorial forms. And they ascribed to them a kind of outward reality. They were something more than the plans or patterns of the great Artist. His very thinking of them gave them some sort of being. They were types, but they were individuals as well. Among these types, as has been already stated, was Messiah's name. In ancient modes of speculation, the name often denoted the significant essence of the person or object to which it belonged. It marked it off from every other; it fixed its specific place, and characterised its inner nature. This seems to have been the line of speculation which Paul's thought now followed. There was an ideal of Messiah, in the heavenly world. Paul took the great step which his own inner life-history suggested, of placing him at the head of a humanity above, as Adam was the progenitor of the humanity below. Here was the originator of a new order in the spirit, to which the believer was to rise by his quickening power.

WE are all of us raised above our old selves, if, indeed, we are ever raised at all, by faithful love of that which is better and higher than ourselves; and no subtle debates before the tribunal of conscience, no intellectual disciplinings of the will can do as much for us as one free fine spontaneous going forth of the whole man, heart, and soul, and mind, towards a nobler personality than our own.

"JESUS SAITH."

VI.—THE KINGDOM WON BY WONDER.

"Jesus saith, Let not him that seeketh cease until he findeth; and when he findeth, he shall be astonished. Astonished he shall reach the kingdom, and having reached the kingdom, he shall rest."

AMONG phrases which have gained considerable currency of late years is that of "the renascence of wonder," and the novel note struck in this new saying of Christ's is precisely its emphasis on the element of wonder, of astonishment, as something without which the kingdom of heaven cannot be reached. As a matter of fact, that which makes the Gospel message so largely ineffective is that we have listened to it till we have ceased to suspect it of any quality of strangeness; we do not reflect how improbable such a well-worn utterance as "Seek, and ye shall find" must have sounded to Christ's hearers, in what absolute contradiction it seems to be to the most easily ascertained facts of experience. Instead of facile acquiescence, let us put the question plainly to ourselves: Has our own seeking been finding? Have we not rather sought and not found, asked and not received, knocked with ineffectual hands at iron portals that never opened?

It is only when we rouse ourselves sufficiently to wonder at the words of Christ that we become able to discover them to be true. And the truth which a candid self-examination will reveal is this, that the things we have found in life are those we really sought after—the things we have missed those we may have weakly and intermittently wished, but not earnestly and single-mindedly striven for. We reap that we sow—not figs from thistles; we gather that we have planted—not grapes of thorns; we obtain that we have desired with all our hearts and with all our strength, that which we may have gone out after, maybe with bleeding feet across deserts and stony places—not that which we merely wished to come to us. "Everyone that seeketh, findeth" that which he truly seeks, and no other thing at all.

Jesus meant his teaching to be listened to with astonishment; those who can listen to it otherwise, who dully hear and dully answer "yea," not grasping the drift of the words that are spoken to them, can never feel their transforming power; and he who is not "astonished" by the preaching of the Gospel of the kingdom, who takes it all as a matter of course, will be among the last to find his way thither. A man must be roused to wonder ere he can be roused to exertion; he who is past being surprised into wonder—the beginning of all generous emotion—may also be said to be past helping.

It is this thought which Jesus expresses by saying that unless men become as little children they shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven; for the child is a poet—he still moves amid marvels which habit has not yet made ordinary—the world to him is still a beautiful mosaic, the freshness of whose exquisite colouring has not yet been dimmed by layer upon grey layer of accumulating dust. Must the vision fade? Is it inevitable that beauty, art, heroism, poetry, religion should lose their power of making quick appeal to us, sure of quick response? Have we no choice but to submit to this devitalising process, growing year by year less capable of the gladness of being roused from the monotony of daily life? Surely, it is not so: the child within the man or woman need never die, may be re-awakened from torpor and seeming death; and the man or woman become as a little child again, to their own wonder and amaze, will find themselves filled with the power to aspire and to attain. "Astonished they shall reach the kingdom."

That which paralyses our religious aspirations and makes us laggards on the heavenward way, is often not so much perversity or positive distaste for the spiritual life, as that we have grown incurious, listless, unamazed—practically unaware of what religion means. We have become "used" to its appeal, and think little about it. Religion ceases to interest us: then counter influences assert themselves, and become potent for ill. Most of us have little taste for emotional raptures, self-induced ecstasies, catastrophic experiences; let us beware of the opposite danger of treating religion as though it were a possession which can be locked away out of sight and kept intact and undiminished without being so much as looked at. Such a possession, as it is of little use to the owner, will presently come to have little value for him; nay, a faith so passively held will in course of time infallibly wane and disappear. The realities of the spirit never grow less wonderful; it is only as we fail to wonder at them that they fail to be real to us.

How can we fail to marvel at the mere promise of the kingdom? Into a world so full of suffering and delusion and hurtful passion as ours, whence comes this message telling of an ideal state in which wrong shall be righted and goodness sit enthroned, and purity be triumphant? The belief that the golden age lies in the past might be thought far more natural to man than one in a golden age that is to come! But that this same assurance should visibly, if slowly, be compelling its own fulfilment; that the kingdoms of this world should be undergoing that transforming process which will yet change them into the kingdom of God—if we wonder not at this, the fault is with our vision and its downward bent, not with the prophecy and its realisation in the upward trend of the world. Not a mere figment of the imagination, but a pattern laid up in heaven for realisation on earth, the kingdom of God is at hand. Do we believe it? Let us marvel and give thanks!

Jesus saith: "Let not him that seeketh cease until he find the kingdom; only see that ye be steadfast, and lose not the brightness and wonder of the quest in dreary unimaginativeness and acquiescence in what is, rather than aspiration after what should be. Listless and impassive, ye shall miss the kingdom, astonished ye shall reach it, astonished lay hold of the reward prepared for you before the foundations of the world; for that reward—O ye that here have been tossed about by passion, and maimed by sorrow, and vexed by vain desires, and wasted by sufferings of heart and mind—that infinite reward is peace."

LITERATURE.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

THE biography of a great preacher is generally interesting on account of the breadth of sympathy and the insight into living problems, which are among the special gifts that fit him for popularity. The biography of Canon Liddon has little of this charm, and probably many readers will lay the book down with a feeling of disappointment, a little puzzled to understand the secret of his power. The memory goes back to one of those wonderful Sunday afternoons in St. Paul's, the vast throng of worshippers under the dome, the breathless silence, and the solitary figure in the pulpit who holds all these men and women in the hollow of his hand with his spiritual intensity and his matchless voice. Every word penetrates to the farthest edge of the crowd, and it comes winged with a message to the soul. His life does not explain it, and its failure to do so must surely be attributed in part to his biographer. Possibly he has done his best with the materials, but the book drags heavily in places, and it is overweighted with controversial details which have ceased long ago to be of interest.

It is true that it must have been singularly difficult to draw a portrait of Liddon so as to give a just impression of the man. It is the penalty of the controversialist that the memory of his hard thrusts and his false prophecies live after him, while the elusive personal charm is forgotten by all except his friends. Liddon was a man of war from his youth. There was no moderation in his hostility to Essays and Reviews and Lux Mundi. He had the Oxford passion for pressing the logic of an argument home to the last syllable of the last word. Amid the fatal inroads of the modern spirit it was his glory that he stood always super antiquas vias. He was the last great champion in the English Church of infallible, unalterable dogma.

But Liddon was something much more than this. He was a religious genius, and it was this, and not his lost battles or impossible opinions, which enabled him to sway the hearts and mould the characters of men. The Bishop of Oxford has written an appreciation of him, largely from this point of view, which forms the last chapter of the biography. It is a delicate and searching analysis of his character and influence, both in their strength and weakness. But he closes rightly on the religious note, and Liddon's habitual way of regarding men as the New Testament speaks of them. "He fulfilled, with the further penetration of Christian insight, the saying that the abler a man is the fewer ordinary people he finds. Even the distinctions of intellect and culture did not stay his direct looking to the real vocation of the soul. The roughest tramp upon the road was in his eyes one who might come to be numbered with Christ's saints in glory everlasting; the most brilliant and distinguished guest he met had no higher possibility than that; and there was a peculiar note of sadness and of pity in the way he sometimes spoke of men who, with splendid gifts and ample opportunities, seemed to have declined their task in life or lost their way." These few sentences, perhaps more than anything else that the book contains, lay bare the secret of his power, and they account for the ineffaceable memory of a Sunday afternoon in St. Paul's long ago.

Miss Louise Imogen Guiney has edited a bulky volume upon Hurrell Froude. The word "edited" is used advisedly, for it consists chiefly of extracts from his letters and journal, and various estimates of his character and influence drawn from the voluminous literature of the Oxford movement. To many students of the movement, Froude has been a fascinating and rather mysterious figure, linked indissolubly with Keble and Newman in those far-off romantic days. To others he is the evil genius whose impulsive rashness drove Newman into extreme courses, and precipitated the final catastrophe. There is no fresh material for the solution of the problem in Miss Guiney's book. The three volumes of the Remains of Hurrell Froude, which caused such consternation on their appearance, are not often met with, and they are never likely to be reprinted. There is, accordingly, an obvious convenience in possessing a judicious selection from the material for the history of the Movement which they contain; but any attempt to rescue the memory of Froude from growing oblivion, and to claim a place for him among the great religious leaders is hardly likely to be successful. The book contains some interesting illustrations. The pencil sketch by Miss Maria Giberne of Newman, T. Mozley, and Froude, in the Oriel Common Room, in 1832, has never seen the light before.

Some readers will turn possibly with a sigh of relief from these clerical biographies to the two delightful volumes of the Memorials of Burne-Jones. Delightful they are in every sense of the word, in their sumptuous outward appearance, with hand-made paper and beautiful pictures, and in the simple unaffected narrative written with fine judgment and literary taste. Lady Burne-Jones has told the story of her husband's life as part of her own. It is almost like reading an autobiography. There is no pretence of detachment, and the first person singular is used throughout. It is all the better for this naturalness. The picture of the artist himself and of his group of friends is a very fascinating one. They are all moved by the same ideals, a revival of wonder and of feeling for the beautiful, which becomes with some of them a passion strong as life. Bohemian they were, no doubt, but not in the sense which a stiff social creed often attaches to the word. There was about them a noble simplicity of purpose, an unworldly carelessness about the morrow, and a rare genius for friendship. Nothing could be more tender and sympathetic than the picture of Rossetti—their glorious Gabriel—before sorrow and mental trouble played havoc with his life; and after all that has been written about Ruskin, there are here many fresh touches which make us more intimate with him as a man and a friend. Next to the pages of Præterita they are among the most revealing things which have been written about him. But of all the friends of Burne-Jones there was one who stood closest, and it is fitting that these two volumes should be worthy of a place beside Mackail's Life of William Morris. For the lover of good literature and beautiful books it is hardly possible to give them higher praise.

Messrs. Macmillan have published recently a volume of sermons by Canon Ainger. It is called The Gospel and Human Life, and the task of selecton has been entrusted to the capable hands of Canon Beeching. Probably many people will turn to it with higher expectations than is usually the case with a book of the kind. They remember the unique personality and look of the late Master of the Temple, his mobile and expressive face, his delicate humour, and his excellent conversation. They recall the wonderful setting of the venerable church, which gave a sort of mystic charm to the service. There was not a note either in the music or the reading that jarred. False emphasis of any kind, the self-conscious phrase, the striving for popular effect were completely absent. My memory goes back to a Sunday afternoon in the Temple Church many years ago, which remains with me, not for any word bitten into, the memory by the eloquence of the preacher, but as a perfectly satisfying spiritual impression. But now that the sermons are taken out of their setting, and given to us in a book, they are disappointing, just because we want to find in them qualities which the printed page can never convey. Perhaps to a greater degree than is the case with the work of most preachers, they are interwoven with the texture of the service, and are hardly separable from it. There is, too, a vein of quiet sadness running through them, which, perhaps, should hardly surprise us in the interpreter of Charles Lamb; and a curious aloofness from the difficulties which beset dogmatic Christianity at the present time. These difficulties are mentioned, but they are handled in such a way as to show that the preacher never entered deeply into their heart, or really understood the tragedy which they create for many earnest minds. Altogether it is not a book which is likely to live more than its season; but many readers will be glad to spend a quiet hour with it, especially if they are able, as they read, to recapture from the envious years the look and tone of a rare and arresting personality.

The centenary celebration has become one of the fashionable excitements of modern literary life. Its short-lived enthusiasm has something rather artificial about it, but it is justified if it sends even a few readers to the great books which they have been neglecting. It is to be hoped that this will be the result of the ter-centenary of the publication of Don Quixote. Mr. John Lane has published a short Life of Cervantes, by Mr. Albert F. Calvert to mark the occasion, with full bibliographical details, a series of portraits (none of which apparently is authentic), and reproductions of title pages and early illustrations. An appendix is devoted to a collection of the proverbs of Cervantes, which make excellent reading. Few of them probably are original. They were the current coin in Spain, the land of proverbs, at the time when Cervantes wrote. But it is interesting to notice how the same form of expression is continued for centuries in popular speech. Many of these sayings are characteristic of the invincible good humour of Don Quixote. I venture to commend the two following as worthy of wide acceptance: "When one door is shut another is opened," and "He who sings frightens away his ills."

THE STAR

(VERSES SUGGESTED BY THE FIRST OF BRAHMS' "DREI INTERMEZZI").

Be it star of the sky,
Be it star of the sea,
'Tis the star that alone
Thy pilot shall be.

No clouds can obscure it,
No darkness can hide,
Tho' the slant wing of Death
Swoop down on the tide.

At thy launching it rose
A flickering spark;
Thro' youth unregarded
It guided thy bark.

None other can guide thee,
None other can show
Thro' all the waste waters
The way thou shouldst go.

Ah, reveal it to none,
They will laugh at thy quest,
And foolish and vain
Is a purpose confessed.

But in the still hour
When all slumber save those Who watch for thy bark
In the haven's repose,

With hand on the tiller,
With eye on the goal,
With silence begirded,
Commune with thy soul.

Lo, vast is the deep!
Lo, the haven is far!
Trust thyself to the deep,
Fix thine eye on the star.

Be it star of the sky
Be it star of the foam,
At last, ah, at last
It shall pilot thee home.

THOMAS J. HARDY.

THE late Mrs. James Worthington, of Sale, has left bequests of £1,000 each to Manchester College, Oxford; Owen's College, and the Manchester Domestic Mission, and the Manchester and Salford Sick Poor and Private Nursing Institution.

THE Venerable Maharshi Devendra Nath Tagore, who, on the death of the Raja Rammohun Roy, became the leader of the Brahmo Samaj, of India, passed away in his ancestral home at Calcutta, on Thursday afternoon, January 19, in the 87th year of his age. He is described as a man of deep, spiritual influence, and it was he who first recognised the power of Keshub Chunder Sen, who afterwards became the chief inspirer of the movement.

OBITUARY.

MR. FREDERICK NASH FORDHAM.

FREDERICK NASH FORDHAM, of Royston, younger son of the late John George Fordham, was born at Odsey, near Royston, on November 16, 1809. He was educated at Mr. Tayler's school at Nottingham, and Dr. Carpenter's school at Bristol. Here he received a liberal classical education. He belonged to a family keenly interested in politics and religion, and taking in both a Liberal position. The Fordhams of Sandon and Odsey were among those who were associated, in different parts of the country, in the Freethinking Christian movement. In later years this was practically merged in Unitarianism, and Mr. Frederick Fordham and his brother, the late Mr. Henry Fordham, were among the chief supporters of the Unitarian congregation in Royston. At the age of twenty Mr. Fordham was appointed treasurer of the "Freehold Land Association," which was formed for the purpose of creating small holdings to give the voting qualification for Parliamentary elections. He was an ardent reformer and free trader in the old pre-Reform and Corn Law days. His conversation was full of reminiscences of old times, travel on the Continent and in England in the old coaching days, the fashionable life of Bath and of his native county in the early nineteenth century, political contests in the time of open voting and not a little rough horseplay.

Though for many years he had ceased to take an active part in political movements, his interest in life and in the life and welfare of those about him never flagged.

In the year 1838 he married Mary Ann, daughter of the late Mr. Edward Fordham. He leaves a son, Mr. F. John Fordham, of Royston, and four daughters — Mrs. Grundy, of Royston, Lady Prevost, Miss Rosa and Miss Josephine Fordham, of Royston.

Mr. Fordham died at his residence, the Old Bank House, on Sunday, the 12th inst., after some few weeks' illness. The funeral took place at the cemetery on the 16th inst., the service being conducted by the Rev. F. H. Jones. The very large attendance at the service testified abundantly to the esteem and affection with which Mr. Fordham was regarded.

MR. J. G. STEPHENS.

BY the death of Mr. John G. Stephens Exeter has lost a worthy citizen and George's Chapel a life-long member. He was a kindly and courtly gentleman, and will be much missed in the places that now will know him no more. For several years he had been prevented by deafness from joining in the chapel services, but as a trustee he continued to the last to take an active interest in its affairs. Some of the more poorly-paid ministers of Devonshire have had reason to think gratefully of him, for he was treasurer of the Towgood Fund, from which they annually received a small but welcome addition to their income. He leaves a widow, a son and two daughters. The Rev. T. W. Chignell officiated at the funeral, which took place on Saturday last.

BY A MINISTER.

XVI.

IT has been said that the old Roman spirit, a spirit of manliness and fortitude, nearly always broke down under banishment, and the names that at once recur are those of Ovid, Cicero, and Seneca.

Ovid's "Tristia" is a long-drawn wail, which drops more than once into peevish whining. The cause of his banishment is a mystery still. All that is known with certainty is that in his fiftieth year he was ordered by Imperal edict to withdraw from Rome, and to betake himself to the extreme border of the empire, near the mouths of the Danube. The severity of the climate and the roughness of the inhabitants afflicted the poet greatly. The five books of the "Tristia" were written in the first four years of his exile. It is impossible to clear them from the charge of abject entreaty and still more contemptible flattery. The indulgence of Augustus is implored in terms which might be addressed to a god. He seems, however, to have earned in later years the respect of the people amongst whom his lot was cast, and there is one well-known passage in his poem which shows that, in the midst of his despondency, the cringing courtier was not entirely without spirit. The following lines may serve as a translation:—

Of home and friends and native land bereft,
Despoiled of all that force can take away,
One joy I have, one sweet companion left,
A poet's mind that laughs at Cæsar's sway.

Ovid died at the age of sixty, in the tenth year of his exile, A.D. 18.

It was in the year 58 B.C. that Cicero, expecting an adverse vote in the Senate, left Rome, and left also his wife Terentia, his dauguter Tullia, and his little son Marcus. He was then in his forty-ninth year. His offence was that during his consulship, five years before, on the discovery of Catiline's conspiracy, he had interpreted too freely the Senate's commission to provide for the safety of the State, and had ordered the execution without trial of five of the conspirators. For this abuse of power, on the motion of his bitterest enemy, he was now called to account, and the Senate which he had served was made the instrument of his punishment. It was not until the middle of the following year that he was recalled, and his letters during that period show him at his weakest. He had no sooner taken the dignified course of leaving the city peacefully, to spare it the calamity of an armed struggle, than he was filled with passionate regret that he had not risked a conflict. His letters to his wife and children, temperate enough in parts, are often broken by lamentation and vain self-reproach. The letters to Atticus show that at times he suspected his friends, and was ready to stoop to stratagem in order to be reconciled to his enemies. If he writes a sentence or two with composure, he is sure to end with a string of complaints. In almost the last letter that he wrote, a year before his death, he speaks thus: "I do not forget, in all my troubles, how much I owe to philosophy. Philosophy it is that weans me from anxiety, and even arms me against all the attacks of fortune. Follow my example. Where there is no evil there is no ill.'' This is well said, but it is with wisdom as with courage—it too often comes after the event. It nerved Cicero to meet his cruel death, but did not support him in the misfortunes of his life.

The failure of philosophy was still more marked in the case of Seneca, for he was steeped in the doctrine of the Stoics, and aspired to the name. The reason for his banishment to Corsica is as little known as the cause which drove Ovid to Tomi. The date of his sentence was the year 41 A.D., and he was then about forty-eight years of age. The rocky islands of the Mediterranean were crowded with political exiles, and Seneca's lot was pitiable indeed. At first he made an effort to bear up bravely, and, if the lofty tone of the "Consolatio ad Helviam Matrem" had been maintained, the statesman-philosopher would have been honoured for all time for his patience and firmness under adversity. Nothing can exceed in dignity and grace the comforting words addressed to his mother. The happiness denied without he found within. Exile was only a change of habitation; never was rock so wild and barren as not to be for some time their chosen abode; he had the sky above him to gaze at, and his bodily wants were few; disgrace could not touch him until he despised himself; let her rise above the weakness of a woman's tears, as she had always been superior to the follies of her sex; let her find not less delight than before in the companionship of those who were left to her, and think hopefully and cheerfully of her absent son. Two years afterwards Seneca wrote another "Consolatio." It was a letter of condolence with a certain Polybius—a freedman advanced to great power in the Emperor's Court—on the death of his brother. It was really intended to come under Cæsar's eye, and to plead with him on the writer's behalf, for in it was penned the most grovelling adulation of the man whose name and memory he afterwards covered with hatred and contempt. The attempt failed, and five more years passed before Seneca was recalled to Rome.

Religion also has failed men in the hour of tria , but there can be no doubt that a new spirit of endurance came into the world under the sign of the Cross. It breathes in words like these: "I, John, was in the isle that is called Patmos for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus. I was in the spirit on the Lord's day"; "He took bread and gave thanks to God in presence of them al"; "The brethren came to meet us as far as the Market of Appius and the Three Taverns: whom when Paul saw, he thanked God, and took courage"; "The things which have happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the progress of the Gospel. Christ is proclaimed; therein I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice"; "Brother, let me have joy of thee in the Lord: refresh my heart in Christ"; "All that would live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." Such are the scanty references in the first Christian records to exile, shipwreck, captivity. Even more restrained are the few veiled allusions to personal suffering. "Thanks be to God, which always leadeth us in triumph in Christ" (a captive behind his car); "The word of God is not bound" (chained like the writer's hand); "I am already being offered" (poured out as a libation). It has been said that the early Christians were Stoics without knowing it. It would be nearer the truth to say that Christianity showed how little Stoicism, by comparison, was worth knowing. Macauay speaks of the cant of Seneca's philosophy. It is certainly curious to reflect that, whilst the philosopher was meditating "epigrammatic conceits about the evils of luxury, in gardens which moved the envy of sovereigns," the Apostle, within a stone's throw, was forgetting all his pains, and even liberty itself, in the thought that he was "the prisoner," not of Nero, but "of Christ."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN

THE LOST VOYAGE.

ONE thing that helped to reconcile Peggy to her fate, and encouraged her in the manufacture of pillows was a story her mother had told her, which, as far as I recollect, for I had heard her mention it too, ran as follows:—

Mrs. McIntyre had gone out to Australia with her father and mother when she was a girl. They went up country, through miles and miles of bush in an ox-wagon, took a section of land, and settled down to the life of what is called in the Colonies a squatter, that is, a sheep-farmer. They had their fair share of good fortune and bad, winning the former by dint of intelligence and hard work, and bearing up against the latter, which came chiefly in the form of an occasional drought which killed off half their sheep and cattle, with sturdy patience and perseverance. Grace Bakewell, as her name then was, grew up with her brothers glorying in the stirring, free life of the bush and the farm. Everyone in the family had a part to play in the round of daily duties for which he or she was held responsible. Grace was her mother's right hand indoors, where cooking and cleaning, making and mending and washing gave them almost as much as they could get through. And then in the evenings, if not too tired or busy, sometimes there would be a song with one of her brothers, or she would play over an old school piece on the piano. Out of doors, too, Grace had the sole management of the poultry yard, and she had good reason to be proud of all her fluffy darlings, her straddling geese and gobbling turkeys. There was a family of kangaroos in the neighbourhood, and, as Mr. Bakewell would not allow his boys to hunt these timid beasties, which hopped over the country like enormous fleas, in dry weather, of which there was more than enough, they would sometimes venture close up to the settlement, and drink from the bucket of water which Grace set for them outside the paddock fence. But time passed, and Grace was discovered by the son of a neighbouring squatter. They were married, and started for themselves with a sheeprun of their own not far away from their old homes, and by and by, around them came boys and girls as well as sheep and lambs. And in their turn the children grew up, went away to school and college, and came back to help their parents or started homes of their own elsewhere; and by the time the youngest boy, Rob, was away as third mate of a steamer, Grace McIntyre found herself getting on in years. But every year that passed only increased her longing to come back on a visit to England to see the dear old home country and the few faithful friends who were still alive. And now that all her children were old enough to look after themselves, the opportunity seemed to have arrived. So she wrote to her friends in London to say by what steamer she was sailing, packed up her boxes, and finally her husband and one of her daughters went down to the port with her to see her on board. But before starting she thought she had better get a new pair of spectacles as her sight was not as good as it had been. So they called at an optician's in Sydney, and he examined her eyes. Little did she dream of the disappointment that awaited her. "Madam," said the man, "your eyes are in a very serious condition. The sight of one is almost gone, and that of the other is rapidly following. I should advise you to see a specialist at once." Mrs. McIntyre took his advice, but the specialist's opinion only made the prospect darker. She had to give up all hope of the voyage, went back to her home, and in six months she was totally blind. She knew it would be so. The doctor had forewarned her that there was no means of saving the sight.

Well, what did she do? She set to work at once, while she still had the use of one eye, to read and write according to the method of the blind, so that by the time her sight was completely gone she could just fumble out the letters, and was fairly well on the way in learning to write. This is done by the help of a wooden tablet or frame, something like a slate, only full of little holes, the letters being formed by making rows of dents in the page by pushing it with a small instrument into the holes. To read it the paper has to be turned over, and then the dents are felt as raised dots. Mrs. McIntyre persevered and in course of time was able to prick out the words rapidly. Then she determined to put her newly acquired art to good service. She would translate a book into the blind lettering, so that others who were afflicted like herself could read it with their fingers. So her husband or one of her children, or occasionally a friend would give her her writing frame and paper, and then sit slowly reading from the book at which she was working. Word by word, line by line, and page by page, she transcribed it into blind characters, until the whole book was done. For years she has been thus working away steadily at her beneficent task, during which time she has turned no less than a hundred books into the lettering which the blind can read. This is the way that blind Grace McIntyre became sight to the blind, feeling with her fingers, when her eyes had failed her for travelling, a track that others could follow into the many strange and beautiful lands of the world of books.

MORE LIFE, AND FULLER.

WE have long been accustomed to hear it said, with somewhat wearisome iteration, that our churches are cold and dead, and that we have no Gospel, and therefore, of course, must die. For three generations at least, and probably a great deal longer than that, candid friends, the wish being father to the thought, have gone about saying this, and yet, somehow, it does not prove to be true. There is an obstinate stirring of vitality in what some people would like to believe are the dry bones of Unitarianism; the churches, with their great inheritance of freedom, still are here, and people still gather in them to worship in spirit and in truth. And when it is said that a Unitarian cannot have a Gospel or be a Christian in any vital sense, or help his brethren in the crises of supreme mortal need, one wonders what these talkers have known of the hidden life of earnest Unitarians throughout these generations. One remembers faces of the aged long ago, and in these last days, which in the evening time were radiant with heavenly hope, and on which there ultimately came to rest the sure impress of Divine peace. One remembers strong men and devoted women, who bore the burden and the heat through long years of honourable service, with a noble integrity doing the world's work, ministering quietly, unselfishly to its pathetic needs, strong in fidelity to truth and in unwavering faith in the Divine kingdom to be established in our midst; when the working day was over, content to be led wherever the Divine purpose might appoint, with no fear of death, but with earnest expectation and the calmness of a beautiful trust. This we have seen even when death came through the agony of suffering, and long, silent martyrdom; there has been victory of faith and love wonderful to see, tokens of Divine benediction, manifest even in the midst of agony, and the deep assurance of life stronger than death. Remembering such lives nurtured in our homes of faith from one generation to another, seeing what conflict there has been for righteousness, what purity of soul won through grievous trial, what wrestling with temptation, what gracious helpfulness to lift men and women out of the baseness and foulness of degraded life, one wonders at the fatuity of the prejudice which can assert that Unitarians have no Gospel, and no vital power to overcome evil with good.

True, we have our own thought of the Divine compassion and the Eternal Goodness, and of the methods by which GOD leads His children up to nobler life; but we affirm that our thought is in the true line of Christian insight and in perfect harmony with the MASTER'S spirit. We do not want a new Gospel, for the old is completely satisfying to every human need. What we want is to enter more completely into its spirit and realise that it belongs to our present life as it is in the world to-day, as it grows with growing knowledge and an enlarged conception of the Universe of GOD. It is not the Gospel as the creeds of the Churches, commonly called orthodox, have attempted to interpret it, but as it was in the heart of Jesus—the Gospel of human fellowship, that hungers after righteousness and would be pure in heart, the Gospel of hope and confidence, whether in life or death, in the FATHER'S constant care and perfect love.

We long for a revival of religious life, a deepening of faith, a strengthening of the hands which would help and heal, a perfecting of the love that shall have the victory over all evil. Such a revival must come, not by any forced excitement, but by the quiet ways of the Spirit, in the ordered growth of faithful life, and the unfolding of true affection, even as now the earth is being led silently but surely in the way of GOD'S faithfulness to the great revival of the spring. The days lengthen, the sun gains more power, once more love is victorious, and all the earth will rejoice in the fulness of life. Why should there not be now a revival of such life in our churches, through the power of vital religion unfolded in the hearts of faithful men and women, and the children who are growing up to rejoice with them?

The way of faithfulness for us is in a stronger hold upon righteousness, which we know to be of GOD, wherever duty leads and calls us to serve or to endure, seeking to be more true and brave, seeking for the fuller vision, waiting steadfastly and humbly for that joy which is of the LORD. Righteousness first is for ever the great word of the coming Kingdom; righteousness which works and is perfected in love, that is the truth which every Christian knows. We are pledged to life, and true life is only by that way. Revival, renewal, increase of a strong and joyous faith in our religion will come as we stand together in true comradeship, acknowledging our strength to be in the righteousness of GOD, our life and service in His world. We shall be brought nearer to Him as we face every problem of our life with a new earnestness, with the joy of a true fellowship, strengthening one another, bearing the burdens of the weary and heavy laden, seeking to rouse the indifferent, to shame the recreant, to lift up the fallen. We are to enter into the glory of a true manly life, brave, pure, tender and earnest, doing the world's honest work, striving for a better ordering of the world's affairs, because it is GOD'S world and His Kingdom is to come. This ideal touches our life at every point. It is concerned with the shaping of character, the casting out of evil, victory over sordid vice and reckless passion. It is concerned with the unfolding of the graces of life, making all things beautiful in the homes where the children may be glad, healing the wounds of those who are hurt by the world's unkindness, making an end of oppression and wrong. And it is concerned with every effort of social reform, of national amelioration, and international peace and goodwill. Earnest men have different theories of how the betterment is to be attained. What is essential to religion and to a revival of its power is, that men should be convinced that these things are its concern, and their concern above all, because this is GOD'S world, and they are bound to search out GOD'S way of righting its wrongs and bringing harmony and true well-being to all alike.

If we give to social effort its true place at the very heart of our religion, side by side with the discipline of character, we shall have gone a long way towards preparing for that great revival in the spiritual life with GOD, for which we long, and which can come to us only by the Grace Divine.

When we have set ourselves so to prepare the way, and, when we look into one another's faces, know that we are pledged to that great endeavour, and even with passionate fidelity mean to keep our hold upon that righteousness in which alone we can be strong, making our life our religion and our earnest prayer to GOD, then there will be a deeper purpose and a new spirit in our common worship. There we shall have the living testimony of the prophets of old and of the word of Jesus in his beatitudes, the grace of his spirit, the fellowship of his love and of his prayer to the FATHER of us all. With him, surely, his life was his religion, and it is for us the great reality, as he is the great Chief of faithful souls. In our work and in our prayer we find it true; and as we gather in the freedom of the spirit for common worship in the Church we rejoice in that great communion of the seen and unseen, and know that we in our day and generation are to live and labour as the MASTER did, to give ourselves for the brethren's sake, and to be faithful unto death.

Through this testimony of our faith the clear daylight of the modern world glows with rich light of the spirit, in which is the eternal truth. We have but to be faithful to the duties of our own day, in humble, fearless service, patient, eager, and strenuous, asking only that we may do our work as GOD appoints it, in His love and fear, loving the brethren with a frank, rejoicing love, and we shall find that the Grace Divine adds beauty and a great joy to our lot. Then comes the opening vision of the greater glory, the renewal of life, the strong and true revival of religion, which shall put to shame our days of little faith, and bring blessing to the world beyond all that we had dared to hope.

MARTINEAU CENTENARY CELEBRATION AT NORWICH.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow us through your columns to give preliminary notice that the congregation of the Octagon Chapel desire to celebrate worthily in his native city the centenary of the birth of Dr. Martineau, on Good Friday, April 21, and on Easter Sunday, April 23. We hope that Dr. Drummond will preach at the service to be held on Good Friday morning, and that the Revs. P. M. Higginson, J. Estlin Carpenter, C. B. Upton, W. C. Bowie, V. D. Davis, W. G. Tarrant, Dr. Blake Odgers, Mr. David Martineau, and others will take part in the subsequent proceedings. On Easter Sunday the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed will conduct one of the services. Representatives of the British and Foreign Unitarian and the Sunday School Associations will be present, and we trust that all the district societies will send delegates. Our hospitality is limited, but we offer entertainment to all ministerial delegates of associations. There are several good hotels in the city at reasonable prices, particulars of which, with the programme of proceedings (as soon as ready), will be sent to any address on application to the Secretary.

ALFRED HALL, Minister;
W. H. SCOTT, Chairman;
A. M. STEVENS,
55, Magdalen-street, Norwich,
Secretary.

WE shall publish next week an article on "Richard Acland Armstrong: Social Reformer," by Sir Edward Russell, editor of the Liverpool Daily Post and Mercury. Sir Edward Russell writes from intimate knowledge of the great effort for the cleansing of the city of Liverpool, in which Mr. Armstrong took so decisive a part, and his article is a tribute for which many friends will be grateful. To avoid disappointment orders for extra copies of the paper should be sent in at once.

MEMORIAL TO DR. AND MRS. BROOKE HERFORD.

THE memorial brass to Dr. and Mrs. Brooke Herford, which has been placed in the Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, by the congregation, was dedicated and unveiled by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed at the close of the service last Sunday morning. There was a very large and representative congregation, and the service was conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow.

The memorial, which is placed on the wall of the chapel facing the congregation, to the right of the chancel, is a very beautiful piece of work in repoussé toned brass, by Mr. George Wragge, of Manchester. The upper part of the oblong is decorated with foliage, surrounding a symbolic cross, and below is the inscription, ending with a sentence of Dr. Herford's own. The whole surface of the brass is raised, and surrounded by a decorated border, and the lettering is very skilfully wrought so as to be eas y legible. The inscription is as follows:—

IN MEMORY OF
BROOKE HERFORD D.D.
FROM 1892 TO 1901 MINISTER
OF THIS CONGREGATION
BORN 1830 DIED 1903
AND OF HANNAH HIS WIFE
DAUGHTER OF WM. HANKINSON
BORN 1823 DIED 1901
LET US LIVE AND WORK WITH OUR FACES EVER
TOWARDS THE LIGHT.
B. H.

The service, which began with the opening address and prayer from Dr. Martineau's "Ninth Service," included as lessons Psalms xcv. and xcvi., and Romans xii. This latter was also the subject of Mr. Gow's sermon, the text being, "Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord" (Rom. xii. 11).

After dwelling on the "consecrated common-sense" of this chapter, which he regarded, with Rom. viii. and I. Cor. xiii., as among the greatest of St. Paul's utterances, Mr. Gow concluded as follows:—

"I have dwelt at length upon this chapter of Paul's, because it reminds me so continually of the man who is in all our thoughts to-day. There was such keen, practical insight into human nature, such strong business faculty, such a religious love of order and neatness, such a gift of showing mercy with cheerfulness, such a quiet, inexhaustible humour, finding something to smile at even in his own weakness and pain; such a note of reality in everything he said, and behind and within it all such a deep and noble faith in God. It is not for me to speak now of him in any detail, nor of her who was so true a helpmeet and a friend, and who is united with him in your affection and your gratitude. They were both strenuous workers, equally faithful and devoted, in small things as in great, lovers of simplicity and truth, rejoicing in life, and not afraid of death. The love of God and man was the source of their happiness and power; it consecrated the commonplace, it gave courage and cheer in the darkest passages of life, it made beautiful their home, it kindled the affection and reverence of friends. When we think of them, we feel how truly they are described by Paul's noble words, 'Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord.'"

At the conclusion of the sermon, the annual collection for the London Domestic Missions was made, and meanwhile "O rest in the Lord" was beautifully sung by a member of the choir.

Mr. WALTER BAILY, speaking from the chancel steps, then gave a brief address, referring to the simplicity of the inscription as most in accordance with what Dr. and Mrs. Herford would have wished, and saying that while they needed no outward memorial of their friends, they would yet be glad to have always before them there such a visible sign of the feeling that was in their hearts, while for those who came after them, it would serve to keep those names in perpetual remembrance. He read the inscription, and, on behalf of the congregation, asked the Rev. Philip Wicksteed, as an old and intimate friend, and the writer of the memoir in the last volume of Dr. Herford's sermons, to unveil the memorial.

REV. P. H. WICKSTEED'S ADDRESS.

Mr. Wicksteed then gave the following address:—

This memorial is one of a now large number that deepen and sweeten the associations of this place of worship. To almost all who are here, perhaps, there will be some personal reminiscences connected with the memorial windows and reliefs that are around us, associations with the early promise of a friend, unfulfilled in the concrete performance of life, because cut off by death, but still living and working in our hearts; or with strong and earnest lives that bore the burden and heat of the day; keen intelligence; beauty and grace; companionship long cherished and never to be forgotten. But there is one monument, in particular, that will be in all our thoughts to-day in connection with the one I am to unveil. It is that to Brooke Herford's predecessor, Dr. Sadler. There may be many here whose memory goes back with mine to the days, some 40 or 50 years ago, when as boys, they strolled on a Sunday over what were then the Shepherd's Fields, from Adelaide-road to the Sunday service here, where the pastor led his flock by the still waters and through the green pastures of the Lord, and gave them the sense of Sunday peace and consecration.

There may be many who as girls were taught by him to love the poetry perhaps of Milton or Wordsworth, or to understand those utterances of Paul, of which we have heard once more this morning. His gentle shepherding bore fruit in many lives, and gathered and fostered the communal sense of worship here; and this chapel itself is his monument. A certain saying of his will lead us to the subject which is more directly in our thoughts to-day. He once came down when I was minister at Little Portland street to give a paper at our Congregational Society on the older London ministers, who were only a tradition to us. He laid stress on the fact that although opinions had greatly changed since he first knew the London ministers, yet the men of those days were not a whit behind the frowardest representative of the later generations in the firmness of their grasp of the principles of freedom of thought and religious liberty. In fact, they were by no means the fossils we were apt to imagine them. For, he added, though "we all of us know that our ancestors are dead, we do not always remember that they were not dead when they were alive."

No! They were not dead when they were alive; and there is no fear, I think, so long as any memory or tradition of Brooke Herford lasts, that anyone will think that he was dead when he was alive. Nay, for he is alive still, more living in the lives of many of us than the people who walk about, and "eat, and drink, and sleep, and put on clothes."

His elder brother, who is still with us, remembers how, when they both were young, they were taking an open-air service together, and Brooke gave out the two opening lines of a long metre hymn, but someone started it to a common metre tune. How they got through the first two lines I do not know; but from that point onward Brooke gave out the hymn two lines at a time, but, by extemporised changes and omissions, turned it as he went along into common metre, to his brother's amazement and admiration—not unmingled with the feeling that it was all a piece of audacious effrontery! But now, after sixty years, I suppose, his mind goes back to this trivial incident as to a type of the ready mastery with which this man handled life; for he was alive, and everything he touched lived. The hymn itself became a living organism, and shaped itself to its environment, in his hands. It was not a lifeless property but a living ally. No doubt Brooke himself keenly enjoyed the performance, for he retained in manhood a freshness of childlike wonder and delight in his own experiences, resources, and discoveries. I am reminded how once, not far from here, a number of little scholars were constructing a cunning apparatus for measuring and adding up the angles of a triangle. Each child had drawn a triangle for himself, and all were of different forms. The first child added up the angles of his triangle, and found that altogether they took him just half round a circle; then the next tried his, with the same result; then, gradually, amid growing excitement, they came to suspect that this was a universal property of triangles, and one cried out: "If it is, we shall have found a truth!"

Now Brooke Herford was a child, in the best sense, all his life; and, as he read and thought and lived, he was always "finding truths," as fresh as if they had never been found before, and, week by week, he came here and entered the pulpit, having "found a truth," and giving it forth with the flash of wonder and delight of childhood. It was this sense of the freshness of life—a new discovery day by day and week by week—that gave that intensity to his personality which makes him still alive. And this same vitality gave unity to all his moods and all his doings. There was no "dead wood" in his branches. There was nothing that went on of itself by tradition and had ceased to draw upon his vital forces for its nourishment; and so there was no side of his character that could mar the context by inappropriate intrusion when some other side of it was on show. His humour, his shrewdness, his common sense, his knowledge of the world and his moderation and dislike of anything overstrained were not intruders in the pulpit, that needed an apology if they appeared there; and his earnestness, his sense of the weight and magnitude of the issues of moral choice, his cheerful devoutness and his zeal for righteousness were not intruders in his undress, easy intercourse, in his holiday-making, and his over-flowing fun. They were not things alien fom the temper of the moment that had to be fetched when wanted. They were there all the time. He never had to escape from his religion in order to give it a rest, or to indulge his irresponsible whims without being watched. It would never in his most unguarded hours have seemed strange to him or have needed an effort or a wrench to pour out the feelings of the moment in prayer or thanksgiving. This mutual interpenetration of his religion and the whole range of a life that was sensitive at every point, stands as his great characteristic.

Indeed I cannot keep my mind from that most beautiful of the Transformations recorded by Ovid, in which he tells how Jupiter and Mercury came to earth, and found no hospitality in the abodes of the wealthy; but the peasants Baucis and Philemon gave them of the simple fare they had, and entertained deities unawares. The gods led out the peasants, and showed them the plain, with all its inhospitable dwellings overwhelmed in a great flood, but their own little cottage stood on an eminence transformed into a temple. And when the gods asked them what gift they would have, they begged to be the priest and priestess of the temple, and that they might die together on the same day. So they were priest and priestess in the temple which their own simplicity and tenderness, their frank acceptance of the daily burdens, duties, and opportunities of life, and cultivation of its graces, had made into a shrine. Their cottage had become their temple and then their temple became their home, and it was granted them to "grow aged together" and to die on the same day. So Brooke and Hannah Herford, in their days of poverty and struggle, made their severe surroundings gracious with cheerful hospitality and love, and filled their lives with a spirit that gave it a beauty above that of luxury or art. They made their cottage their temple, and their temple remained their home.

And if the prayer of Baucis and Philemon was not fulfilled to the letter for them, if there was a period of separation, yet it was not long. Happy are they who came so near to the fulfilment of that prayer; and whose names are inevitably and inseparably united as are theirs.

But their true memorial must be built in the lives of men, and most of all in yours. Yours be it to say to them, not with lip, but with life: "We are your epistle, written in our hearts, known and read of all men, manifestly declared to be the Epistle of Christ, ministered by you, written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God, not in tables of stone, but in tables that are hearts of flesh."

Mr. Wicksteed, then repeating the memorial words, "Let us live and work with our faces ever towards the light," unveiled the brass, and the service concluded with the singing of Bishop Mant's hymn:

For all thy saints, O Lord,
Who strove in thee to live,
Who followed thee, obeyed and loved,
Our grateful hymn receive.

* * * *

For this thy name we bless,
And humbly pray that we
May follow them in holiness,
And live and die in Thee.

THE WILL TO BELIEVE AND THE DUTY TO DOUBT.

II.

WE have found a sharp antagonism between two opinions on the subject of our right to believe. On the one hand, there was Clifford's view, which may be summed up as follows:—"Believe nothing and keep your mind in suspense for ever, rather than, by closing it on insufficient evidence, run the awful risk of believing what is not true." This is the expression of an emotional mood, and one which (be it deliberately said) is in the highest degree fantastic and absurd. It is clear that there are whole groups of beliefs which are inevitable beliefs, wanting which we should become dangerous lunatics, and yet these beliefs cannot be proved—if by "proof" we mean what Clifford and the "Rationalists" seem to mean—verification by scientific observation. The other critic, whom we quoted fully, allows that there are legitimate beliefs which cannot be proved, remarking that "Reason cannot communicate validity to all beliefs, for reason itself rests upon certain beliefs." But we need not dwell on this, for we grant that religion is not one of these natural, instinctive, and inevitable beliefs; and it is the bearing of Professor James's view on religious belief that we wish to consider.

We shall find a way to the inner meaning of his contention if we first consider what the work of science really is. Science consists in nothing else than the discovery of what exists in the material world; bare facts, in the sense of actual events in space and time, are the only things she cares about, and she seeks to add fact to fact for ever. And by means of the facts that she discovers she can correct—or, rather, give us the means of correcting—false beliefs. To these two things she is strictly limited so long as she remains science and does not change into something else—first, the infinite ascertainment of fact, and, next, the criticism of error. From the nature of the case she cannot estimate the goodness or badness of any facts which she discovers; all that she requires is that they be shown to be facts. Her findings may indeed be turned to practical purposes, good or bad; she is ready to help all purposes, but knows nothing of their goodness or badness. Her results may be employed equally to save life and to destroy; but scientific observation cannot prove that life is any good, and it cannot prove that life is not any good. Science has discovered evolution and its natural causes; but she cannot show that evolution is any good or the reverse. It is possible that one day science will enable men, if they desire, to live in an earthly paradise from which pain and everything inconvenient is removed; it is also possible that one day science may find out enough about the constitution of matter to enable men, if they desire, to blow the whole universe (including themselves) to atoms, and to disintegrate the very atoms into their component electric forces; but science cannot demonstrate that the one desire would be any worse or better than the other. We have risked labouring this point too much, for it is one of immense importance; in the light of it, numerous pretentious theories, claiming to be "scientific," will collapse like a burst balloon. Such theories assume as scientific facts that, for example, the process of natural evolution is good, or that the stability of society is good, or that the increase of human life is good; or that the happiness of the greatest number is good; but if a man chooses to deny any of these statements there is not a word, from the merely scientific point of view, to be said against him.

These statements may be true, but their truth cannot be established by science alone.

We are therefore driven to the following conclusion:—If you say that scientific evidence is the only evidence, you have, of course, disposed of religion, for religion always looks beyond the visible world; but you have done something more—you have dissolved all morality into chaos.

This contention is a familiar one in modern philosophy, which in part devotes itself to the search for a wider notion of evidence, and tries to set us free from the impasse in which physical science, by itself, leaves us. This kind of inquiry is usually called the "Theory of Knowledge." At this point the originality of Mr. James's position, and also its strength and its weakness, appear. Professedly abandoning the path marked out by the majority of modern philosophers, he strikes out a new path, and maintains that we have a right to believe at our own risk any hypothesis which is beyond the range of science to verify, and at the same time is "live" enough to tempt our will. We are to believe it (of course with the complete belief which includes readiness to act) and take the consequences.

We must fully grant to the author that to wait for scientific evidence is absurd, as we have seen; but, whatever be the kind of evidence to be expected, it is almost equally irrational merely to wait for it. Consider, for instance, the essentials of religious belief, which are, in brief, as follows:—There is an Unseen which is not merely an It, but a Thou, caring for the things that are best, and recognising us in our struggle for those things; and, for this reason, life is worth living. The agnostic rule for truth-seeking, if it means anything, means that we are not to believe until some kind of evidence which will literally compel belief is produced, and for such evidence we are to wait; we are to be passive resisters until the evidence itself takes us. Now, suppose, first, that the religious hypothesis is really true, and, next, that the evidence for it is of such a kind that we cannot even understand it unless we meet it sympathetically, or, as it were, go to meet it halfway. In these circumstances, the "passive resistance" mood would effectually prevent us from ever recognising the truth. "A rule of thinking which would absolutely prevent me from acknowledging certain kinds of truth if those kinds of truth were really there is an irrational rule."

We believe that as we cannot remain mentally stagnant like a pool, our minds must, on the whole, be tending in one of two directions—in the direction of wanting to believe in God or in the direction of wanting to disbelieve in Him. We may try hard to halt between two opinions. We may dismiss the whole subject from our minds (as we think), or we may incline now one way, now another; but there can be no doubt that the general drift will be either towards a mood in which belief seems desirable or towards one in which belief seems undesirable. In the former case we are open to conviction, for we are ready to go to meet the evidence; in the other case there is no evidence which would convince. The "rationalist" insists that the desirability or undesirability of the belief has nothing to do with the question, which is—Is it true? This is what we call the "passive resistance" mood. It resembles a fraudulent commercial company, promising to pay on the strength of mines that do not exist. The passive resister professes to be ready to believe when evidence is produced, although he knows perfectly well that there is no evidence which could ever make him believe.

The first question, then, in discussing what we call "the existence of God" is do you want it to be true? If you do not, then all discussion is useless.

We may also go with the author when he urges that faith, in the case of things dependent on our own personal action, may bring forth its own verification. Thus, by trusting in another person, we may beget trustworthiness in him; by believing in our own moral responsibility, we actually become more conscientious; by believing that we are able to overcome some difficulty, we are actually helped to conquer it. According to an illustration of which Mr. James is rather fond, "suppose that you are climbing a mountain, and have worked yourself into a position from which the only escape is by a terrible leap, have faith that you can successfully make it, and your feet are nerved to its accomplishment; mistrust yourself, and you will hesitate so long that at last, all unstrung and trembling, and launching yourself in a moment of despair, you roll in the abyss." In such cases faith and want of faith verify themselves correspondingly. The principle that faith in an uncertified result can make the result come true is most clearly applicable to the great question of life's worth. "Optimism and Pessimism are definitions of the world. Our own reactions on the world, small as they are in bulk, are integral parts of the whole thing, and necessarily help to determine the definition." "This life is worth living, we can say, since it is what we make it, from the moral point of view; and we are determined to make it from that point of view, so far as we have anything to do with it, a success."

Mr. James further urges that faith in the worth of life cannot long survive if we regard this world with all its riddles as the ultimatum. "Our faith in an invisible order is what inspires those efforts, and that patience which make this visible order good for moral men; our faith in the seen world's goodness (goodness now meaning fitness for successful moral and religious life) has verified itself by leaning on our faith in the unseen world." He then raises the final and supreme question of whether or how our faith in the unseen world verifies itself. It is here, we believe, that his case, as he states it, breaks down. "Faith in a fact helps to create the fact," he tells us. True, we reply, of facts dependent on our own personal action, but not of other things. The qualification is indeed suggested by Mr. James himself. And the whole motive of the belief in an unseen order is that there may be an order—or a world—which is better than ours, and yet is not dependent on our own personal wills. A God created by our faith in Him is nothing but the shadow of ourselves.

It remains to ask whether the author's more general principle—that we have a right to believe at our own risk and take the consequences—is of any avail here.

RELIGIOUS FORCES OF THE METROPOLIS.

III.—"REVIVALISM" AT THE ALBERT HALL.

After watching closely, for some time past, the various newspaper accounts of the Torrey-Alexander mission, some friendly and some the reverse, I have been visiting the "Revival" for myself, so as to be able to speak with more accuracy of its men, methods, temper, and possible results. My standpoint is, of course, that of a Unitarian, but of a Unitarian who welcomes any and every revival of true religious emotion and resolve; grieving most at the langour and indifference which seem to have been lying like a blight upon the churches, and perceiving clearly that mere intellectualism is not of itself sufficient to set the heart of this great city aflame again, or bring healing for its woes.

It is needless for me to cover the ground again which has been covered in your columns by the able contributions of the Revs. E. P. Barrow and G. Critchley. They speak out of a wide experience, and do well to point out the dangers of excessive stimulus, the frequent instability of the emotions of crowds, the historic perils of religious "mafficking," and the folly of theological reaction, masquerading in the garments of "revivalism." I am bound to say that my own observation compels me to attach weight to their warnings. The Torrey-Alexander mission is being "run" by that section of the churches which is nearly always opposed to intellectual, and usually to social and political, progress. Misunderstanding the reference of Jesus to the revelations which come to "babes," these worthy but dangerous folk make a virtue of ignorance, and in the name of "Truth" scout the evidence alike of knowledge and experience. Though there is a better translation of the scriptures, they will by preference use the worse. Though the historicity of the discourses of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel is notoriously doubtful, they will use them habitually without comment, as the proof-texts of their dogmatic assertions. They turn the religion of Jesus into a religion about Jesus, without a word of scruple or explanation. There is no mention (save by way of abuse) of the other great religions of mankind, or of how the best that is in them may be brought into line with the heart of the Christian faith, and thus an approximation to a World-Religion be found. These higher unities of thought and aspiration do not appear to come within the purview of the machine-evangelists. Throughout the whole of their preaching there is a mischievous antinomy between "faith" and reason—the old seedbed, this, of half the irreligion in the world. A discredited doctrine of the Atonement and an effete doctrine of Scriptural infallibility are presented naïvely, as though they were self-evident truths which grew on every tree. Just as the Romanist worships the feminine attributes of God in the Virgin so does the Revivalist in the person of Jesus. The Divine Being Himself recedes in this system to an unreachable distance, being almost lost in the illimitable inane. The only prayer that avails is prayer offered "through" or "in the name of" Jesus. Here we have the old, bad system of salvation by formula — a formula, moreover, which excludes the majority of the human race. For thorough-going infidelity and agnosticism, "Revival" theology would be hard to beat! We Unitarians can serve our time, I think, by witnessing against this obfuscation.

Revival of what? we can ask. Of decaying dogma, or of living religion? Of the authority of the Dead-Hand in ancient systems? or of the authority of the voice of the living God, interpreted by to-day's reason and conscience?

But there is more than this to be said, if we would truthfully represent the emotions of the thousands who daily crowd to these great assemblies from distant corners of the metropolis. Many, doubtless, as of old, come to see what is really a "reed shaken by the wind"—a theology shaken by knowledge, pretending to a vitality which it has not. Others, doubtless, represent the insatiable curiosity and unquenchable thirst for sensationalism, a new thrill, which is a part of the Cockney temperament. They come here just as they would go to the Hippodrome, the Palace, or the Coliseum, to see the latest "stars," whose performances are in every mouth. To them it is simply a new and unfamiliar piece that is being staged, in a gigantic theatre, with practised actors and supers, with the excitement of a music-hall, a public confessional and a police-court rolled into one. But I am convinced that, at bottom, there is a deposit of something nobler and more august than this; a great human need which is, as yet, unsatisfied; a longing for the betterment of Society and Self; a soul-weariness begotten of a too close contact with the world: and an appeal against the tyranny of godless habit to the tribunal of aspiration, hope, and love.

Of the two men who have control of the "Revival" so much has been written that I need not speak of them at length. I am inclined for my own part to agree with a writer in the Christian World, that the singing evangelist "brings to the Torrey-Alexander partnership the larger proportion of working capital." His own voice is clear, strong, and agreeable; and when singing by himself he gives to the words their proper accent of emotion and full religious significance. He is a masterly conductor; and he made the impression on me of a lovable and ingenuous nature. Of Dr. Torrey I regret that I cannot speak in similar terms. His voice is harsh and unmusical, his accent atrocious. He neither reasons nor persuades, but dogmatises with thundering reiteration. Ninety per cent. of the audience, I should say, is composed either of regular church and chapel-goers, or of the merely curious, whose name in London is legion.

The preacher either does not understand, or does not wish his hearers to understand, any other message or point of view, any other way of "getting to heaven," except his own. His prayers jar upon the ear with their crudeness of phrasing and Yankee peculiarity of tone. At the close of his address he calls for "confessions of Christ" in a method for all the world like that of an auctioneer inviting bids for a property he has just been crying up. Force there is, beyond question; but it must be marred, for many, by a certain commonness of manner and matter, a too insistent dogmatism, and the absence of that large catholicity of temper and outlook which disarms criticism and woos assent. Salvation by hustling is a process, assuredly, which does not appeal to all. Yet that there is no "soul of goodness" in this much-trumpeted "Revival" I should be reluctant, indeed, to say. Let me try to disengage, in conclusion, some elements of its usefulness and attraction.

(1) Londoners have become accustomed, in recent years, to Imperial pageantry and display; and that is an appetite that grows with what it feeds upon. Yet religious efforts have been somewhat under a cloud, and their harvesting has been relatively small: I fancy the churches are beginning to be ashamed of their supineness, and are not sorry to have the chance of a grand "march-out" in the heart of the pleasure-loving and indifferent West-end. Many workers will feel heartened at the spectacle of an audience gathered twice daily, far exceeding in numbers that of the greatest theatre or music hall in London, for the purpose of religious exercise. An occasional rally in force gives courage and confidence to the weakening and languid, whatever its effect on "the enemy."

(2) There is abroad a great yearning for a revival of religion, and for the renewal of those pieties and enthusiasms which have been the glory of the churches in the past. Hungry hearts may be forgiven for thinking that almost any revival is better than none at all—better than dwelling in the "centre of indifference"—better than that death in life which consists simply in resting on the achievements of a bygone day, and warming themselves by the dying flames which others kindled.

(3) The gatherings are a revelation of the power of religious song, when carefully managed and adapted to the common need and capacity. One remembers the lasting hold that many of the better Moody and Sankey hymns had, especially upon audiences of simple folk (and after all, is it not safest to aim at the "simple folk" in these matters? It is not easy to sing praises in blank verse). I may have been specially fortunate, but at the services I attended the hymns selected by Mr. Alexander were almost uniformly moving and helpful, bright and joyful in their setting, and with a refrain that easily captured the sympathetic ear and heart. Sung as he had them sung, by that mighty throng, they melted the hearts of the indifferent; speaking through simple figures of the common loss, the common hope, the common yearning for a spirit like that of the Redeemer. Then, with what consummate skill the singer prepared the way for the preacher; the long-sustained notes of the chorus "Thy God reigneth" producing an atmosphere of restful assurance adequate for prayer; the pleading solo "God is now willing, are you?" drawing the hesitating to their feet in an act of confession and resolve! The hymns that "go home" are those written and composed with the one object of "the cure of souls": and by preference, those with a simple refrain that haunts the memory and steals into the heart.

(4) Coming now to Dr. Torrey's preaching, let the injunction be remembered, "if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think of these things." The matter was sometimes more useful than the manner was pleasing. After the too frequent smoothness, obscurity, or irrelevance of much pulpit discourse, the direct personal summons and appeal is sure to take effect. Regular churchgoers may (and do) object to be classed among the sinners—more especially among the "miserable sinners." But here, at the Revival, they come expecting to be told the truth about their condition; and they are not disappointed. Their imprisonment by some darling sin, their slavery to pleasure or money, their fear of man, their towering pride—these things are scourged by the preacher in language the directness and relevance of which leave nothing to be desired. The armour of convention, the frost of custom, and the ice of self-righteousness are broken through by this fierce assault; and the poor soul emerges from its fool's paradise into self-knowledge and consequent humility. Let us not be too apt to play the rôle of "the Superior person," if and when such results are garnered by men and methods other than our own. The main thing is, as Matthew Arnold pointed out, that to "sunk, self-weary man" the message should be delivered: Thou must be born again!

WHEN all men seek for truth by the unfettered exercise of their own faculties, then we may hope to find them gradually approaching to that unity of the spirit for which devout souls have always watched and prayed.—Frank Walters.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

SIR,—In their interesting letters on the above subject, your correspondents deal, among other things, with the statement that without a margin of unemployment our present industrial system would not work, owing to the fact that without such a margin wages could not be kept down to a point at which profits could be made.

Mr. Millin's view is that "the whole system of capitalist commercialism, if not actually based on this margin of unemployed, is clearly dependent on it for prosperity and success." And he goes on to say, "Just devise any scheme that would absorb every unemployed labourer for the benefit of the actual workers" (I am not quite clear as to the exact meaning of this phrase), "and see whether the capitalist employers would not soon be crying out that you were bringing up wages and bringing down profits, and crippling the commercial enterprise of the country."

With Mr. Simon, I believe the contrary would be the case. The success of our present industrial system, or, if the expression is preferred, of "commercial capitalism," depends not on the lowness of wages, but on freedom of exchange, on the efficiency of labour and administration, and on a steady demand for the things produced. Our periods of greatest commercial prosperity are also the periods when wages are highest and unemployment lowest. If every worker now unemployed, or partially employed, had full and remunerative employment, whether wholly as wage-earners or as profit-sharers as co-operative producers, or as owners of a small holding, we should have a condition of general prosperity that would doubtless raise wages, but which would stimulate production by a greatly increased demand. The workers are also our largest consumers. Commerce cannot gain by the poverty of consumers, nor capital by the idleness of the producers of wealth. Whatever else might be its effect, therefore, there can, it appears to me, be no doubt that commerce and capital, as well as industry, would benefit by the total absorption of the unemployed in the ranks of the employed. But surely the existence of such a state of things demands the permanent equilibrium between supply and demand, and I fail to see how a change from private to collective ownership of capital would secure this.

Mr. Millin uses the phrase "commercial capitalism" as if it were some injurious combination, but commerce, the distribution and exchange of the results of national industry, is a necessity, and it is impossible without the employment of capital. The ownership of that capital affects commerce mainly so far as it affects the skill and suitability of the methods of distribution. The present competitive system has produced a marvellous flexibility and adaptation of means to end. Given complete freedom of exchange and the process of distribution would so far appear to be nearly perfect. Whether under the operation of State-owned capital results would be obtained equally advantageous in these respects to the community at large is doubtful.

If hitherto the results of our industrial, as distinguished from our commercial, system are in many respects so little satisfactory, we have to consider that it is still contending against the operation of evils which it has not created and which affect it to an extent impossible to calculate. It has to contend against a land system that cruelly cripples the national development and our greatest industry, agriculture; against barbarous conceptions of trade that result in hostile tariffs; against the incalculable waste of realised wealth and of productive energy caused by war and militarism, due to conditions and to passions which in varying forms have never been absent from human society, but which have never been so disastrous in their effects as now; against intemperance, ignorance and vice. In these matters, as in all else where the human will in concerned, the moral factor plays a determining part. Are we to lay to the charge of our still developing industrial system the untold evils which such things must produce, and of which the endless ramifications can never be fully traced or understood? Assuredly, as Mr. Millin contends, the cry of "Back to the land" is no vain or passing one, but the embodiment of a need rooted in our nature, which no State can fail in some way to satisfy, and yet be economically, morally, and physically sound.

RUSSELL SCOTT.

SIR,—The letters in last Saturday's INQUIRER seem rather to raise fresh issues than to dispose of my arguments; but Mr. Robinson re-asserts that a reserve of unemployed labour is necessary to "Modern Industrialism," and goes back 550 years for a case in proof. I can find him more recent instances, to the contrary, within my own experience:—In 1873 and again in 1900, employers had the utmost difficulty in obtaining labour, nevertheless these were profitable years, and general wages increased only moderately and soon fell again. Besides the competition of labourers among themselves, the value of the result of labour is a factor in limiting wages. It is quite true that Mr. Robinson did not charge employers with producing trade fluctuations, nor did I say that he did. I pointed out that, if such fluctuations were necessary to "Modern Industrialism," employers would have discovered it, and would have acted accordingly; for they are not so stupid as to be unable to perceive what is plain to Mr. Robinson or Mr. Booth.

This "margin of unemployed" fallacy dates back to Mr. Denison, the founder of Charity Organisation, fifty years ago, who invented it to explain the number of casual labourers about the London Docks. Mr. Robinson also suggests a more equal division of profits (which might, or, also might not lessen poverty), but he overlooks the fact that often among the working classes, several members of a family are wage-earners, so that the aggregate earnings of a household are generally more than at first sight seems to be the case. There are also other causes of poverty besides low wages, such as, for instance, improvidently early marriages. Mr. Rowntree, I think, shows that only ten per cent. of labourers earning over £1 a week, marry under 21 years of age, while 20 per cent. of those earning less than £1, do so.

On the other hand, the "reward of capital" is not so large as may appear at first sight. Thus, there are new mills building in Lancashire at the present time, calculated to employ 7,000 persons. The capital invested is £3,000,000, or nearly £430 for each employee.

As capital invested in buildings and machinery is perishable, and the profits in the cotton trade notoriously small, it would appear that the share of capital may, after all, not be so disproportionate. Again, a very large amount of capital is invested in railways, which yield but a very moderate dividend, although 55 per cent. of the gross income is devoted to dividend, and the wages of railway servants are not always high.

It is thus evident that the apparently large share taken by capital is rather the consequence of the very large amount invested (largely by the working classes themselves and those lower middle classes which have sprung from them), than to its receiving an undue share.

It is easier, I know, to criticise than to construct; but, as diagnosis must precede treatment, so is it necessary, before suggesting remedies, to realise that in social matters, as in Nature, the struggle for existence and the survival of the fittest is the divinely ordained order, whether the Divinity be that of the Idealist or of J. S. Mill. Even then I would hesitate to prescribe. While letting Humanity build hospitals for those who have fallen by the wayside and Charity give relief, the only safe way would seem to be to aim at freedom of development in Social economics, as much as we do in thought, politics, or trade; and to seek to remove still remaining obstructions, such as, for instance, hinder the dispersal of land, but not on any account to create new ones, by so-called constructive legislation, or by establishing bodies of officials whose existence depends on their making and executing regulations at the expense of the public.

RICHARD SIMON.

THE Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, of Saffron Walden, was entertained at a luncheon at the Holborn Restaurant, on Wednesday, February 15, by his fellow trustees of Joseph Davis's Charity (a Baptist Trust), when an illuminated address was presented to him, acknowledging the services he had rendered during the past nine years as honorary clerk and receiver. The chairman (Mr. J. Wallis Champion) and Dr. John Clifford, who made the presentation, spoke very warmly, as did the address itself, of the capable and devoted services Mr. Brinkworth had rendered in the administration of the Trust.

FAR as you can, enter into the soul of him who speaks.—M. Aurelius.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Blackfriars Mission.—The Rev. W. L. Tucker and Mr. Charles Bone, the Librarian, appeal for a supply of new books suitable for scholars from ten to sixteen years of age, for the Sunday-school library, which sadly needs replenishing.

Billingshurst.—On Wednesday, Feb. 15, the Rev. H. S. Perris gave an able and interesting lecture, illustrated by lantern views, on "Lights and Shadows of London Life." The occasion was rendered specially interesting by the facts that the Working Men's Club lent their hall for the the meeting, and that the vicar of Billingshurst, the Rev. John Stanley, took the chair, and moved a vote of thanks to the lecturer. In proposing a similar vote to the chairman, the Rev. George Lansdown spoke with appreciation of the friendly spirit thus evinced not only by the vicar himself, but also by members of various denominations who were present and assisted in the proceedings. The newly appointed Congregational minister materially helped by his cordial announcement of the lecture.

Bolton: Unity Church.—A course of four Monday night lectures has just been completed by the Rev. Herbert V. Mills, of Kendal. On the opening night a violent gale and snowstorm was raging, so that the electric cars were stopped, but an audience of 160 persons assembled to hear the lecture on "The Autobiography of the Earth." The chair was taken by Mr. W. W. Midgley, F.R.M.S., the Curator of the Chadwick Museum. At subsequent lectures the attendance increased to 320. A large proportion of the audience were strangers who had not previously entered the church building.

Bristol: Lewins Mead.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on the 17th inst., when Mr. Francis E. Gillard resigned the honorary treasurership, which he has held for the past ten years. A presentation of a silver tea and coffee service and a writing table was made to him by Mr. J. Kenrick Champion on behalf of Rev. A. N. Blatchford and the congregation, who asked him to accept these tokens of their warm personal esteem and high appreciation of his faithful and excellent work. Mr. Gillard, in acknowledging the gift, thanked the members for their support, and asked for the same consideration to be extended to his successor, Mr. Arthur Pope.

Hindley.—Four Tuesday evening lectures have just been delivered in the large Co-operative Hall by the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal, on "Evolution." They attracted an average audience of over 300 persons.

London: Highgate (Welcome Meeting).—On Saturday evening, February 18, a meeting was held in the Unitarian Christian Church, to welcome the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth as minister. Tea and coffee were served in the schoolroom at 6 o'clock, and there was a large and very pleasant gathering of friends and members of the congregation. At 7 o'clock the meeting was held in the church. The chair was taken by Mr. F. Withall, and the meeting opened with hymn and prayer by the Rev. H. W. Perris. Mr. J. H. S. Cooper, hon. sec., announced apologies for absence from several London ministers, and local ministers of other denominations. The Rev. D. Macfadyen, of the Congregational Church, sent cordial good wishes, and the Rev. A. Ramsey, Presbyterian, hoped to make Mr. Charlesworth's personal acquaintance, and to work with him in social and moral efforts. The Rev. F. K. Freeston recalled his first meeting with Mr. Charlesworth twenty-one years ago, when he first joined the Unitarian ministry, and was at Godalming. The chairman having expressed gratitude to the friends who had come to join them in that welcome meeting, said that for fourteen years the congregation had been under the grand guidance of their founder and first pastor, the Rev. Robert Spears. Then for a time they had to rely partly on their own efforts, and lastly came three full and earnest years under the leadership of the Rev. R. H. Greaves. Through all that time he believed they had never lost the deep, earnest faith and catholic sympathies which characterised their founder; and because they believed that Mr. Charlesworth would carry on the work in the same spirit they had asked him to be their minister. They did not expect him to do all the work, but to be a leader and a comrade working with them, and showing them the true spirit which must prevail in all their efforts. They had always endeavoured to carry on that church on broad, helpful, democratic lines, and they warmly invited others to come in and help. They looked forward with great hope to the future. The Rev. L. P. Jacks, of Manchester College, Oxford, as a friend and formerly a fellow-worker with Mr. Charlesworth in Birmingham, moved a resolution of cordial welcome, expressing the hope that his ministry, under the Divine guidance, might prove a source of much spiritual blessing alike to his congregation and to himself. Mr. Jacks spoke of the high esteem in which he held Mr. Charlesworth, of his courage, ability, and devoted earnestness, and expressed the belief that he would find there exactly the kind of work for which his character and mind alike were best fitted. Turning to speak of the religious outlook, Mr. Jacks said he had been deeply impressed by the widespread, eager interest in religion at the present time. Men of letters and of science were manifesting a like profound interest in central religious questions, and they represented tens of thousands of people whose names were never heard. Then how is it, he asked, that our own Church does not progress more rapidly? One difficulty was that they were suffering, like all other Christian Churches, from a dearth of good ministers. The old Nonconformist families were not supplying the men to fill the vacancies in their ministry. Those who came were not of the same status or ability as of old. Why did the young men of to-day not show the same disposition to go into the ministry? He did not believe it was because the worldly attractions of the ministry were insufficient. Such a reason never stood in the way when there was a clear call of duty. One reason, perhaps, was that now there were so many more careers open to men of ability and courage than there were a hundred years ago; but a third and deeper reason was that young men were deterred by doubts and perplexities concerning the great ultimate truths of religion. That reluctance they must honour and respect. Yet those doubts and uncertainties he believed were much exaggerated. If they were fairly looked in the face they would be seen to be due to underlying faith, an acknowledgment by the inmost soul of truths in their awful transcendent reality. When that was understood they were brought to a different attitude towards the ministry. Their churches, he thought, suffered from insufficient emphasis on the need for public worship. There was in the soul a deep and permanent need of worship, and any church which truly answered to that need would not be long in finding a wide-spread response. They might get on without sermons, but not without the word of aspiration and gratitude. The man who went to church to confess his sins to Almighty God, to purify his conceptions of duty and cleanse his life from debasing passions, to commune with the highest truth in spirit, that man was a tower of strength to the church where he so worshipped. And any minister who laid himself out to meet the needs of that man, was dealing with the central need of the present time. A minister, whom he had known and loved, once told him how when people came asking what Unitarians stand for, he always replied; "If you cannot find out what I believe from my prayers, it is not worth your while to try and find out in any other way." He was confident that Mr. Charlesworth would never subordinate religion to anything less than itself. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, who seconded the resolution, spoke of the eagerness with which they should seek to spread the knowledge of the truth they held, and said that the secret of success in the Methodist Church and the Salvation Army was that when they got hold of men they made demands on them and did not make their religion too cheap. The Rev. Henry Gow joined cordially in the welcome, and spoke of Hampstead and Highgate as real friends. The best view of each was to be had from the other, just as among friends each is best seen through his friends' mind. He was glad to think that their congregations had a strong tradition of worship and real spiritual helpfulness, for which people came to them. The Rev. Edgar Daplyn also spoke, and a letter was read from the Right Hon. William Kenrick, President of the B. & F. U. A., saying how gladly he would have joined in the welcome, and speaking warmly of the universal esteem which Mr. Charlesworth had won in Birmingham. Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, President of the London District Unitarian Society, and Mr. W. W. Bruce, President of the Provincial Assembly, added their hearty good wishes, and, the resolution having been unanimously passed, Mr. Charlesworth replied. He said that he felt very deeply the spirit underlying the welcome accorded to him. He believed there was a great work to be done there, and it was a signal honour to be asked to come. He was grateful for the generous and hopeful words that had been spoken. It was primarily a religious work they had to do, to realise the true spirit of worship, to consecrate themselves to the service of that God who meant so much to them; and whatever work came to them through His will, minister and people together must throw themselves into it, not unworthy of the vocation with which they were called, not unfaithful to the great privilege of service laid upon them. A vote of thanks to Mr. Jacks and the other speakers, moved by Mr. F. Tremayne and seconded by Mr. C. A. Ginever, and a further vote of thanks to the chairman and secretary, brought the speaking to a close. A hymn was then sung, and the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth pronounced the benediction.

London: Wandsworth.—In consequence of the lamented death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong a great number of friends were disappointed of hearing his course of lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism." An attempt is being made by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant to meet, in some degree, the desires of those who had so eagerly anticipated an exposition of this subject. On February 12 the first of six Sunday evening lectures was given by him to a very large congregation, and at the second, given last Sunday, the church was crowded. Mr. Tarrant's course substantially follows the syllabus prepared by Mr. Armstrong, and efforts are made to supply literature appropriate to the different points raised. This literature is taken eagerly, and the interest manifested is very keen.

Mossley (Appointment).—The Rev. James E. Stead, of Park-lane has received and accepted a cordial invitation to the ministry of the Christian Church in succession to the late Rev. T. R. Elliott. The church has just lost one of its stalwarts in the death of Mr. William Lawton, which took place on Friday, Feb. 10. Mr. Lawton worked in the mill from a very early age, and, as a consequence picked up what education he could after the day's work in the mill was done. When a young man he went out to America, returning to this country in 1861. Whilst in the States he gained considerable experience, and when the Civil War broke out he very warmly espoused the cause of the North. On returning to this country, he obtained employment at a woollen mill as clerk, rising in course of time to cashier, which position he held up to his death, having served the same firm for 44 years. He was secretary to Mossley Church for 30 years, and worked assiduously for its welfare. He will be most missed in the school, where he was one of the superintendents, taking alternate Sundays, and on the other Sunday teaching the young women's class. The funeral service was conducted last Sunday by the Rev. H. B. Smith, who preached a memorial service from the words "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Mottram.—On Sunday, Feb. 19, Mr. Fred Duxbury was the preacher morning and evening, and in the afternoon gave an hour's recital of Tennyson's "Enoch Arden." His sermons were of an inspiring character, and his recital touched and delighted all who heard him.

Nottingham: High Pavement.—At a meeting of the High Pavement Historical Society, held at the schools on Wednesday evening, February 22, a very interesting paper was read by the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans, of Chesterfield, on the "Story of the Life of Milton." The president (Mr. J. C. Warren) was in the chair, and there was a good attendance of members. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Evans, on the motion of the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, seconded by Mr. A. Nicholson.

Padiham.—Four Wedesday evening lectures on "Evolution and Religion" have just been completed in the Unitarian School, by Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal. The attendances were the best which have assembled for lectures for many years in Padiham, and several prominent townsmen and members of evangelical congregations in the town were attracted, and continued to attend the whole course.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Monday evening, Mr. A. J. Hobson in the chair. The report and accounts were adopted, and new members of committee appointed. A cordial vote of thanks was passed to the Rev. C. J. Street for his services during the year, and to this he responded, expressing satisfaction with the progress made and happiness in his new settlement. The question of the Liturgy was discussed, and it was decided to continue for the present the use of the "Seven Services," and appoint a committee to make further inquiries as to any other suitable book. On the recommendation of the trustees and committee, a building scheme for erecting a school-chapel at Attercliffe was cordially approved. This means an outlay of at least £1,000, not reckoning the cost of the land, which may possibly be secured for the present at a ground rent. Mr. Street announced that £500 had already been promised, conditionally on the general support of the congregation, which was now pledged. Arrangements are being made for a sale of work in aid of the building fund, to be held next October.

Stockton (Resignation).—The Rev. Henry Cross has resigned his charge here, which he has held for the past three years, having been appointed minister at Dewsbury, under the Yorkshire Unitarian Union.

Todmorden.—On the 11th and 14th inst. a Japanese Fête was held in the schoolroom, opened on the first day by Councillor Wm. Healey, J.P., of Heywood, who gave a splendid address. Mr. C. H. Parsons presided. On the second day two of the younger scholars performed the opening ceremonies. As a result of the two days efforts about £42 will remain for the Sunday-school treasurer, an amount which exceeded all expectations. On Tuesday, the 14th, Dr. Bellingham, of Blackburn, lectured to a large audience on "With Caravan and Camera through the Land of the Lancashire Witches." The lecture was very much appreciated.

Walthamstow.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Feb. 16, the Rev. W. H. Rose presiding, and encouraging reports were presented. Miss Emily Sharpe and Mr. C. A. Ginever were among the speakers, and Mr. Noel told of the services to be held in the Stratford Town Hall in April.

Of all acts, is not for man Repentance the most divine?—Carlyle.

THE faith which teaches that God is good, not in name only but in deed: good as our inmost hearts yet scarcely dare to dream of goodness; good in the sense of a love which knows no bound or measure, which is absolute, changeless, supreme, that faith alone is qualified to teach us also what sin is, how base, how hateful, how full of blackest ingratitude.—Frances Power Cobbe.

ADVERTISEMENTS 147

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE celebration of the Martineau Centenary at Norwich, on Good Friday and Easter Sunday, of which we have written in a leading article this week, may suggest to many of our readers the arrangement of a few days' Easter holiday in that neighbourhood, including the days of the commemoration at Norwich. Those who have been hitherto strangers to East Anglia need not fear for what they will find in that country, whether inland or by the sea, and Norwich itself is one of the most interesting cities in the country. The noble Cathedral, the old Norman Castle, with its museum, and other ancient buildings, besides the Octagon, and all the special personal associations, offer abundant occupation for several days. We commend to inquirers Mr. W. A. Dutt's book on "Norfolk," in Dent's Series of County Guides.

DR. TORREY'S references to Unitarians and the Bible have suggested to the Rev. J. Page Hopps a series of Sunday evening lectures, which he will give in Little Portland-street Chapel on "The Plain Truth about the Bible." The first lecture will be given to-morrow (Sunday) evening, the service beginning at 7 o'clock.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE is to begin his second course of five Shakespeare lectures for the present session at University College, on Thursday evening, March 16. Much Ado about Nothing is the play for that evening, to be followed by King John, All's Well that End Well, and Hamlet. Tickets for the course cost 7s., or 5s. to teachers. Application for tickets is to be made to the hon. secretary, Stopford Brooke Lectures, University College, W.C.

THE full text of the Report of the North Sea Commission, which was published in Monday's papers, has been received with the utmost satisfaction in this country, both for its own sake as thoroughly vindicating the British view of the case (though with a curious addendum on the courage and humanity of the Russian Admiral and commanders) and as a signal triumph for the principle of arbitration.

ON Dr. Torrey's enlightened remarks on the subject of Unitarians and Higher Critics we made a note last week. The Daily News of Friday, Feb. 24, published the following letter from the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association :—

Sir,—Many readers of the Daily News will share the regret, expressed by the writer of the article describing Dr. Torrey's visit to the City on Tuesday, that no attempt was made by the revivalist to set before business men some high ideals of religious life and duty. Instead of this, we are informed that Unitarians, Higher Critics, and certain eminent persons long since dead were referred to in "scathing sentences." The Daily News had some experience of Unitarians in the days when Sir John Robinson, Mr. Frank Hill, Mr. P. W. Clayden, and others helped to make it a power in the land for freedom, truth, and righteousness; and perhaps I may be allowed space in which to make my protest as a Unitarian against Dr. Torrey's travesty of the religious opinions held by not a few of your readers.

The epithets "impostor," "lunatic," and the like, so freely used by Dr. Torrey in reference to opinions held by Unitarians respecting the Founder of Christianity are not only offensive, they are untrue; they show that the speaker is ignorant of the religious principles held by the people whom he so glibly condemns.

Further, unless your report does Dr. Torrey grave injustice, his address on "Why I believe the Bible to be the Word of God" betrays a woeful lack of knowledge of the most elementary facts of modern Biblical criticism. It is an ancient and familiar device in theological controversy to charge those who differ from you in opinion with possessing a canker of wickedness in their hearts; but the use of such discredited weapons had surely better be discarded by a man whose avowed mission, we are told, is to convert London from falsehood to truth, from sin to righteousness.—Yours, &c., W. COPELAND BOWIE.

Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.
February 22.

FURTHER correspondence, in the Daily News of February 28, produced some weighty authorities for what in the light of reasonable Biblical criticism we can only call the stupid argument that Jesus must either have been God or an imposter, and also some curious instances of Coleridge's spleen against Unitarians. That kind of thing is calculated, we should think, to make judicious Trinitarians grieve.

ON Thursday the Daily News published the actual words used by Dr. Torrey, in which we fail to find anything very "scathing" :—

Dr. Torrey said: "Jesus of Nazareth was that which He claimed to be, a Divine person in an altogether unique sense, or else He was one of the most daring impostors that ever walked the face of the earth, or else one of the most hopeless lunatics. The modern Unitarian position that Jesus of Nazareth was not Divine, but a good man, is the acme of irrationality. If he was a mere man He was not good; if He was not more than man He was an impostor or lunatic. Now, let me ask you a question—Was the influence of Jesus of Nazareth upon subsequent history the influence of a lunatic? Nobody but a lunatic would say so. Was the influence of Jesus of Nazareth upon subsequent history the influence of an impostor? Only a man whose own heart is cankered and deceitful would say so. If He were not a lunatic or an impostor, then beyond peradventure He was the Son of God, and we are bound to accept Him as such."

Certainly Jesus was the Son of God, and in a very profound sense divine; but to say this may be something very different from saying that Jesus was God the Son, in the orthodox Trinitarian sense. But that, of course, Dr. Torrey will not see.

A NEW Life of John Wesley is appearing in weekly sections in a contemporary. To judge from the opening chapters there will be no lack of vigour in the narrative. Yet is the effect somewhat marred by the form in which it appears, and yet more by the loud drum and trumpet advertisement which heralds the newly-told story into this world. For the life of John Wesley is like the life of St. Paul. Whoso deals with it deals with a vehicle of Divine revelation. And a man who should write a life of St. Paul, especially if he had got hold of some distressful stories of the Apostle's sister, and some anger-kindling anecdotes of the harshness, and arrogance, and incapacity of forgiveness of the Apostle's father—and things akin to these may have existed, but Heaven has kindly hidden them—would surely tell them as in a class meeting, in which chastened souls listen and are admonished; and not as in a fair where the loudest organ and the boldest boaster, and not the most conscientious speaker, gains attention. "But if class meetings are going out, and business methods are coming in?" Why then, there will be stories to tell by and by when class meetings come up again, and the early years of the twentieth century are not much admired.

The Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavour have felt the prevalent influence of big names, as is shown by their Great Simultaneous Forward Movement. The Movement, like the idea of the Societies, comes from America, but has spread into many lands. We learn from some interesting figures in the Examiner that the single society with a membership of fifty-eight in 1881 has grown to 70,000 societies with 4,000,000 members. It is not even confined to English speaking countries, for branches are found in France, Germany, and Switzerland. We are interested in the extension of these unions of young people because of its bearing on the spread of inter-denominationalism. The Y.P.S.C.E., as it is familiarly known, is of no one church policy, nor is it confined to one form of dogma, at least not to that of any of the historical sects. Probably dogma is too rigid a word for the faith and thought here propagated. These societies are rather emotional, practical, experiential in their method and aim. Above all they are Evangelical. The members of the Endeavour Societies become in large numbers members of particular churches; but they retain the memory and influence of their youth, and in this memory must lie a force which will prove a solvent to the doctrines which serve to separate the Evangelical Churches. There are many signs of a drawing together of the orthodox Nonconformists as against Catholicism and Episcopalianism on the one hand; and against a more liberal Christianity on the other. And this goes on side by side with an ever-increasing tendency to engraft much of the newer thought on the old stem. Thus currents and cross currents are at work in these young people's unions, and serve to intensify the unrest in the churches to which they belong.

In the March number of The Message Dr. John Hunter has an article on "Religious Revivals." He speaks sympathetically of the Welsh revival, which seems to him "simple and real enough, and likely to continue so if only the newspapers and preachers would cease to advertise it, and religious busybodies would not try to drag its leaders on to platforms in London and Glasgow, and elsewhere, but leave them to live and work in their own natural fashion among their own hills and valleys." But in other so-called revivals of religion he has not by any means the same confidence.

There is often much that is painful to think about in what is popularly known as revivals of religion. They are often the revival of quite unworthy ideas and feelings about God, and life, and the hereafter, and they are often not naturally and simply, but artificially induced, dependent on the presence of men who have the gift of awakening a certain kind of religious interest, and upon agencies and accessories some of which reveal a deep distrust in the simple power of truth and in the power of men to respond to truth. Everything must be made big and loud and striking in order to attract. Many of these revivalistic methods are just forms of bribery and corruption—attempts to win the mind and heart with that which is less than truth and less than God.

He cannot understand the action of religious teachers, who in their hearts distrust artificial and elaborate attempts at "revival," and yet for the sake of peace, or for some ecclesiastical or sectarian reason, make no protest.

We had better all die faithful at our posts than go over to the noisy adherents of popular error and superstition, drawn by their success into using what are to us questionable or forbidden means to produce good ends. Religious movements have no claim upon us merely because they are successful. For it must be plain to every intelligent man that the most defective and corrupt forms of the Christian religion have not only been more popular, but in a sense more effective and successful, than those forms of it which approach nearest the simplicity that is towards Christ. We must have reality in our religion, and in all the religious methods we employ. And yet the most unreal thing about men is often just their religion.

This same number of The Message prints some interesting opinions on a very different subject, "The recent recrudescence of popular unbelief." The Rev. R. J. Campbell does not believe it exists, but the Rev. H. Arnold Thomas, of Bristol, writes:—

I should think it likely that in so far as Unbelief has become more pronounced and aggressive of recent years, the explanation is to be looked for in the popularisation in this country of the writings of Prof. Haeckel. In him the cause has found a champion, incisive and uncompromising, who speaks with the accent of authority, and the omniscient air that count for so much with the multitude. I believe that he has a great following.

The opinion of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter is as follows:—

The thing (viz., aggressive unbelief) is always there, but it needs a personality to become articulate. A generation ago it was Bradlaugh, now it is Blatchford, whose 'unbelief,' however, is of very different quality. The Rationalist Press people have organised, like the rest of us; they have got a learned man in Robertson, though he uses his learning badly; they are parading Haeckel—but he does not belong to this generation.

Canon Hensley Henson holds that we are living in a period of transition, such as that out of which the Reformation came, and he adds:—

We shall work out in due course to an equilibrium once more, but not, I apprehend, without a heavy price to pay for our own folly and obstinate refusal to learn wisdom from experience. The Christianity of the future will be a new thing, wider and stronger than anything we have yet known. It is a pity the Churches are not more teachable.

There are replies to the editors' question from Baptists and Methodists, and this from another Unitarian, the Rev. L. P. Jacks:—

Unbelief seems to be a constant factor in the history of the human mind. I question whether its amount or its aggressiveness varies much from age to age. Its causes and its forms certainly vary, just as the forms and causes of religion do. The chief rock of offence in current Christianity seems to be the contradiction between its ethical ideals and the actual practice of the communities which profess it.

The February number of the Pacific Unitarian, the monthly organ of our brethren in the Far West, published at San Francisco, has on its cover the passage from Richard Acland Armstrong, beginning "God is Love. For me that is enough. . . . It is to my whole manhood, and to every part thereof, joy, and confidence, and strength." And among the Editorial Notes, a warm tribute, which concludes as follows:—

His most lasting influence, however, will doubtless be through his writings. He has been to Martineau, his old teacher, very much what John Fiske was to Herbert Spencer—an interpreter and simplifier of his master's works. It is well known that Martineau's great work, the "Study of Religion," is difficult reading, calculated to repel those not trained in philosophy. But Armstrong, in his two little books, "Man's Knowledge of God," and "God and the Soul," has given us the main lines of Martineau's argument in a form so clear and readable that an average high-school student can follow it with ease, and so delightful that to read it is sure to be a rare pleasure to anyone interested in religious subjects. If any of our readers are befogged as to fundamental religious beliefs, and wish to come to clear and satisfactory conclusions under the guidance of a wise master, we can wish them no better fortune than to get and read these two little books. The present writer owes more to them than to almost any others he has ever read.

On the day following the death of the Maharshi Devendra Nath Tagore, to whose memory we have devoted a leading article this week, the Statesman wrote as follows:—

"His death removes the last representative of the great age of social and religious reform in Bengal, as well as the one man in modern India who, while departing widely from the faith and practice of orthodox Hinduism, has been recognised and acclaimed as both saint and sage by all sections of the community. The purity and dignity of his character is a common spiritual possession for his race. For many years pilgrimage was made to him, and he was accessible to all. He came, and rightly, to be reverenced as the noblest living representative of a people which has been remarkable during the last hundred years for its power of producing great personalities. Wisdom and high character make a universal appeal. Saintliness is more powerful than prejudice or tradition. Hence it came about that divergence of belief and custom faded away in the presence of this noble old man, who compelled admiration by his intellectual greatness and conquered the reverence of all by the purity and reality of his religious faith. Now that he has gone to his rest the people of India do well to honour him, not only as a great member of a family rich in scholarship, genius, and public spirit, but as a leader of thought and a shining example of virtue."

Religion and virtue, wherever they exist, are the mind itself, and nothing else. —Channing.

The solemn joy that soul-communion feels,

And human love, its prophecy and sign,
Interprets love divine.

J. G. Whittier.

THE CHRIST OF PAUL.

V.

The Person of Jesus.

Christ, then, corresponded in a certain sense to what we might call the ideal man.

(a) This ideal, however, had its own independent being. As soon as God set it over against Himself in thought, He gave it substance and some sort of form. The solemn title of Messiah, "Son of God," now won a deeper meaning. If it was said of the first man, who was of the earth, earthy, that he was made in the image of God, still more emphatically could this be asserted of the second. The Jewish theologians had, indeed, some difficulty in determining the precise scope of the expression. Sometimes it was supposed to lie in the gift of rule or dominion over other beings. Others connected it with an immortality which man was designed to possess, but lost by sin. To Paul, the term is charged with a wealth of contents difficult to define. On the one hand, it seems to glance at likeness of nature, conceived as spirit; on the other, it implies likeness of character in holiness and love. So it is said of Jesus Christ considered as son of God, that while he "was born of the seed of David according to the flesh," he "was designated son of God with power, according to (the) spirit of holiness, by the resurrection of the dead" (Rom. i. 4). The holiness here named as his determining quality (the English idiom would almost be better served by inverting the Greek, "holiness of spirit," cp. 2 Cor. vii. 1, 1 Thess. iii. 13), was no doubt displayed during his life as son of David. But it belonged to him in virtue of his heavenly rather than his earthly being. How it manifested itself from the realm of spirit, the Apostle knew from its effects on his own soul. How it had been displayed in Israel, the cross, in which the Messiah's life on earth found its great (if bewildering) consummation, triumphantly made clear. Was there no other indication of it? As son of God, as first-born in the order of spirit, his true nature might be first disclosed by the resurrection. But he did not acquire this high status through that event. It belonged to him originally in the upper world. Into that earlier time the Apostle does not attempt to follow him, in the letters now under consideration. The speculations which surrounded the throne of God with mysterious types, ranged through nameless ages before the creation. But of the hour of generation of the son of God Paul says no word. With that elastic indefiniteness which almost inevitably marks such modes of thought, the half-personalised attributes of Deity can be concentrated in him, and Christ is both the Wisdom and the Power of God (1 Cor. i. 24). Nor is he pictured in relation either to the physical creation,* or to the humanity of the flesh. Did Paul suppose that all men pre-existed in some higher world? The author of the Wisdom of Solomon, and the Jewish philosopher Philo, seem to have thought so, following at greater or lesser distance the indications of Plato. So did the author of the Book of the Secrets of Enoch, who asserts (xxiii. 5) that "every soul was created eternally before the foundation of the world." In the Assumption of Moses, the prophet is said to have been "prepared before the foundation of the world" to be the mediator of God's covenant with Israel (i. 14). Paul's mind apparently does not touch the question. But the man "from heaven" seems certainly to have lived ere he appeared in Palestine. He had already interested himself in Israel, and supplied their needs upon the desert march.* The resurrection which demonstrated his true nature as spirit threw a flood of light on his prior condition. He had but resumed a being he had once possessed; he had returned to the life and love and brightness which he had laid aside that he might redeem the men "of earth."

(b) The greatness of this sacrifice made the deepest impression on the Apostle. It had a twofold aspect, according as attention was concentrated on God or Christ. On the one hand, it depended on the purpose of God, and supplied the crowning proof of his love. The conception is briefly stated in Gal. iv. 4—6:—

> When the fulness of time came, God sent forth his son, born of a woman, born under the law, that he might redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God sent forth the spirit of his son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father.

The process here so shortly described is expounded more fully in Rom. viii., where the marvellous condescension of God awakes the Apostle's triumphant outburst of trust:—

> For what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, God, sending his own son† in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh. . . .
> What then shall we say to these things? If God is for us, who is against us? He that spared not his own son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not also with him freely give us all things? . . .
> For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor things present, nor things to come, nor powers, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

On the other hand, if the initiative lay with God who sent the son, the voluntary acceptance of the mission on his part supplied a similar example of self-sacrifice (2 Cor. viii. 9):—

> For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might become rich.

This entry on the lonely state of life in the flesh, amid the sinful, lies, perhaps, behind the saying "for even Christ pleased not himself" (Rom. xv. 3); and certainly prompts the fuller contrast between the Messiah's antecedent glory and the humiliation of a manhood that could die upon the cross (Phil. ii. 5-8):—

> Have this mind in you, which was also in Christ Jesus: who, being in the form of God, counted it not a thing to be grasped to be on an equality with God; but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant, being made in the likeness of men; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient unto death, yea, the death of the cross.

The passage is not easy to expound in a few words, and the great variety of interpretations shows that none can claim to be so obvious as to win general assent. The main idea is expressed in a series of antitheses, couched in peculiar language which is found nowhere else. All readers will probably agree that the Apostle describes an act of personal self-surrender; but it may be doubted how far its precise character and conditions can be determined. Two states are certainly contrasted, "the form of God," and "the form of a slave." Christ divests himself of the one, he assumes the other. But by what process? What is meant by being in the form of God? And at what stage of his existence was he in that condition? It has been suggested that the Apostle here employs a term derived from Greek philosophy, meaning "having God's idea in him," possessing that by which God constituted humanity, that notion, as we say, which God had in making man. This exposition does not, however, fit the second clause, which describes Jesus as taking the form of a slave. The expression is of course figurative, because Jesus was not a bondman to anybody; but it implies that he was in some way regarded as passing into a dependent and subject condition. The bondage may have been servitude to the law, involved in his earthly life as a Jew; cp. Gal. iv. 1—4. Does the Old Testament give us any help? In Num. xii. 8 it is said that Moses should behold the "form" of God, and this expression is rendered by the Greek translators the "glory" of God. Can we find a link through this with the Apostle's thought? Glory belonged to God as maker and sovereign of the world; its emblem was light; it was the visible symbol of his spiritual essence. So far as Paul suggests any representation of Christ as the man of heaven, made in God's image, it is certainly also connected with the "spiritual body" whose characteristic is glory. [Compare the account of Michael's investiture of Enoch with the raiment of divine glory, "And I gazed upon myself, and I was like one of his glorious ones." (Secrets of Enoch, xxii. 8—10): and see the representations in the Ascension of Isaiah, chapters ix. and x.] To that extent, therefore, we may understand him to mean, Christ was in the form of God. That mode of life, however, belonged to him in the spirit-world. Was he, in virtue of it, empowered to grasp at equality with God? The scale on which we now conceive the relative proportions of the universe and any human ideal, gives to such a question a character almost of grotesqueness. But Paul has in view a being who is to be hereafter exalted to the second place in the great divine order, God alone being superior to him, and this future dignity is, in a manner, reflected on to him at an earlier stage. In some fashion beyond our power to conceive, Paul supposes that Christ might have attempted to clutch at equality with God. Yet what, in its turn, does this last phrase describe? At what kind of equality might Christ have aimed? Equality of nature is plainly beyond his grasp. The heavenly man could not have dreamed of capturing half the Deity of God.* Equality of dignity is apparently within the Apostle's view; that "seat at God's right hand," to which he should attain when exalted as Lord. This is presented, as we shall hereafter see, as the sequel of his suffering. Christ did not, therefore, grasp at the triumph without the service which was its condition. He sought no throne of homage to which he had not trodden the appointed way. That path led him first from the world above to the earth below.

LITERATURE.

A DEMOCRAT'S RELIGION.†

This book, filled with almost prophetic indignation and written with passionate intensity of feeling, is indeed, in the words with which it closes, "a serious call to the churches." Its author is at once a sincere Christian and an ardent democrat. As a Christian he longs for the advent of the kingdom of Heaven, and bitterly reproaches the churches for their indifference to it. As a democrat he is filled with burning enthusiasm for the Democratic Ideal—for liberty, equality, and fraternity. And to him these are not two, but one. He sees the churches sunk in lethargy and worldliness, unmindful of their great mission of social regeneration. And he finds the cause of this in their capture by the forces of rank and wealth, which has made them the props of class rule, commercialism, and militarism. They have grown cold or even hostile to democratic movements and social reform, to the cause of the poor and the oppressed, and so have lost, or are fast losing, all influence with the people. To this he attributes the "waning of Evangelicalism," which is the subject of the first chapter. In spite of lavish expenditure and of the constant building of new churches and chapels, the attendance and membership are declining. Wesley, Whitefield, and Howell Harris refused to make common cause with the great democratic movement of the eighteenth century. Evangelicalism "saw nothing in the Gospel but a plan of individual salvation. It had but little idea of a common salvation, of the unity of mankind in Christ, and of the mutual responsibility of all men"; as a consequence it became the religion of the wealthy and respectable. The working class was neglected and alienated. The wealthy classes having now become imperialistic, the spirit of national pride and militarism has dominated the churches also; the Boer War showing that "the religion which prevailed in Great Britain was but a national one; that, instead of the Universal Father, we worshipped a sort of tribal divinity called the 'God of England.'". Even more widespread than the worship of the "God of England" is that grosser worship of Mammon which Mr. Heath denounces as the great canker of the churches. Their very efforts to evangelise the heathen world are poisoned by the all-pervading influence of commercialism. Mr. Heath quotes the striking words of the President of the Native Baptist Union at Lagos: "What are you to think of a religion which carries a glass of rum as a vade mecum to a hymn-book; which points with one hand to the skies, bidding you lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, and while you are looking up, grasps all your worldly goods, seizes your ancestral lands, labels your native forests and places your patrimony under inexplicable legislation?"

Basing himself on denominational reports, on the researches of Mr. Charles Booth, and on the Daily News census, Mr. Heath shows that the churches generally are declining in membership and attendance, and that even the few who can point to an actual increase have declined relatively to the growth of the population. Thus in London, where the population has nearly doubled in the last half century, the attendance at the churches sank from 37·58 per cent. of the population in 1851 to 22·44 per cent. in 1902. The working classes are almost entirely outside the churches. Mr. Heath repeats Dr. Clifford's statement, that while "83 per cent. of our countrymen are working men, only 3 per cent. of these were being influenced by religious teaching."

Turning to the Established Church, and quoting a statement of the late Archbishop Benson that the aim of the Prayer Book was to create in each parish a really Christian and Apostolic Society, Mr. Heath indignantly exclaims: "It seems a farce to talk of aiming at an Apostolic Society"; and he adds, "There has never been a time when any English parish : : : has shown the least likeness whatever to an Apostolic Society."

Mr. Heath reviews the history of the Church of England, and with the righteous indignation one would expect from the author of the pathetic history of the "English Peasant," he charges it with being "a power which necessarily opposed liberty and human rights. How it resisted liberty of conscience Nonconformists of all descriptions have known, : : : How little it has cared for the dignity of the human Person, for the Image of God, its long indifference to Colonial slavery and to the sufferings of its own baptized children in mines, factories, and agriculture testify. How completely it has sided with the ruling class in all things, its attitude towards legal and Parliamentary reform and towards laws affecting labour testify. And recently by its uncertain attitude on the Chinese Labour question, and by its support of the new Licensing Bill, it showed that it considered its position as the bulwark of Property more important than its calling as Watcher over the soul of England and the souls of the English people. : : What has desolated the church, and is desolating the church, is the worship of Property."

The working men—the vast majority of the nation—are apathetic or hostile to the churches because they doubt their sincerity, their real belief in the teaching of Christ. If the churches desire to win over the people "they must allow no doubt as to their maintenance of the Democratic Ideal, still more must they show it in practice. They must, as churches, produce not only types of the true individual, but of the true social life. : : Mammon worship must go and Fashion worship, as well as the cult of the smug god Respectability."

The concluding chapter is entitled "The Need of the World." In it we get to the central thought of the book. For Mr. Heath, the ardent democrat, the hope of the world lies in the triumph of the Democratic Ideal. But how is that ideal to be realised? It can only triumph when the cause of justice shall have found "a thoroughly stable point d'appui." "But no people or nation," Mr. Heath believes, "no country or city can of itself create such a point d'appui." The realisation of the Democratic Ideal is for ever impossible if we have to trust to human nature and evolution alone. Supernatural aid is necessary to its triumph. The necessary point d'appui can only be found in the one hope of Humanity, a divine society, "a visible ideal society in manifest enjoyment of the direct help of God pouring out upon it the gift of the Spirit." One cannot but feel the force and the justice of Mr. Heath's passionate indictment of the churches, for their surrender to wealth and power, their failure to be true to the ideal of the Master, and their lack of enthusiasm for the kingdom of heaven. But although these are main causes of their decadence, there is another and potent cause which he himself, incidentally, admits. Their influence is declining because their theology—their whole conception of the world—is out of harmony with the best thought of the day. Many truly religious men are turning away from the churches to cultivate the Religion of the Free Spirit in freedom from supernaturalism, dogmatism, and formalism—the religion of free inquiry, of human service and human fellowship, of trust in the Perfect Whole of which we are members.

One regrets to differ from one whose heart throbs with such a passionate love of humanity, who is so whole-hearted a lover of righteousness, and whose thought keeps such a firm grip on the essential idea of human solidarity, but it is impossible to share Mr. Heath's faith in the church. Like the great Catholic thinkers of mediæval times, he seems to regard the church as a supernatural society, receiving miraculous guidance from God Himself; the perfect, infallible guide alike of the individual man and of the nations of the world, and therefore independent of, and superior to, civil society, which is, at the best, of the earth—earthy. But the history of the church forbids us to believe in its divine perfection and its supernatural guidance. This very book is an exposure of the failings and sins of the churches, no more divinely preserved from error than is the State. Besides, the old idea of the supernatural is impossible for modern thought, which recognises the natural only. That is full of wonder and mystery, miraculous if you like—a spiritual revelation unfolding itself with the evolution of Man and Society. But we know of no supernatural interference with its course; no miraculous grace descending from above to constrain men to do what their nature would else reject. To us, again, the State is not the wicked and accursed thing it seemed to the early Christians. It is itself a true "city of God"; the creation and manifestation of the spiritual nature of man; imperfect, like himself, but growing with his growth and developing as his moral and intellectual powers slowly gain the mastery over his animal impulses. We strive for the realisation of the Democratic Ideal in and by the State; in Biblical language, that the kingdoms of this world may become the kingdom of heaven.

* In Christ and Modern Theology, 4th edition' p. 309, Principal Fairbairn writes:—"Although in the form of God, he did not think the being equal with God a thing to be clutched at, but emptied himself for our good. Prior being is here affirmed, a being so in the form of God that to be equal to Him is a thing of nature." But if equality with God already belongs to Christ by nature, how is it to be gained by clutching at it? The suggestion that equality might be got by snatching, surely implies that the snatcher does not already possess it.

MAURICE ADAMS.

THE DUTY OF SELF-REALISATION.*

Two chapters of the volume before me are already familiar to readers of THE INQUIRER, having appeared, though not precisely in the same form, in the Hibbert Journal for January, 1904; and these, dealing as they did with the Gods in their relation to Race Memory, must have whetted the appetite for more. In the book they form part of an interesting and illuminating theory of the nature of reality, but especially of personal reality, and then of the Race-life as a whole.

Some of their leading thoughts are closely akin to those of Professor Royce in his "The World and the Individual," though the position of the two thinkers is not identical. Both, however, lay emphasis on what is generally known as "mystical experience," and, like Professors Starbuck and James, accept the scientific value of religious phenomena. Indeed, one might properly go much further than this in speaking of the work of Mr. Edward Carpenter; for there can be no doubt that its appeal is ultimately to the religious, rather than the purely intellectual faculty of the reader; he is a seer first and a philosophical essayist afterwards.

Those who are familiar with his several books know this writer as a student of Indian mysticism; and much of the esoteric lore of the East has gone to the making of these pages. In many respects their writer shows as much of the Buddhist as of the Christian attitude of mind; and in any case, he comes near to fusing both, combining them with elements derived from Plato and from modern science, to create a religious position of his own. In a word, there are few writers who are at once so profoundly and movingly religious, and so wholly emancipated from current religious phrases and trappings.

His pages display a wonderfully balanced wisdom in their estimates of the several Gods; they give Christ his place and Mary hers; but in so doing they enrich, where others have impoverished, humanity. For they stand by the brave old assertions of Incarnate Deity; they relegate nothing of the Divine to the foolish limbo of the past; instead they seem to make new, and, if it were possible, more daring claims.

One is forced at once frankly to admit that Mr. Carpenter is a poet. He does not see the world in the "dry light" of science; but rather under that light "that never was on sea or land." One may make the admission without regret; for the real poet is not the dreamer of stale dreams, but the confidant of a God; and if he does not know all the latest science, yet, in Whitman's phrase, "Creation is his friend."

And the interesting fact remains, for the encouragement of the prosaic reader, that Mr. Carpenter really does know a good deal of the latest science. As a former Extension Lecturer upon astronomical and other cognate topics, he speaks in these matters with a degree of academic authority; and all his many references to the present tendencies of scientific hypothesis and discovery appear to be carefully weighed. There are few more delightful and suggestive passages in the volume than the study of the transformations of the May-fly, relegated to an appendix.

The moral of that story, and I think of the whole book, is that "there is nothing that man or other creature may not do provided he only chooses"; and this brings us at length to the subject—the art of creation. There is a trace of quaint humour in the largeness of the title, and it is a quality never long absent from these serious and reverent pages; for humour is one of their writer's marked and delightful characteristics. But it is only a trace, for the book really does profess to initiate the reader into that highest and oldest of the arts by which the worlds were made.

And if, as Edward Carpenter would teach us, the Gods are all enshrined and potential to-day in our own nature, their old creative power may also be ours. The Word that was with God in the Beginning is still to-day with man. For God the Creator is the principle and formative purpose which is immanent in the whole of material things, making them not merely what they seem, but what they eternally are. Man also is an expression of that purpose; but he is more. For it is given to him to rise into the consciousness of that purpose, and to find himself in It. Finding that, he discovers the Self of which these pages treat.

The purpose which created and is creating the actual body of man is still, it would appear, incomplete. And as, individually, men enter into It, they will continue its creative work, gradually lifting up the Race to nobler destinies. For in this region, the gain of one is actually the gain of all, since all are interrelated parts of a single life.

That is to say, we are all, according to this writer, members of a living and immortal Being, the Human Race, whose life flows in our veins, whose purpose embraces ours. This Human Being must not be confused with that vague Comtian concept of humanity which seems to be the mere lifeless generalisation of individuals. For Carpenter's "Race" is something intensely vital and vigorous, like a true Platonic "Idea." In relation to the individuals, it is as the whole body is to its constituent corpuscles and parts. Each cell of the body has, according to certain observers, a kind of cell-consciousness, but the body as a whole seems to live far more fully than do its cells; and even so, the Race lives far more fully than do the individuals which are its parts.

Are we, then, to account ourselves mere vanishing molecules in the infinite Divine Purpose?

I do not think that this at all represents the whole of Carpenter's meaning; for he speaks of Love, of Imagination, and of the sense of Beauty as faculties of the larger, deeper, and immortal life; and in these we, as individuals, already share. To love is to share in the life of God; and that which loves is itself immortal.

But it may well be that what we now regard as our self is but a temporary expression of our real and eternal self, and that, as childhood with its fancies dies into youth, and youth dies into maturity, so manhood must die into the next phase of our unfolding life. For as yet we do not know ourselves "as we are known."

I began by saying that the book set forth a theory of reality, and I will conclude with another word on this subject. As to the theory, I must refer to the book itself, for it needs accurate statement; but there is tied up with it an ethical notion which deserves more than a passing notice. It is, briefly, that our highest duty is that of literal self-realisation. We can be consciously one of several selves or phases of ourself; it behoves us to live in the consciousness of the most Real of these, until we discover the Divine or Elemental Self. "To thine own self be true" becomes, in this reading of it, a profoundly significant injunction. For the life of the Divine Self is the life of "a quickening spirit," the only truly creative power known to us; and it is this life to which each one is being called.

THE UNEMPLOYED.*

ALTHOUGH, as Mr. Alden is obliged to tell us, little practical progress has been made in solving the problem of the unemployed, yet this little volume is at once a welcome evidence of the clearer views that are beginning to prevail, and a valuable contribution to the more complete understanding of the subject. We are especially indebted to the author for the suggestion contained in his sub-title—A National Question. For so long as the problem is regarded either as a local one or as an intermittent one, no solution is possible. It is not here and there, but everywhere; not now and then, but always. Its effects are most disastrously concentrated in the towns, but for its causes we must look equally to the country side. The dehumanising condition and lack of opportunity of village life is one of the forces driving surplus labour to the town. The emphasising of this fact on the title-page is the more necessary because the few and too short chapters which follow are concerned almost entirely with detail, so that at times there is risk of an inexpert reader failing to see the wood for the trees.

*"The Unemployed: A National Question." By Percy Alden, M.A. With a Preface by Sir John Gorst, M.P. (P. S. King & Son. 1s.)

The book, a deftly filled storehouse of information, is an extremely careful summary of recent experiments and proposals for dealing with the evils of unemployment. This renders it difficult to give any adequate description of its contents, and in fact we shall confine ourselves to some reference to a single aspect, though we might draw on these chapters for interesting knowledge on many points, as, e.g., the descriptions of the German and other labour colonies, to which Mr. Alden paid so fruitful a visit last summer. These and other matters we must pass with a simple mention of the clear, moderate, and severely practical account of many agencies for dealing with a national evil.

The one point to which further reference may be made is the analysis of the various classes which compose the mass of the unemployed, for in this analysis the scientific value of the book chiefly consists.

The first division is into the unemployable and the unemployed, a distinction essential to be borne in mind, both for theory and practice, since the remedial measures suitable to the one are obviously unsuited to the other. But these classes again are themselves composite, and the unemployable are divided into (1) criminals, semi-criminals, vicious vagabonds, and the incorrigibly lazy; (2) the physically and mentally deficient: (a) the aged; (b) the weak and maimed, including the blind, lame and deaf, and men with weak hearts; (c) epileptics; (d) inebriates, and the mentally deficient. At the present time these classes are left to compete in the labour market, so that their work, dear at any price, at once lowers the wages and the industrial standard of the real industrial class, and, as Mr. Alden shows, an adequate treatment of this class would in itself do much to ease the problem of the genuine unemployed, and also that equally dangerous phenomenon of the underemployed and the underpaid.

Turning to the second main division, we are at once aware that this also is a composite class, which may be broken up into: (1) Those who are unemployed owing to dislocation or change in methods of industry; (2) those who are unemployed owing to depression of trade or severe weather; (3) those whose labour is always casual. Such is Mr. Alden's account of the problem. The larger part of the book is occupied with a classified description of proposals offered and methods adopted for dealing either with the problem as a whole, or with the special requirements of the separate classes. The general spirit in which the task should be approached is aptly expressed thus:—"Unemployment is labour that might be utilised in the production of wealth, that is not so utilised for one reason or another, and is therefore wasted" (p. 32). Labour power is potential national wealth, and consequently remedies for unemployment are in no sense to be considered charitable. They are imperatively demanded for the real welfare of the whole community, and must be carried out on the responsibility and at the cost of the nation.

A first reading of this book gives, perhaps inevitably, a too massive impression of the many things tried or proposed, and this rather tends to obscure the actual conclusion that, after all, very little has really been done. The numerous schemes proposed are, as Mr. Alden tells us, merely palliatives. I think the value of the book would be enhanced if this fact were more fully emphasised, and if even among the palliative measures we found more guidance as to their relative value from one who knows his subject so thoroughly as Mr Alden does. I had noted a few points either not mentioned or not brought, as it seemed, into sufficient prominence. The "unemployed" includes a large and very costly class of idle, rich people who, by their anti-social habits, aggravate every form of national distress. The condition of the unemployed is also affected by the large number of those who are wrongly employed, as, e.g., the children who are so largely set to work before they are fit for industrial life. No doubt the need for a small book such as everyone may and should buy and read, is a legitimate reason for the omission of many things which would find a place in a more comprehensive treatise.

Most of the remedies proposed are remedial and not curative. There are hints in the book of the more thorough and far reaching measures that are needed, and should a second edition be called for, these might with great advantage be worked up into an additional chapter on the ultimate causes and the radical cure of unemployment, for the evil is indeed "rooted in our social system," and can only be adequately dealt with by "industrial re-organisation or social reconstruction." The real value of the remedies already proposed will be tested by the effect they may have in preparing the way for this. And it may well be that the measures adopted and the attention drawn to the subject in this winter of widespread and poignant distress will issue first in a deeper view of the causes and then in a more largely conceived policy for the removal of unemployment, and will lead on to a more profound consideration of the disability and hardships that inhere in the industrial system itself.

B. Kirkman Gray.

Do you fear because the earth has dwindled to a sand grain? So much the more glorious is the field in which it lies.—Martineau.

Self-crucifixion has an object, an end; and what is it? Its great end is to give liberty and energy to our nature. Its aim is, not to break down the soul, but to curb those lusts and passions "which war against the soul," that the moral and intellectual faculties may rise into new life, and may manifest their divine original. Self-crucifixion, justly viewed, is the suppression of the passions, that the power and progress of thought, and conscience, and pure love, may be unrestrained. It is the destruction of the brute, that the angel may unfold itself within. It is founded on our godlike capacities, and the expansion and glory of these is its end. Thus the very duty, which by some is identified with self-contempt, implies and imposes self-reverence. It is the belief and the choice of perfection as our inheritance and end.—Channing.

"JESUS SAITH."

VII.—CORDS TO THE KINGDOM.

Jesus saith, Who are they that draw us to the kingdom, if the kingdom is in heaven? The fowls of the air, and all beasts that are under the earth or upon the earth, and the fishes of the sea—these are they that draw you.

Without parallel in the Gospels as this saying is, it reminds us strangely of the Jesus of the Synoptics; through it there breathes the air of the Galilean fields—the speaker is one who had been a country lad, conversant with country sights and sounds and scents, in keen sympathy with the country's multitudinous, stirring life, and rejoicing in every one of that life's manifestations as the handiwork of God.

Taken in its most obvious and literal meaning, we might well wish that this utterance had been recorded by one of our four Evangelists; the effect for good would have been invaluable, the amount of physical anguish callously inflicted upon sentient creatures would have been lessened to a degree past computing, had the Church been able to point to an authoritative deliverance of Christ's, expressing not merely his pity for defenceless beings, but also his sense of their right to considerate treatment. "These are they which draw us to heaven"—if we look upon them as evidences of Divine purpose and power, if we use them with the consciousness of having a trust laid upon us, if we reverence the Creator in His creation.

But is this all that the words are intended to convey, or may we give to them a wider as well as deeper signification? "Who are they that draw us to the kingdom?" This question propounded to Christ is only another form of the perennial query, "What must I do to inherit eternal life?" We know that again and again men in search of an answer to that query have persuaded themselves that in order to lay hold of spiritual blessings they must turn away from all that nature offers; that the body and the senses were given them solely and expressly to be mortified and crucified; that the visible creation contained no message from on high, but was merely the arena of every depraved instinct and hateful passion, from whose defiling touch nothing would preserve save the austerities of asceticism or the cell of the anchorite. As a matter of fact, there are inherent in every kind of asceticism moral and spiritual dangers which have time after time manifested themselves, and among them, not the least, that of spiritual pride.

In direct condemnation of all the laborious and unwholesome futilities which would force an entry to heaven by heaping dishonour upon earth, which would glorify the spiritual, not by subjecting, but by maltreating the natural, Jesus exclaims: "Who are they that draw us to heaven? The fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field, and the fishes of the sea! You must live in this world—not go out of it—so using as not to abuse, nor be abused by it. You must learn that God verily expresses Himself in the facts and allotments of this work-a-day earth. You will not reach the kingdom of heaven the more swiftly by turning away from the surroundings which are to train you; that is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; then that which is spiritual."

And do not His words further administer a valuable corrective to the common error that men are bounded by their opportunities, cramped by their environment, prevented from soaring upwards by the want of stimulus in their surroundings? But the commonest phenomena of nature may draw us to heaven, if we are willing to be drawn! Prosaic destinies, unromantic avocations, a contracted sphere of dull and monotonous duties—none of these can hinder us from finding the kingdom, if so be that we have a mind to seek it; all of them may help to draw us thither, provided that we care to have it so. Out of materials incredibly meagre and unpromising the soul can construct for its ascent a leader from earth to heaven; surroundings the most ordinary may be consecrated by the aspiring heart, and transformed into a temple where God Himself may be met and held converse with. Not outward occasions, but the inward disposition constitutes the determining factor. The question is always Christ's "Wilt thou be made whole?" Wilt thou be drawn to the kingdom? Where that will exists, it will force all mere circumstances into subservience to itself, and transform hindrances into allies and trials into auxiliaries; where it does not exist, no seconding opportunity or favouring breath of heaven will be of any avail whatever. Let us cease preferring the wretched plea that it is our surroundings which mould our destinies and decide our course; it is for us rather to react upon our surroundings, and to make them our instruments for accomplishing our quest.

> The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
> But in ourselves, that we are underlings.

Lastly, there is in these words, "Who are they that draw us to heaven?" a very searching question to each one of us. What is the kingdom of which, in our inmost hearts, we long to be citizens? What is the heaven of our dearest dreams, the paradise where we desire to be? What are the satisfactions we really care most for, and which act as the strongest magnets upon us? What strange confessions we should hear—or haply make—were we all compelled to return true answers! Where is our heaven? In the grossly fertile alluvial plains of wealth and material pleasure? In the unsubstantial cloudland of personal pride and ambition? In the demon-haunted, waterless wastes of passion? Or in the knowledge and love of God, and of him whom He hath sent, Jesus Christ?

Jesus saith: "What are they that draw you to the kingdom—is it indeed toward the kingdom of God that you are being drawn? Have your souls been rapt and set on fire by the vision of some Holy Grail, the contemplation of a Truth, a Goodness, an everlasting Right, which, however distant, you have no choice but to toil after in a pilgrimage which never will end? Watch and pray that this be indeed the object of your journey; follow the true magnets, the simple instincts, the plain and certain duties, familiar and unmistakable as the commonest objects around you, for these you may trust to lead you aright. The simple sanctities of work and home and love and sacrifice—these are they that draw the soul to heaven, and make it one with God."

THE BATTLE OF THE WEEDS.

The battle has begun! The big battle that will go on day after day all over the country—the Battle of the Weeds.

Oh, I thought you just pulled them up and then they died, and when there are a great many you have a bonfire and burn them, and they're done with.

Did you? Well, things don't end just like that. I'll tell you what happens. You begin—where do you begin?—you go straightaway down the garden, say, to see how your winter seedlings have fared, and there you come upon a fine bed of chickweed flourishing and flowering with tiny white stars—bless its heart! when doesn't it flower?—as though nothing suited it so well as winter. Nothing does except summer, and then it simply gallops.

What horrid stuff!

Not at all.

But isn't it your enemy?

Yes; but that's no reason why I should not think well of it. I have the highest respect for my weeds. Of all enemies, none have so nearly persuaded me to love them. For you see, the harder we fight the more I find out their good points. I call them "My friends the Enemy." A dogged foe, but fair as a friend. You see, you get to know your weeds if you have much to do with them, and you've only to get to know anybody thoroughly well, and you're almost sure to like him. We all like ourselves so much because we know ourselves so well—or think we do. Even Russians and Japs are learning by fighting to respect one another. That is better than ignorance and contempt; and if only they would get a little nearer still and take to living in one another's cities and playing football together and buying each other's butter and eggs they would soon become good friends.

Anyhow, a little warfare has taught me to take off my cap to my weeds. The good fellows find me sturdy exercise. Like a boxer of spirit they are always ready for a bout. They don't understand defeat. Their courage is perfect. Their energy is inexhaustible. What, nothing to learn from dealing with such people? Happy fortune may one day bring you a neighbour with a thistle-patch. Give his thistle-seeds a fair chance to open their parachutes and sail over the hedge and invade your territory, and then entrench themselves to the number of—say—a thousand. There is a downright good tussel before you. War will not end that year. They'll want attacking and rooting up one by one. Leave an inch or two of tap-root in the ground, and, like the invulnerable Jim Dandelion, Tom Thistle will recover from his wounds and meet you with his prickly smile once more. You must make good every inch of your ground. So we salute; you hear the clink of steel on stone, and then we fall to. Folk say that cats have nine lives. How many lives have buttercups, I wonder? Look at that patch. I dug it well last spring. It bore a fine crop of buttercups in the summer. I hoed them up and sowed winter spinach, and the earth between the rows was green with their rosettes again long before Christmas. Yes, weeds are beings of untamed energy. The people like them make the best kind of men and women under proper restraint and education. Always try to get a piece of garden where the weeds grow freely. They are to be understood as a promise that with proper sense and industry your leeks and potatoes shall be just as prolific. They have their uses, not a few, and they're comely to look upon.

What, weeds pretty?

Yes, weeds are very pretty. A hayfield red with sorrel, a meadow all with daisies pied, or golden with buttercups, a ten-acre mantle of poppies spread over a wheat-field, a great waste of rag-wort, an old gravel-quarry turned into a refuse-pit but claimed by the camomiles for their own garden—why, half the beauty of the earth is the beauty of its weeds. Look at that band of soft apple-green picked out with blue and white spots among the lanky stalks of the brocoli! Only a weed. One wishes sometimes there were room for all of them to come and grow as they will.

Industry? They beat us all. Whoever else is not at his post by daylight, they are sure to be. They go on working, if there's a ray of sunshine to help them till supper-time. And then only do they shut their eyes—blue, white, or yellow, according to their kind, and go to sleep, to be up and at it for certain long before you get out with your hoe next morning.

But this bit of our conversation from other days, which, for want of anything else to say, I am now trying to recollect and write down, I intended for a "kind of a sermon," Peggy. So here's what we call the application or wind-up:

You and I are gardens, and there's never a garden without weeds. I don't exactly know what we should do without some weeds to chop at and pull up. Shake out that nettly corner of sharp temper. Do it thoroughly. It may be done with nettles once and for all. If that hulking fellow Lazy-dock comes in, beware! Catch hold and tug. But no, you can't pull him up. Off comes his head and over you go. In a month's time he will be laughing at you from amidst his rampant green leaves and sending up three stalks for one. You must get down deeper next time.

As for Goose-foot, the conceited fellow, he never knows when he's tall enough. He thinks he can look down on everybody. Up with Master Conceit; he sets his chin too high for me. Keep a sharp look-out, too, for Sir Craft, the wily Snakegrass, who stealthily creeps in from under the hedges, and burrows hither and thither like a mole before you know where he is, and will start life afresh if you give him the chance on a fragment of root no bigger than two inches of packing-thread.

We've all got a battle to fight with the weeds, my fellow-gardeners, and some of those which, if we look carefully, or take the word of others who can see better than we, are to be found growing in the walled garden of our own hearts, will need as much attention as docks and dandelions, and will repay us for the tussel quite as handsomely with brimming health and brave thoughts and sunny tempers. "Watch weel!" was the motto which a great man set up in the middle of his garden. 'Tis a good motto for a gardener: Watch weel!

THE MARTINEAU CENTENARY.

THE minister and officers of the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, made last week a preliminary announcement as to the celebration of the centenary of the birth of JAMES MARTINEAU, for which they are preparing in his native city. April 21, which is the birthday, falls this year on Good Friday, and those who are unable to leave home at that time and make the journey to Norwich in order to take part in the celebration, will have a later opportunity at Oxford, on May 1 and 2, when Manchester College is to hold a further commemoration; but we trust that many representatives of our churches throughout the country, and many other friends who have owed so much to the inspiration of Dr. MARTINEAU'S life and teaching, will be able to make this pilgrimage to Norwich, and join in the services of Good Friday and Easter Sunday and the public meeting of commemoration. No season of the year could, in reality, be more fitting for the grateful and reverent remembrance of such a life, than that in which the Christian Church throughout the world celebrates the holiest self-sacrifice and the great joy of the immortal life risen out of the shadows of death. A worthy memorial of MARTINEAU must be in perfect harmony with the spirit of the Easter festival. The lowly spirit of the disciple, no less than the transcendent power of the prophet and seer of heavenly things, will be set in the truest light amid the holy thoughts, the adoration and thanksgiving, which unite earth and heaven in one great communion of love and trust.

That the true spirit will not be lacking in this commemoration is already assured by the promise that Dr. DRUMMOND is to be the preacher of the centenary sermon on Good Friday, and that among those taking part in the celebration are to be the Revs. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED and J. ESTLIN CARPENTER. Other old students of Dr. MARTINEAU'S will be there, spiritual children of his, belonging to different generations, and also, as we trust, his own children who are still with us, and other members of the family. The house where he was born still stands in Magdalen-street, and the old Octagon Chapel is venerable with many sacred memories, besides those of the childhood, the early pieties and young enthusiasm, and the life-long affection of JAMES MARTINEAU. The ancient cathedral city, stirring now with modern life, may know little of one of her greatest sons, but this occasion should be rendered memorable by a gathering from near and far of those who will bear testimony by their presence to the profound significance of his life, and to the abiding honour and reverence in which he is held. It should be a very happy occasion for the gratitude and affection silently cherished in many hearts, and a season of fresh consecration in the deeper life of the spirit, for those to whom he has spoken and speaks with prophetic power, who have found in him the friend and helper of their faith, the quickener of their holiest thoughts and aspirations.

Of this Norwich celebration there is something more to say. Not all those who would like to be present will be able to be actually there; but all will have the opportunity of taking part in the commemoration, by making an offering of reverence and gratitude towards the erection at Norwich of what we trust will be generally recognised as the national memorial of this centenary. It is most fitting that such a memorial to JAMES MARTINEAU should be raised in the city of his birth, and it is a happy coincidence that the needs of work in connection with the Octagon Chapel, which he himself in early manhood had a share in originating, and in which he always took a deep interest, should determine its form. We wrote of this last year, in THE INQUIRER of April 23, telling how, through the falling in of leases, the school-buildings long connected with the Octagon, the scene of generations of devoted work, with which in their day such men as JOHN WITHERS DOWSON, TRAVERS MADGE, and MARK WADE were identified, are passing out of the hands of the congregation, and the necessity has arisen to secure a fresh site for the erection of adequate buildings, as a home for the Sunday-school, and all the manifold activities which are the natural expression of the faith and energy of a living church. Hitherto the boys' and girls' schools have been held in separate buildings, both at some little distance from the chapel, but now a valuable property adjoining the chapel, and with a frontage to the street by its entrance-gates, has been purchased, and the best possible opportunity secured of meeting the urgent need by the erection there of a Martineau Memorial Hall and Schools. For the site and the houses now standing on it £2,000 has been paid, and to carry out the scheme in its completeness a further £4,000 will be required. This is far beyond the unaided powers of the congregation, and can only be accomplished by the cordial and generous co-operation of many friends. This has been already recognised in the purchase of the site, and we would venture once more to express the earnest hope that this idea of a Norwich Memorial may kindle the faith and the imagination of our people, as a thing in which all should heartily and thankfully unite. It is not only that we desire to make this visible memorial of our great Teacher worthy of the occasion, unpretentious indeed, yet noble and beautiful among buildings dedicated to such high ends, but that we are also to strengthen the work and the testimony of our faith in one of our historic chapels, in the chief city of a great province, on which far more depends than the prosperity of one congregation. Without a few really great gifts, such as generous hearts and ample means can give, we fear the end so ardently desired cannot be attained; but with these, and with a general response from the members of our churches and other friends throughout the country, and as we will dare to hope from friends in other countries also, our faith will be justified, and a memorial to JAMES MARTINEAU will be raised in his native city, worthy of the great name we seek to honour, and adequate to the needs and the growing possibilities of a religious work, true to his spirit, and identified with the most cherished interests and affections of his life.

THE LATE MAHARSHI DEVENDRA NATH TAGORE.

A SPECIAL number of the Indian Messenger is devoted to the memory of the venerable MAHARSHI DEVENDRA NATH TAGORE, "the patriarch of the Brahmo Samaj," whose death at Calcutta on Jan. 19 we briefly recorded last week. The funeral procession on the evening of that day to the place of burning was a striking testimony to the reverence in which the aged man was held. All sections of Brahmos, in particular, were fully represented; for although he witnessed and could not approve of the new departures of KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, and the founding of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, but remained true to the] end to his own principles in the Adi Samaj, no differences of judgment, we are assured, were allowed to interfere with the warm affection with which he regarded the younger leaders of the movement, or with the veneration with which they regarded him. He was a great Rishi, an inspired Rishi, a veritable saint and sage; so the warm tribute of the Indian Messenger runs; not only the patriarch of the Brahmo Samaj, but a unique spiritual figure in India. "In him the spiritual genius of India was concentrated; and in this age of materialism, secularism, and agnosticism we had a living example of spiritually-mindedness in his life."

Born to great wealth and rank, with a career of the highest distinction open to him, he chose the better way of self-renunciation and contemplation, and as a young man, after severe inward struggles, became a religious reformer among his own people. He followed the RAJA RAMMOHUN ROY, and became the second founder of the Brahmo Samaj, suffering much for conscience sake, by reason of his protest against idolatry. This is the tribute of Mr. A. M. BOSE:—"I will not speak of my personal loss, or of my private grief. Let me rather remember his deep learning, and his profound piety, his inspired and inspiring presence, and his active and earnest sympathy with every good cause. Let us all be grateful to GOD that he was spared so long, a living centre of saintly influence to which people went as to a holy shrine, and felt uplifted and ennobled by that glorious and beautiful presence. . . . Many pens will no doubt record that wonderful history, how, abjuring the ease and luxury which surrounded him, he set out in his great quest for Truth; and how, having attained that Truth from his meditations and wanderings in the hills, and from the Upanishads which he loved so dearly, he returned to Calcutta and poured out that truth in burning words which carried conviction. . . . May the fire which he kindled in the Brahmo Samaj, and in many seeking souls, be imperishable, abiding for ever in our hearts and in our lives."

Of such a personality we should be thankful to know more, and we are glad to see the wish expressed by Mr. BOSE that his autobiography, which is evidently a remarkable record, telling the story of his early struggles and of his life down to his fortieth year, may be translated into English, to give us in the West more understanding "of the development of an Eastern, I may say in its best sense, a Hindu saint." In that wish, and in sincere sympathy with those who are most nearly touched by the sorrow and loss caused by the departure of this venerable leader, we beg respectfully to join.

WHAT is religion? Not a foreign inhabitant, not something alien to our nature, which comes and takes up its abode in the soul. It is the soul itself, lifting itself up to its Maker. What is virtue? It is the soul listening to, and revering, and obeying a law which belongs to its very essence—the law of duty.—Channing.

RICHARD ACLAND ARMSTRONG,
SOCIAL REFORMER.

THE Rev. R. A. Armstrong has many claims to grateful remembrance. Those, however, who believe that righteousness exalteth a city will longest cherish his memory because of his connection with what came to be known ad nauseam as the Liverpool Purity Crusade. Mr. Armstrong revolutionised accepted ideas as to the duty of a great Corporation in dealing with facilities for shameless drunkenness and glaring immorality. What happened was largely the direct result of the awakening of the public conscience by Mr. Armstrong, though one would not wish to detract from the valuable services of many good men with whom he was associated.

Only those who lived through the time and watched events can now realise the extent to which pandemoniacal immorality held certain portions of Liverpool city in its grasp up to twelve or thirteen years ago. Absolute free trade seemed to exist in drink and prostitution. At an early hour in the evening many thoroughfares in the centre of the city were practically closed to respectable pedestrians and given over to a carnival of vice. Drunkenness and gambling, even among boys and girls, and worse evils were openly permitted on licensed premises. The authorities looked calmly on, and even those of them who would have been glad to alter the state of things gave up in despair all hope of bringing about any change. The head of the police advised the Watch Committee, in effect, that the best method of dealing with the evil of prostitution was to sit still, and do nothing, and that the public interest demanded the localisation of haunts of vice and violence where they would be under close supervision. The Watch Committee acquiesced only too readily.

Fortunately, others in the city took a different view. Four or five months after the Head Constable's declaration a deputation of leading citizens waited on the Watch Committee, with Mr. Armstrong as the memorial bearer and principal speaker, to protest against their inaction. Mr. Armstrong pointed out that there were two classes of people who were not affected either by looseness or strictness of administration—those who were resolved to keep pure and those who were resolved to be otherwise. But there was another class who were undetermined either way, whose moral salvation or ruin depended on the flagrancy or infrequency of temptation.

To this deputation the Watch Committee did not deign even to reply. There was no visible improvement. The City Magistrates certainly did make a stand for public morality, but were invariably overruled by the County Bench, whose invariable custom in this matter seemed to be to sacrifice public morality to property interests. Another scandal of the period was that the then Chairman of the Watch Committee happened to be the legal adviser of the brewing firm which owned the majority of the public-houses in the protected areas.

Apathy again prevailed. But not for long. A bolt came from the blue in October, 1890, in the form of a pamphlet by Mr. Armstrong; and for this pamphlet it is often claimed, and with justice, that it succeeded where all other endeavours had failed. Its sudden effect was unprecedented. Indignation of two sorts was aroused. Those who supported and profited by the city's "deadly shame" were indignant with Mr. Armstrong, and thought that his accusations were met sufficiently by the epithet "lying." But the populace also were indignant—at the condition of things revealed and at those who permitted it. Their imaginations were touched, and they realised that truth was written clearly on Mr. Armstrong's statements. And, indeed, the pamphlet was altogether a record merely of his personal observations. Under safe convoy he had watched brothel keepers at work in their own dens, had spoken and gently remonstrated with their victims and associates, and especially had formed very plain conclusions as to the unholy alliance—intentional or unintentional—between civic rulers and the drink traffic. He saw, too, that many public-houses were deliberately allowed to become recognised meeting places for prostitutes and their customers. He had studied the law and was able to show that Liverpool's disgrace was entirely due to a passive non-carrying out of Imperial decrees that had been specially created to meet such cases. He admitted that magistrates, councils, and police could not cleanse the souls of men or wipe out greed and lust from their lurking-places in men's hearts; but he counselled his fellow-citizens to insist that magistrates, councils, and police should show themselves on the side of sobriety and decency; that they should strictly administer existing laws and be a terror to evil-doers; they should minimise street temptations to the young and weak and avoid even the shadow of suspicion that they were influenced by rich men thriving on the degradation of the people.

The people responded to Mr. Armstrong's call. The firstfruits of his wonderful revelations were seen in the municipal elections of the following month, in the enforced resignation of the Chairman of the Watch Committee, and a slight change in the personnel of the Committee itself. The action of the Licensing Bench was transformed. Public-houses were subjected to more stringent inspection, and incidental abuses were remedied. Legal proceedings were taken against tenants of houses of ill-fame, many of which were closed. The Liquor interest made desperate efforts to uphold the dominant political party which was supposed to be identified with cakes and ale and social license—the change of policy having been inaugurated entirely by the Liberal members of the Watch Committee in spite of Tory resistance. In 1892, just before the elections in which Tory rule was, for the first time in many generations, overthrown and a majority given to the Liberals, Mr. Armstrong circulated a retrospective pamphlet among the electors, urging them to follow up the line they had taken two years before as to drink and impurity. He referred to the scandal of brewers' drays carrying Tory voters to the poll; of loquacious barmen and tapsters giving vent to the most approved Tory opinions among the customers; of free beer and beer on the cheap provided by brewers' bounties. The tangle, he said, was inextricable and could not be untied. It must be cut, and the only way to cut it was to put Toryism in a minority. The voters accepted Mr. Armstrong's counsel. The tangle was cut. A month after the appearance of this pamphlet a Liberal Lord Mayor reigned at the Town Hall, and the old official dalliance with the liquor traffic and its attendant evils became largely a thing of the past. The moral ardour of the Liberals was all along audaciously vilipended and ridiculed by many local politicians; but, though the Liberals maintained their numerical supremacy only for a very short time, the public conscience had been sufficiently roused to ensure that no return should ever be made to the bad old ways. A line of action as to the drink traffic and immorality was instituted which has continued down to the present day, and has been wisely developed, especially by Sir Thomas Hughes.

Much was achieved, but Mr. Armstrong's zeal did not abate. As occasion arose he contributed cogent and powerful and instructive letters to the Press, and, indeed, constituted himself a sort of watch-dog over Liverpool's morals.

The Watch Committee continued their prosecutions of tenants of immoral houses; but no one could understand how it was that in many cases, though tenant after tenant of particular houses was prosecuted and fined or sent to prison, the houses maintained their disorderly reputation, and new tenants of the same class were always immediately forthcoming. Mr. Armstrong's keen scent soon spotted what was wrong. The miserable tenants were compliant pawns in a game used by agents or owners who were deliberately speculating in debauchery. Some of the houses, although in reality dens of immorality into which young and unsuspecting persons were cruelly decoyed, bore externally signs of being merely respectable private hotels, and the owners and agents conveniently and audaciously pretended to be unconscious of their true character. As a matter of fact, Mr. Armstrong had reliable evidence of what was going on. The Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885 contained a clause which, if rightly interpreted, could bring these callous criminals to book. The Watch Committee were slow to set this law in motion, because they doubted the possibility of doing so with success. But the Home Secretary had declared that the law was perfectly sufficient if properly and rigorously administered. Mr. Armstrong showed the Watch Committee that they were being deliberately and systematically defied by these owners, and urged them to strong action. An influential deputation to the Watch Committee followed this letter, Mr. Armstrong again being the chief speaker. The deputation was this time well received. The Watch Committee promised to test the question fully and see if the law was sufficient. If they were beaten on the law itself, said the chairman, it then became a question as to how they could get the law altered.

Mr. Armstrong's last important public intervention in this matter was in 1896, when there was a suspicion of relaxed effort by the authorities. As usual, his letter was masterly in its presentment of facts, and had an excellent effect.

Closely identified as Mr. Armstrong was with the public discussion of delicate subjects, it is good to remember that he cannot be said ever to have discoursed on unsavoury topics in such a manner as to pander unconsciously to prurient instincts—an error of which many good men and women are conspicuously guilty. Even to young people he addressed himself freely on difficulties of life in which, through thoughtlessness and ignorance, they were apt to go astray, giving them wise counsel and securing their attention without any danger of exciting morbid curiosity.

Keen, stern fighter though he was, he at the same time was gentle and tender and chivalrous, and he gained the respect even of many who little sympathised with his methods. In every department of life and work he always sought the very highest standpoint, and never descended from it. This was well exemplified in his final appeal to the Watch Committee as to immoral houses—a striking mixture of joy on the "Te Deum" level at what had been accomplished, and a wail of despair lest through apathy the good should be undone. "With those who regard prostitution as a necessary and permanent element of civilisation I do not attempt to argue. But with those who believe in the Gospel of Christ, who look on men as the children of a Heavenly Father, who accept the doctrine that the pure in heart shall see God, and recognise no purity of heart where the body is not kept pure as the temple of God, and who believe that in the process of the ages the kingdom of God shall really come—with these I plead that they be not seduced into paths which can only lead us back to the reinstitution of 'the Deadly Shame of Liverpool.'" Characteristic utterance of a great teacher and leader and reformer whom all loved and whom all now mourn. Nothing better could be wished than that its warning notes should go ringing down to future generations of Liverpool citizens as their watchword and guide in this aspect of municipal government.

Liverpool. Edward Russell.

This year's "Jowett Lectures" at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, W.C., are to be given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, on "The Earliest Sources of the Life of Jesus; a Study of the Literary Relations and the Historical Value of the first three Gospels." The object of these lectures, which are given with the support of the Hibbert Trustees, is to place before the students some of the results of modern study of the conditions amid which the first Christian traditions assumed their present literary form. The revised version of the New Testament will be used. There are to be ten lectures, on Wednesday evenings, at 8.30, beginning on March 8, and concluding on May 17, the Wednesday of Easter week being omitted. The subject of the first lecture is "The Place of the Gospels in the Christian Church." The chair on that occasion will be taken by Mr. Claude G. Montefiore. Admission to the course is free.

THE CHRIST OF THE ANDES.

How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto the people, thy God reigneth!—Isaiah lii. 7.

In 1900, Argentina and Chile, sister Republics, were on the brink of war. It was an old dispute about boundary lines. On Easter Sunday good Bishop Benevente, of Argentina, appealed to his countrymen to settle the dispute by arbitration instead of by war. The two angry nations calmed themselves, King Edward of England was asked to be arbitrator, and both countries quietly acquiesced in his decision.

Then both began to disarm. Chile has turned an arsenal into a school of trades. She is teaching sciences to her cadets in hours once given to military tactics. She has sold some of her warships, and spent ten millions of dollars received for them in making good roads through the land.

To signalise and perpetuate this Victory of Peace a colossal statue of Christ was dedicated, March 13, 1904, on the boundary line, 14,000 ft. above the sea. One hand holding his cross of sacrifice, the other uplifted to Heaven, the Christ of the Andes stands on the height between the two countries, blessing both as they rest below him in peace. The inscription reads: "These mountains shall crumble to dust ere Argentines and Chileans break the peace which, at the feet of Christ the Redeemer, they have sworn to maintain."

What gleams so bright on the mountain-top
In the rising and setting sun?
What happy song do the rivers shout,
As down the mountains they run?

They sing that the Beautiful Feet have come
Of him who publisheth peace;
Who saith to the lands, The Good God reigns,
And the Hells of War shall cease!

The angel-song in the skies of old
At last is echoed of men;
The Beautiful Feet have come, have come,—
Christ, go not back again!

Nor linger there on the mountain-tops;
Come down to the plain, the shore,
To the noisy mart, to the plotting kings,—
Wander the wide earth o'er!

Press into the heart of the warring folk,
The nations from hate release!
Press into our hearts, O Feet of Christ,
And bring the world thy peace!

W. C. Gannett.

The history of creeds enforces the injunction, "Do not dogmatise." It will be well with the Churches when they realise the consummate wisdom of Jesus in this respect. He prescribed no creed; he set up no ceremony. But still he was aware of the necessity for a working principle in religion. To him the term "Father" was enough to express his theological ideas. It has all philosophy, all morality in it. It does not indicate a speculative doctrine that comes by ratiocination, but an intuitive consciousness that wells up in his heart. When Jesus pronounced the words "Our Father," he opened a circle of worship large enough for all souls, presented a yoke which is easy, and a burden which is light. No Church should ever have more or other than "Our Father" as its bond. It is enough for thought; enough for worship; enough for life.—Alexander Webster.

THE WILL TO BELIEVE AND THE DUTY TO DOUBT.—III.

We have seen that faith in a fact helps to create the fact when our own personal action enters largely into the fact.

The opinion in which Mr. James is specially interested goes further than this. He holds that we have a right to believe any hypothesis which is "live" enough to tempt our will and cannot be verified by appeal to the senses—to believe it so as to act on it and take the consequences. This does not mean that a man may set up a habit of believing things which he fears or thinks to be baseless. The essential points in the situation are three. A man may believe at his own risk—what? Something which he wants to believe; and when? When its truth is left undecided by physical facts. The examples considered by Mr. James are of this kind: "We have a conception which, being opposed by another, is only probable. But we feel that it is so good that it is fit to be true; it ought to be true; it must be true. And then we say, 'It shall be true for me; it is true.'"

Let us test the question, whether by willing to believe something that we want to believe we can be led to truth, with reference to a case of a kind which Mr. James does not take into account. A man wants to indulge his passions, but is aware of a moral principle which, if binding on him, will hamper them. It will be admitted that he can—not all at once, but by degrees—deaden his recognition of the moral principle until at last he ceases to feel it, and self-indulgence has a free course.

This is a case of willing to believe (immorally) which does not and cannot lead to truth, for the moral principle is binding still. Mr. James would reply that we have overlooked the first main factor in the situation: the man was to believe at his own risk, taking the consequences. What are the "consequences" in this case? They are the moral condition to which such "belief" leads when acted out in life. We suppose a man to believe that there is nothing to restrain the indulgence of favourite passions; to act on this belief is to indulge them, and the results are to be valued from the human point of view. The results are that he has ceased to lead a human life, and is leading a life which is—to borrow Hobbes' words—"solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, short." Manhood, or Humanity, has both actual and ideal meanings which are not less true because he has chosen to cease to be a man.

We have not, however, so easily got rid of the "will to believe." We speak of Humanity having meanings which are true; how should we know anything about the various possible meanings of Humanity unless various human beings had willed to believe these meanings—that is, had lived out and realised in their lives these ideas of what Humanity is and may be? What else is meant by the moral power of any heroic soul, or the moral supremacy of Jesus?

The position we have now reached is plain. We have found that the will to believe is not a means of manufacturing truth, but a test of truth. It means that we must test all beliefs by their practical results, their working power; only, when we use the words "practical result" and "working power," we must understand them in their widest possible sense. Thus, in the case of a moral belief, a belief in the truth of a moral principle, the practical working consequences of willing to believe it are found in the worth of a living character animated by that principle. Consequences in any kind of bodily welfare or outward fortune or happiness are altogether of subordinate importance. The thing that matters is the being more of man, the attainment of a state of manhood which is heroic and in the highest souls sublime, and at the same time works with a helpful redeeming power in its social effects. As regards outward happiness, Jesus made a wreck of his life; but in all probability he saved the Western world; and the moral sublimity of his own soul was nowhere more clearly manifest than in the bitterest hour of the outward ruin of life.

Turn now to the supreme question oi belief in God, who is thought of as an unseen power, more than ourselves, who not only makes for righteousness but means it, and recognises us in our efforts to realise it. Mr. D. S. Miller has spoken as follows of this belief:—"It is, despite its difficulties, so sovereign a thought that one cannot better express the futility of the postulating humour (the 'will-to-believe' mood) than by saying that the whole nature's craving to know it true may be quite disjoined from any temptation to drug one's doubts, creep into the belief on any terms, and have done." The pathetic absurdity of the "duty to doubt" humour is unconsciously but effectively displayed in these words. Here we have a belief which by admission is a desirable belief, and one which cannot be judged on the evidence of the senses; does it not seem reasonable to urge us to adopt it and live by it in order that we may have at least an opportunity of experiencing any other kind of evidence that there may be for it? Speaking from Professor James' point of view, Mr. H. R. Marshall has said that there are cases where to hold a balance of conviction leaves a man cold when his heart should be warm, or stolid when enthusiasm is needed if he is to do his part in the struggle towards the higher life. "Then there can be little doubt that the voice of those whose opinions we all honour would be raised in defence of a deliberate dissolution of the deadlock by making a choice of one of the two balanced beliefs. True, we may perchance choose the losing side; but even so, we shall be no better off in the end if we remain inert and inactive. It is the part of a courageous man to be willing to incur the risk of failure in the interest of that forcing of divergent opinions to their issues which will the more readily put their validity to the test of experience." Thus, the reply to those who urge the duty to doubt rests on a conviction that there are other kinds of evidence than that of the senses. There are, indeed, many—including the present writer—who hold that we can philosophically demonstrate that there must be other kinds of evidence; but the only way actually to find them is to live out the belief which is to be tested; and, if we will not do this, we by that act of refusal cut ourselves off from the possibility of appreciating such evidence. Mr. Miller has said that the will to believe is a resolution to have faith in excess of the evidence. This is only a half truth. It is a resolution to have faith in excess of one particular, limited kind of evidence, for the sake of finding experimentally whether there are not other means of verification.

The "duty to doubt" mood, in fact, shuts us off from all chance of experiencing certain kinds of truth. There is an even more weighty charge to be brought against it. Is it possible to maintain such a mood? Is it not in the end practically impossible to distinguish doubt from dogmatic negation? In one place, it is true, Jesus says, "He that is not against you is for you" (Luke ix. 50, R.V.); but elsewhere He says, "He that is not with me is against me" (Luke xi. 23). And in the case of doubt versus belief, he who is not for is against. Mr. James has illustrated this point in his usual vivid way: "If I refuse to stop a murder because I am in doubt whether it be not justifiable homicide, I am virtually abetting the crime. If I refuse to bail out a boat because I am in doubt whether my efforts will keep her afloat, I am really helping to sink her. If on the mountain precipice I doubt my right to take a leap, I actually connive at my destruction. He who commands himself not to be credulous of God, of freedom, of duty, of immortality, may again and again be indistinguishable from him who dogmatically denies them. The universe will have no neutrals in these questions: In theory as in practice, dodge or hedge or talk as we like about a wise scepticism, we are really doing volunteer military service for one side or the other."

Be it observed, finally, that this testing of a moral and spiritual principle by action and experience is exactly the same in method as the testing of a scientific truth or hypothesis by experiment. The difference is that in the latter case we understand the conditions much more completely, and the facts with which we deal are capable of definite measurement; we can therefore make the experiments much more exact. In the testing of a moral or spiritual belief we are dealing with facts which cannot be measured—facts where the very idea of physical quantity is absurd.

The Nonconformist Grammar School at Bishop's Stortford affords a curious illustration of the working of the Education Acts. The school is a large boarding, a small day school, with a staff of resident masters. One of these became a Roman Catholic after his appointment, and was accordingly dismissed. Nothing would have been heard of this but for the fact of the school being in receipt of public money in the shape of a grant from the Hertfordshire County Council. Not unnaturally the Tablet draws attention to this practical comment on the "no-test for teachers" argument.

A good man's piety and virtue are not distinct possessions; they are himself, and all the glory which belongs to them belongs to himself.—Channing.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

SIR,—I have no wish to unduly prolong this correspondence, or to raise fresh issues. Permit me, however, to add a final word or two in reply to Mr. Richard Simon.

(1) I cannot agree that the "margin of unemployed labour" did not exist either in 1873 or in 1900. Employers may have had difficulties in obtaining labour of a particular kind or in a particular place, but it is matter of common knowledge that such unemployed labour existed during both those years. It is a part of the dissatisfaction with the present haphazard and chaotic system of production, that it produces at the same time artificial gluts and scarcities, without necessity and with resulting misery.

(2) The value of the result of labour cannot limit wages until it is first ascertained that labour obtains its fair share of the value of the result. It is my contention again that wages are limited because land and capital being in comparatively few hands, are enabled to demand a larger share of the value of the result than they are entitled to by their contribution to the common product.

(3) The complete divergence between our respective views of the problem cannot, however, be better seen than in Mr. Simon's last paragraph. He says it is "necessary before suggesting remedies to realise that in social matters, as in Nature, the struggle for existence and the survival of the fittest is the divinely ordained order." Apart from the question as to whether it is the "fittest" who "survive" in a struggle which so often gives the victory to the strong and the unscrupulous, it is becoming increasingly evident that the principle of mutual aid and assistance is the Divinely ordained order, whether in nature or in social matters. The instinct in humanity which cares for the weak and the suffering, and the less fortunate, and extends pity to the erring and the sinful, is recognised by the vast majority as a Divinely implanted instinct which proves our kinship with the God of Love. A social and industrial order which permits a third of its population to live on the constant borders of dire poverty, and allows at recurring intervals something like a million men, with their families dependent upon them, to seek for the means of living without finding it, is no part of a "divinely ordained order." It is the product partly of a system which seems to require such injustice as its basis; partly of human greed and selfishness, and will have to be remedied by the action of the community acting through representative bodies, prompted by that Christian philanthropy which urges us to remedy recognised ills.

AUTHORITY AND DIVINITY.

THE correspondence between the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, and the Bishop of Southwell, which we published last week, reminded us of another correspondence, which appeared in the Examiner last year, from which we had intended to reproduce some passages as occasion offered.

The writer of a "Psychological Study of Mr. Chamberlain" in the Examiner of Feb. 11, 1904, had made the following reference to the character of Unitarian belief:—

"Our political life, as well as our theological thought, are vastly indebted to the Unitarians. But they would be the first to own that men are thrown by Unitarian beliefs very much on their own moral consciousness for guidance; when this cools they may cool. When this is warm, they may, at their option, become zealous advocates of righteousness. They have no Divine Christ to compel obedience, but only a Jesus, whose moral precepts they may criticise, and which they may accept or reject, according to their own judgment; thus their own judgment becomes the dominant authority in their lives."

On this Mr. Lloyd Thomas wrote to the Examiner:—"A writer who professes to offer 'a psychological study' must be presumed to know, with some exactness, the value and meaning of his terms. Yet I know no Unitarian who relies on the individual consciousness in a sense other than that in which every thoughtful Congregationalist relies upon it. 'The right and duty of individual judgment' is a Protestant and not a merely Unitarian principle; and, even so, has reference to divinely given data. No Unitarian treats obedience to the call of righteousness as something at his 'option.' Righteousness commands him precisely because it is not his private caprice, but the Life of One who is All-Holy. Dr. Martineau wrote in the preface to the third edition of 'The Seat of Authority' that 'The whole purpose of the First Book in this volume is to show that religious authority is objective and supernatural.' When the Divine Life that constitutes this authority no longer kindles and illumines our consciousness it undoubtedly 'cools'; but this cooling is, I regret to say, not confined to us. I could wish that it were. It is a pathetic fact of spiritual decadence, only too common in every religious communion.

"Nor is the writer accurate in saying of us that 'they have no Divine Christ to compel obedience, but only a Jesus.' The phrase 'only a Jesus' perplexes and repels me. If it is intended to mean a Jesus sundered from God's living Substance of love, I can only say that we know no such Jesus. All the Unitarians I know believe profoundly in the Divinity of Christ, and only reject the doctrine of His Absolute Omnipotent and Omniscient Deity. If with the Society of Friends we love to dwell much on the 'Inward Light' of the Holy Presence in every human soul, we never forget the importance of that world-transfiguring fact of 'God in Christ.' Nay, some of us would even admit that there is in this an element of uniqueness not discoverable in any other saviour of mankind.

"This Divine Christ is therefore for us an authority that 'compels obedience' precisely because he is not 'only a Jesus.' I have quoted from Dr. Martineau's ripest utterance. Permit me to conclude by quoting one of the ablest of our younger philosophers. Dr. Mellone, in his 'Converging Lines of Religious Thought,' p. 133, says: 'The consciousness of God cannot be so living and clear as to work strongly on feeling and thought without external influence to arouse it. For human nature as it is, this appeal from without is absolutely indispensable. But the external influence is not that of instruction alone, still less is it that of law or commandment; it is the sight of a personal ideal of goodness such as is set before the eyes of Christendom in the figure of the Saviour, whose love is shown at its height in the crowning sacrifice which love alone led Him to make, in surrendering Himself to the death which unavoidably lay between Him and the full completion of His work.'"

The writer of the "Psychological Study" wrote in reply with cordial acknowledgment of Mr. Lloyd Thomas's letter, which showed, he thought "an approach to the Johannine conception of our Lord." Yet he still felt that there was "an essential distinction between Unitarian and Evangelical beliefs as they are commonly held." As to Dr. Martineau's work on the "Seat of Authority," he said that when he read it, "it seemed to me that his effort was to reduce Christ to the level of a mere common, though unique, manhood, and to show that he possessed no really divine authority. The right of private judgment is not the right to appeal to reason as the final tribunal, but to reason, as informed by Christ and inspired by the Spirit of God. The subjective inner light must be guided and irradiated by the objective and outward revelation which is embodied in the Word made flesh."

In his final letter, which appeared in the Examiner of March 10, 1904, Mr. Lloyd Thomas wrote as follows:—

"The two points I wished to bring out were simply these:—

"1. That Unitarians do not rely on the individual consciousness in any sense other than that in which a thoughtful Congregationalist relies upon it.

"2. That they believe profoundly in the divinity of Christ.

"To the first point your correspondent replies that the right of private judgment is a limited or qualified right, viz., a right to appeal to reason 'as informed and inspired by the Spirit of God.' I read this to mean that the Christian and inspired mind will respond more truly to certain moral and spiritual realities than the non-Christian and uninspired mind. Granted, only I cannot consent to use even so simple and profound a truth as this as a means to qualify or limit the full exercise of the Protestant right of private judgment. I see a Roman Catholic pouncing eagerly on your correspondent's phrase and retorting, 'Exactly, just one little step further, and I also agree. We must appeal to reason informed by Christ as interpreted by my Church, which has been continuously inspired throughout history by the Spirit of God.' This may not be sound Roman Catholic theology, but, as a well-known statesman has said, it illustrates my argument. Once admit that the human mind first needs initiation into Christianity (or Buddhism or Theosophy), before it can be allowed to exercise the right of private judgment, and the door is opened to many subtle kinds of abuse. I want to convince a non-Christian of the present superiority or final supremacy of the Christian religion. I am speaking to a mind not 'informed by Christ.' How can I address myself to him except as to a man as much entitled as anyone to exercise the right of private judgment at his own risk? Or, I want to convince an Agnostic of the supreme reality of religion. I am speaking to a mind that will not admit that it is 'inspired by the Spirit of God.' I must, nevertheless, address myself to him as to a man as much entitled as any believer to exercise the right of private judgment. It follows, I think, that however true your correspondent's statement may be, it is, as a method, surely illegitimate, and even dangerous, to use this truth for the purpose of excluding the vast non-Christian majority of the population of the globe from the full exercise of the right of private judgment. Where the Congregationalist and the Unitarian are in complete accord is in recognising that religious authority is not an individual caprice or subjective fancy, but something that is 'objective and supernatural.' 'The consciousness of authority is doubtless human; but conditional on the source being divine.'

"This letter is already too long for me to do more than touch on the subject of the Divinity of Christ. I may briefly say that I mean by the Divinity of Christ the Divinity which I believe all modern Athanasians would ascribe to every man. That is to say, Man as such is at his highest, not merely of like substance, but of the same substance with the Father. The Rev. R. J. Campbell has said, 'Man is a fragment of divinity, and he never can forfeit his origin. "Only a man"—but we must take each man at his real value. How much of God does a man contain? That is the way in which to measure his humanity. "Only a man"—may he never cease to be a man, too, when his manhood towers up and up till it touches God and reveals God! We are mistaken when we try to draw any line between that humanity and the God that created it.'

"'Cease talking about mankind as though it were something different from Deity. The difference between man and God is a difference not in kind but in moral height' (Christian World Pulpit, February 18, 1903).

"I make use of this quotation not to join in the stupid cry that Mr. Campbell is unorthodox. We are all unorthodox now! Mr. Campbell probably less so than many of his brethren. The quotation, moreover, being torn from its context, probably gives undue emphasis to the point now under discussion. But it serves to show what I mean by the Divinity of Christ. I do not think that His Divinity is different in kind from the Divinity of any other great Saviour of men. But is 'God in Man' or 'God in Christ' any less God to me for that? I see in Christ both the Epiphany of Man in God and the Incarnation of God in Man. I worship God in Christ, I worship God in human nature and in the universe. I do not worship Christ or human nature or the universe, but the Supreme Reality they reveal.'"

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting of this "Union for Missionary Purposes" was held at Dean Row on Saturday, February 18. Afternoon service was held in the old Chapel, when the Rev. W. C. Hall preached the annual sermon from the text, "I am come that they might have life" (John x. 10).

The Rev. E. L. H. Thomas subsequently presided over the business meeting, when the report and the Treasurer's statement of accounts were adopted, and March 12 was appointed to be Mission Sunday.

The Report began by noting the ministerial changes of the year, including the removal of the Rev. W. L. Tucker to London and W. C. Hall to Birmingham. The Rev. W. Harrison, who had retired from the ministry to a well-earned rest, had been succeeded at Stalybridge by the Rev. W. G. Price; the Rev. E. A. Maly by the Rev. D. Davis at Nantwich; the Rev. W. L. Tucker by the Rev. W. F. Turland at Flowery Field. The Rev. H. Rawlings had resigned his charge at Denton. Death had removed the Rev. T. R. Elliott from Mossley, where he had served for 21 years, and was much beloved; he is to be succeeded by the Rev. J. E. Stead; and the Rev. H. Fisher Short has taken charge of Crewe, where welcome signs of new life are noted.

The special services conducted by representatives of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association were recorded, the preachers being the Revs. W. C. Bowie, R. Davis, V. D. Davis, H. E. Dowson, J. Harwood, W. G. Tarrant, and Frank Walters; also the result of the grand Union Bazaar on November 30 and December 1—3, when receipts were £3,070 and expenses £500. Thus various adverse circumstances prevented the attainment of the £5,000 aimed at; but apart from the financial gain to the Union, much good was done by the united effort. The report cordially recognised the value of the services rendered by the lay preachers and other workers for the Union, and concluded with a warm expression of sympathy with the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson in his long illness.

The accounts showed a total income of £353 2s. 6d., and a deficit of £157 11s. 10d., increased to £174 6s. 8d. The income included grants to Ashton, Congelton, Denton, Macclesfield, and Mottram, from the B. and F. U. A., amounting to £180. The annual subscriptions were £63 8s., congregational collections, £63 5s. The disposition of the Bazaar Fund has still to be made.

In the election of officers and committee, the Rev. H. S. Tayler was appointed President, and the Treasurer, Mr. Walter Hudson, and Secretary, the Rev. B. C. Constable, were re-elected.

Cordial votes of thanks were passed to the retiring President, Mr. J. Hall Brooks, the officers, and the preacher.

The Public Meeting.

After tea in the school-room a public meeting was held, Mr. Thomas Worthington presiding.

The Rev. H. S. Tayler, who was the first speaker, referred to the past of the Dean Row Chapel, and its renovation, as illustrating how one church could help another. He hoped that the Union would always be ready to lend a helping hand wherever it was needed. In glancing over the history of Dean Row he noticed the names of Worthington, Robert Hyde Greg, and the Rev. J. Brooks, and he read with interest the account of a sermon by the Rev. J. J. Tayler. In the course of that sermon reference was made to the extraordinary catholicity of spirit of their puritan forefathers, and he rejoiced to think that that same catholicity of spirit still maintained its hold in their various churches in East Cheshire. But they, as a church, were confronted by considerable difficulties; they found considerable prejudice on the part of the community outside. It might not be there in Dean Row or the district near, but they found it in some of the large towns, notwithstanding the progress of thought, and the wonderful light that was spreading over the country through science and fearless utterances in the Church of England. They found a considerable amount of prejudice on the part of the average man in the street, and this would have to be overcome before they could expect to see the people gather more in their churches and chapels. The question was whether their Union was doing all it might do to overcome this prejudice, and to increase the centres of worship in populous towns. Various things might be done which he felt would help to break down this prejudice.

The Rev. H. Fisher Short spoke of the visions which he said some of the young men of the church had, visions of a larger church, fulfilling a larger mission, and sending forth a larger influence. Revivals were in the air, and those who saw visions asked why not a Unitarian revival? They wanted enthusiasm in the church. They must not be discouraged. They loved their faith, and they believed in it. They felt it was a happy, a hopeful, and a satisfying faith. They felt that their Unitarianism, rightly viewed and understood, was just; that they had indeed a gospel to preach. They believed in the great principles of liberty of truth, and of faith; they believed in God, and the nearness of God. There was a new spirit entering into theology and religion, and that was beautifully brought out by their afternoon preacher. It was the spiritual view of life, the putting aside of material things and realising in the inner life a world which thrilled with God. If they made that the dominant note, then he thought the vision of which he had spoken would be realised. But before they went outside there must be a revival in their own church, and they must consider the best ways and means of bringing that about.

The Revs. W. G. Price and H. B. Smith also spoke; and votes of thanks brought the meeting to a close.

Sheffield: Upper Thorpe.—On Sunday evening last a special musical recital which had been arranged by Mr. W. R. Stevenson (organist) was given at the conclusion of the ordinary service. The annual congregational meeting was recently held and was well attended. Attention was called to the loss the congregation had recently sustained through the decease of Mrs. Allison.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham: Newhall-hill.—Preaching last Sunday evening on "The Problem of our Towns and Cities," the Rev. Thomas Paxton gave some startling figures as to housing in Birmingham. Among other items, he stated that there were in the city between thirty and forty thousand houses of the back-to-back type. We have too long been accustomed, he said, to think of God in connection with mansions above, too seldom have thought of Him in homes below.

Blackpool: South Shore.—A very successful sale of work organised by the Sewing Society was held on February 15 and 16, opened by Councillor W. Healey, J.P., of Heywood. Mr. Thomas Kenyon presided, and the Revs. Robert McGee and T. Leyland also took part in the proceedings. The object in view was the reduction of the debt on the new building. The net amount realised was £156 19s. 2d., which has been paid to the building fund.

Bradford, Yorkshire.—A new organ was opened and dedicated at Chapel-lane Chapel last Sunday, and there were very large congregations at the three services. The organ bears the following inscription:—"This organ, originally the gift of the Dawson family, was reopened February 26, 1905, having been restored and enlarged by Mrs. W. Percy Sladen, in loving memory of the late Mr. John Dawson, who was born at Royds Hall, July 7, 1809, and died at Northbrook Park, Devon, February 14, 1898." In addition to special anthems by the choir, morning and evening, there was a musical service in the afternoon, and the excellent qualities of the new instrument were well brought out by the organist (Mr. W. Clarkson Barker). At the morning service the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, in his dedicatory sermon, dealt with the elevating power of music. Since the first organ was erected in the church over 150 years had elapsed. Still, some of the sweet notes which sustained the hymns of praise of former generations were heard by the worshippers that day, for what was best in the original organ had been retained and embodied in the new instrument. This was symbolical of their faith; while accepting every new truth that dawned on the expanding mind of man, they were careful to retain all those great principles which past generations had found helpful. They rejoiced that the organ in its renovated form was the gift of a representative of one of those who worshipped on that spot when the first house of prayer was opened there in 1719. That fact gave historical continuity to their cause which might be regarded as a precious possession. A very large audience assembled again on Monday evening, when an organ recital was given by Mr. W. Clarkson Barker. Hymns were sung by the congregation to well-known tunes, and the choir, assisted by Miss Bertha Rigg, gave a fine selection of sacred music. Another member of the Dawson family, Mr. M. S. Dawson, of Melbourne Hall, has recently defrayed the expense of a much-needed improvement in the apse of the chapel.

Bury.—On Sunday, February 19, services were conducted by the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at Bank-street in the morning, and at Chesham in the evening. Mr. Walters' lecture in the Athenæum Hall on Monday evening on "Unitarianism: A Prophecy of the Church of the Future," was delivered to an audience of upwards of 300. Further contributions to the subject of the lecture were made by the chairman, Alderman Thomas Holt, J.P., and by the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans and Mr. T. Rigby in connection with the vote of thanks to the lecturer, and by Rev. J. M. Bass and Mr. W. Dearden in conveying thanks to the chairman.

Dudley.—The Year-Book for 1905 of the Old Meeting House gives full particulars of the congregation and its various institutions, with a list of members, and the balance-sheet for the past year. There is also a letter from the Rev. Alfred Thompson, who entered on his ministry January 3, 1904. The report shows good progress and a sounder financial position, and the minister's letter concludes with these words:—"With an inheritance ampler, and an outlook broader than that of our sires, our responsibilities are proportionately heavier; but whatever our advance on their position we have need of one another even as they had; nor can we, without imperilling our highest and purest culture, turn away from our many opportunities for mutual helpfulness and brotherly love.

Dundee.—On Sunday, February 19, anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. H. Williamson, who on the following evening presided over the annual service in the church hall. He gave a short history of his ministerial work, and a very pleasant evening was spent; several of the office-bearers and members of the congregation also made helpful speeches. The managers have in view a scheme for renovating the church buildings, which are beginning to show signs of wear and tear both outside and inside. The cost will be somewhat considerable, but with the help of friends it is hoped the financial difficulty will be overcome.

Halifax.—The annual meeting of the Northgate-end congregation was held on Thursday, February 23, when the report and treasurer's statement were adopted, and the meeting endorsed votes of thanks to the Revs. F. E. Millson and P. E. Richards for their services during the year, to the organist, choir, and the officers of the chapel. Mr. J. Sayar presided. The congregation has decided to hold a three days' bazaar in April, and they will be glad of any help from former members now living in other towns, and from any other friends.

Leeds: Holbeck.—At the congregational annual meeting on February 20, reports and statements were presented which bore testimony to a busy and successful year's work. The membership of the church, allowing for losses, showed a slight increase, while a gratifying addition of forty-nine names had been made to the school. By the bazaar held in November £240 had been cleared. A deficit on the current account had been met, a loan of £100 repaid (in connection with the electric lighting of the church), and a balance of £82 remained. A revised set of rules for the congregation were discussed and adopted. The chairman, Mr. J. T. Kitchen, Messrs. Reason, Smith and Senior, and the Rev. W. R. Shanks addressed the meeting. Special votes of thanks were passed to Mr. Kitchen for his loan of £100, without interest; to the Ladies' Sewing Society, the collectors, and appreciative references were made to the services of the minister and his wife.

London: Peckham.—On Monday evening a meeting was held to take farewell of the Rev. George Carter as pastor of the congregation with which he has been connected (with a short interval during which he was minister at Bermondsey) for nearly forty years. Farewell services were conducted by him on the previous day. There was a good attendance on Monday, including many friends from a distance. After a social hour the chair was taken by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who paid a cordial tribute to the long and faithful services rendered by Mr. Carter, and urged the congregation to spare no efforts to render his labours permanently memorable in that neighbourhood. It was gratifying to know that, thanks to the generous sympathy of friends in different parts of London, some moderate provision had been made to lessen the anxieties of his declining years. The secretary, Mr. W. J. Cooley, read letters of apology from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Mr. S. S. Taylor, Mr. David Martineau, and others, all testifying to the high esteem felt for Mr. Carter. On behalf of the congregation and friends, Mr. J. Bredall, a former member, then presented Mr. Carter with an album of autograph greetings, together with a purse of gold. Mr. Bredall gratefully acknowledged the stimulus and help he had received, as a convert from orthodoxy, under Mr. Carter's liberal teachings. Mr. Carter, in replying, spoke with much feeling, and again urged, as he had done on Sunday evening, that all his friends would help to build up the congregation into the fullest possible strength. He was not leaving the neighbourhood, so that if any pastoral help were needed before a new minister was appointed, he would gladly be their helper still. He was grateful for all the help he had received, and specially thanked Mr. Cox, who had for many years most generously served as organist. Mr. Carter said he had loved his work there, and put his heart into it. He commended them all very earnestly to the divine blessing and care. Short addresses were also given by Mr. N. M. Tayler and the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, F. W. Stanley, F. Allen, and the meeting closed with hymn and benediction.

Manchester: Pendleton.—In connection with this Church four religious services were held in the public hall, Irlams-o'-th'-Height, on Wednesdays, January 25, February 8 and 15. The services were conducted by the Rev. N. Anderton, who delivered addresses on the following subjects:—"A Free Church," "Belief in God," "Belief in Jesus," and "Belief in Man." The services were held with a view of making more widely known the form of worship at the Pendleton Church. The average attendance was about sixty.

Pentre.—Dr. Warschauer, of Clifton, lectured here under the auspices of the S. E. Wales Unitarian Society, on Tuesday evening, February 28 on "Agnosticism and Religion." There was a good, attendance in spite of the all-absorbing attention given in the district to the Revival. One interesting feature was the fact that the audience was in the main made up of men, among whom there was a large sprinkling of teachers from the elementary schools. Questions were invited and answered. The Rev. D. R. Davies occupied the chair.

Poole.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on February 22. Mr. C. Carter, J.P., in the chair. The balance-sheet was very satisfactory. A hopeful spirit pervades the congregation under the ministry of the Rev. James Burton.

Preston.—On Sunday, February 19, the Rev. J. E. Manning, by the kindness of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, conducted special services. His subjects were, "What do Unitarians believe about God," and "How the Doctrine of the Trinity came to be believed." There were very good congregations, including a number of strangers, and the sermons were intently listened to. On the following Tuesday evening the annual congregational tea-party was held, and after tea the chair was taken by Mr. Councillor Parkinson, who spoke of the pleasure of Mr. Manning's visit, and remarked that in his recollection the congregation and Sunday-school had never been in so satisfactory a condition all round. Mr. Manning addressed the meeting on the distinctive points of Unitarianism, and eloquently appealed for a whole-hearted devotion to the chapel. The chairman then moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Manning for his sermons and speech, and to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for its kindness. Special music by the choir added to the enjoyment of the meeting, and enriched the Sunday services.

Richmond.—The annual meeting of the members of the Free Church, Ormond-road, was held on Thursday, February 23, at 8 p.m., in the church. The report and financial statement for the year ending December 31, 1904, were passed. The retiring committee were re-elected for the current year. The proceedings of the evening were entirely of a business character.

Stockton-on-Tees.—On Thursday, February 23, an At Home was held in the school-room by Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Watson, and a most enjoyable evening was spent. The proceeds were for the Church funds.

Trowbridge.—The annual congregational meeting was held in the Conigre Chapel school-room on Wednesday, February 22. There was a large attendance, and much interest was manifested in the proceedings. Reports, all of a satisfactory character, were read by the treasurer, trustees, Sunday-school, and Benevolent Society managers. A project to introduce a new hymn book was deferred for a year. Allusion was made to Mr. Wain's successful classes for young people, and Mr. W. Walker eulogised his work as a minister, saying that he seemed to be the natural successor of the late Rev. Samel Martin.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A PRELIMINARY programme of the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, to be held at Geneva, Aug. 28-31, together with a letter from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, giving particulars as to proposed English parties, fares, &c., we shall publish in full next week.

WHEN the two volumes of the "Life and Letters of James Martineau," by Dr. Drummond and Professor Upton, were published in the autumn of 1902, the price of 30s. net was prohibitive to many who were eager to possess the work. The remainder of the edition has now been acquired by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and it is matter for congratulation that in this Centenary year this record of a great life, with its rich store of Dr. Martineau's letters, and Mr. Upton's masterly exposition of his philosophy, can be purchased for 12s. 6d. Not many more than a hundred copies are available, and we advise friends who wish to secure one to do so at once.

THE new Centenary Life of Dr. Martineau, which was announced last year by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association as in preparation by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, is now in the press, and will be published shortly. The work, of which the original idea was something of the form of the English Men of Letters series, has grown to a substantial volume, and will be found to be a masterly study of the greatest value, though by no means superseding the original "Life and Letters." The title of Mr. Carpenter's book is, "James Martineau, Theologian and Teacher: A Study of His Life and Thought." The published price will be 7s. 6d.

THE meetings of the Evangelical Free Church Council, held in Manchester this week, have been very largely attended, over 2,000 delegates from all parts of the country being present, 400 more than at any previous meeting. The address of the President, Dr. Horton, was on "The Opportunity of the Free Churches." It included an aspiration after unity, an uncompromising attack on the Education Acts, a plea for simpler and more concrete preaching in the language of the people, and a suggestion that the churches ought to make the social needs of the age their special care. This was strongly enforced on Wednesday by an address by the Rev. C. Silvester Horne on the Institutional Church, and a striking speech which followed by a young Wesleyan minister, the Rev. J. E. Rattenbury, of Nottingham, whom the President afterwards greeted as a worthy successor to Hugh Price Hughes. "God's house," he said, "ought to be the people's house."

THE Report of the Council forms a bulky pamphlet. The General Secretary, the Rev. Thomas Law, has gained a reputation in the political world second only to that of Dr. Clifford in connection with the Nonconformist campaign against the Education Acts. The Council itself is a force in the country, representing as it does nearly 900 local Councils. In their name it speaks on many topics, and bears witness to their intense convictions. The report deals with various questions of social reform: it aims, for instance, at providing a programme for the army of temperance workers throughout the country. At this time, when revival is in the air, we are prepared to find a good deal of attention given to the subject of missions.

THE Council employs its own corps of Evangelists to propagate "the simple Gospel." They act with the support of the different churches, with the prestige of a great organisation. They help to spread the belief that few things are wanted in the religious life, perhaps incidentally encouraging the idea that clear thinking is not one of them. Similar in character is the work of the Mission van. Very useful work seems to have been done by aid of the van in several villages, and in more than one instance a village Free Church has been started as the result.

To Dr. Horton's presidential address to the Free Church Council at Manchester The Times of Wednesday devoted a leading article, of praise in the first instance, and then naturally of very vehement dissent from his views on the Education and other public questions. The praise, as the more unusual and interesting, we reproduce here :—

Dr. Horton does not personally belong to what may be called the political section of Nonconformity. Himself a scholar, endowed with the trained historical sense, he can raise his vision beyond the dust and heat of daily controversy. Hence it is not surprising to find him setting forth a lofty ideal of what the Free Churches may become, and including in it an aspiration for their reunion with the other Churches that exist side by side with them. With his general protest against both sacerdotalism and Erastianism, we imagine most moderate Churchmen will agree. They will not deny, either, the great opportunities of national service which Dr. Horton claims for the Free Churches; and they will fully recognise the immense part which those Churches have played in the religious life of the people.

THE following letter appears in this week's Christian World :—

SIR,—In your issue of March 2 Dr. Torrey is reported as asking, "Why don't the Unitarians answer what I say?"

I am not a Unitarian, but I do know that when Dr. Torrey made his unprovoked and unwarrantable attacks in this city, upon the morality of Unitarians, he was instantly answered, and that most effectively, by the Unitarian minister, Dr. Warschauer.

It may be that he has never explicitly spoken of Unitarians as "impostors and lunatics," but he has never denied, and cannot deny, having said again and again that they have rejected the Deity of Christ "because they loved sin," and "Unitarianism as a rule is not because of intellectual difficulties, but because of moral difficulties."

When his rabid utterances on Unitarianism resulted in his being challenged to prove them, he sought a congenial refuge in the pathetic plea of want of time. Imagine a man who finds time for the systematic slandering of a religious people not having time to prove so much as the integrity of his intentions, let alone the accuracy of his statements!

How anyone outside the ranks of the narrowest bibliolatry can support this type of "evangelism" passes my comprehension.—Yours, &c., HUGH C. WALLACE.

David Thomas Memorial (Congregational) Church, Bristol, March 2.

THE report read at the fifth annual meeting of the National Council of Adult Schools, held at the end of January, shows a steady development of the movement. There are now 900 schools and nearly 77,000 members, of whom more than 56,000 are men, and nearly 18,000 are women; leaving some 2,500 juniors (either lads or girls under 18 years of age). The principal increase during the sixteen months which have elapsed since the last report—an increase of nearly 17,000 members and of 138 schools—has taken place in the Bristol, Birmingham, and Yorkshire zones of influence, London and Leicester following close after them. Some discussion on the practicability of carrying the movement into Wales took place, but the matter was wisely left to the able and active association of Bristol and district.

Many friends will be glad that the series of the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong's sermons, published by the Liverpool Booksellers' Company, as "Sermons for the Day," are being continued for the present year. The February sermon is on "The Last Thing before Dying." Its powerful appeal comes home with new depth of feeling now that one remembers how beautifully the close of his own life illustrated its great truth. The March sermon on "The Co-equal Dignity of the Sexes" was preached last year on June 19. The ideal man and the ideal woman, Mr. Armstrong said, are destined to reach one ideal of humanity, one perfection and balance of human character, but by different paths of development. The germ from which the character is to grow is not the same in each. Thus he stated his conception of the destined growth:—

> I do not believe that courage, truthfulness, and steadfastness are to be the man's alone, while purity and gentleness and sympathy are to be left to women. Nor do I believe that purity and gentleness and sympathy are to be the woman's alone, while courage, truthfulness, and steadfastness are to be left to men. I hold that to all these graces every child of God is called. But I do believe that the beginning of manly character is in the more virile elements, and that the beginning of womanly character is in the gentler ones. You cannot begin to build a boy's soul to soundness if he is a coward: that is even a more hopeless flaw in him than in his sister. You cannot begin to train a girl's soul to soundness if she is without tenderness; that is even a more hopeless flaw in her than in her brother.
> It is with spiritual things as it is with physical. Unless the foundation of a man's physique be stalwart, the softer graces will never endow him with beauty. Unless the physique of the woman be gracious, nobility of feature will never give her charm.
> And so we have them peopling the world and subduing it, the two differently mixed types of our human kind—always diverse, yet both alike called to the same perfection.

The Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit is entitled "God's Ship Earth: A Meditation on Board Ship in the Pacific Ocean." The sermon, he says elsewhere, was preached in substance on the Sierra, Oct. 16, and on the Sononia, Nov. 13, last year, and afterwards adapted to home use.

The March number of the Theologisch Tijdschrift opens with an elaborate article on "How the Will Works in Man," by Dr. C. H. Kindermann, of Leiden. Dr. L. Knappert follows with an article, "Anabaptistica," no less elaborate, dealing with the Anabaptists of the Netherlands in the period 1530-66. Before the book notices there is a little German interpolation on a question of textual criticism, by Dr. G. Schläger, of Celle, arguing that in the original text of the Book of Acts it is not likely that the terms "Jesus" and "Christ" occurred together as a composite personal name.

In the March Coming Day the Rev. J. Page Hopps publishes the address on "The Unitarian's Case in the Light of To-day's Thought Concerning God and the Bible," which he gave recently at a Postal Mission Conference at Essex Hall; and also one of his Little Portland-street discourses, "Glad to See Jesus."

We congratulate Mr. Roy Meldrum, who is a scholar of St. John's College, Cambridge, on his success in winning the Sir William Browne medal for a Latin ode. The competition for this medal is open to all resident undergraduates of the University. Mr. Meldrum is a grandson of the late Mr. Richard Keating, of Nottingham, and both on his mother's and his father's side closely connected with the High Pavement congregation.

The Rev. William Rounseville Alger, of whom a memorial notice appeared in a recent number of the Christian Register is probably most widely known by his elaborate work, "A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life," of which fourteen editions have been published. To his enthusiasm was due the publication in 1858, in America in the first instance, of the volume of Martineau's essays, "Studies of Christianity," and he was the author of a volume of translations from the Persian and other Eastern languages, "The Poetry of the Orient" (1855), and other works, including "The Friendship of Women" and "The Genius of Solitude," which had a wide circulation. Mr. Algar, who was of Huguenot origin, worked as a boy for five years in a cotton-mill, but succeeded in making his way to college. When he graduated from Harvard Divinity School in 1847, T. W. Higginson and Grindall Reynolds were among his class-mates. He took rank among the first of Unitarian preachers, and was a fearless champion of the Anti-Slavery cause.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

Sir,—Will you allow us to give notice, in consequence of the death of our lamented colleague, the hon. secretary, Mr. Cogan Conway, that the next meeting of managers will be held on Wednesday, April 12. Applications for benefit should, therefore, be in the hands of the treasurer, Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, 63, Bishopsgate-street Within, London, E.C., before that date: and ministers proposing to insure this spring are asked to communicate with Mr. Clarke, from whom all information may be obtained, without delay.

J. Estlin Carpenter, Chairman.
Howard Chatfeild Clarke, Treasurer.

THE JOWETT LECTURES.

The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter gave the first of his course of Jowett Lectures at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, on Wednesday evening. The subject of the course of ten lectures is, "The Earliest Sources of the Life of Jesus; a Study of the Literary Relations and the Historical Value of the First Three Gospels."

Mr. Claude Montefiore, who took the chair, said that he felt it a great honour to be asked to preside at the first of that course of Jowett Lectures. The subject was one of the profoundest interest. To treat of it three qualifications were essential, immense knowledge, sympathy with the subject, and impartiality. These they would find pre-eminently in their lecturer.

Mr. Carpenter, at the beginning of his lecture, said that forty-five years ago that very month a book appeared which made a profound sensation, and marked a distinct era of advance in the theological thought of this country. In that book, Essays and Reviews, the last of the essays was by Jowett, who there laid it down that in the interpretation of Scripture the same principles must be applied to the Old and New Testaments as to any other book The same maxim had been uttered a quarter of a century earlier by the late Dr. Martineau, but in 1835 English theology was not ripe for the enunciation of such a principle. To them, in the present day, it seemed simple enough, but in 1860 it made a great sensation. In the previous year a still more revolutionary book, Darwin's Origin of Species, had appeared, and that also had its effect on the interpretation of history. It was felt that a great historical personality must be studied in relation to his surroundings and the age in which he lived. Renan's Vie de Jésus, published in 1863, and Strauss's second Life of Jesus, a year later, gave a great impulse to such studies, and even in this country the effect was felt. Mr. Carpenter noted as of the highest significance the article on the Gospels by Dr. Abbott in the "Encyclopædia Britannica" published in 1879, which he suggested should be read by all those who did not yet know it, as the best preparation for the work they were to do in those lectures. He then described the work of Baur and his theory of tendency in the early church, and showed that, however illuminating that had been, Baur's position as such was no longer held by any scholars; so much new material was now in their hands, such as the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," and other ancient literature re-discovered, which necessarily suggested fresh points of view. Much work had been done on the Messianic literature, and in the vast range of the Oriental religions, and also in the study of religious conditions under the empire, all of which clearly had influenced the growth of the Gospel tradition, and left their traces in the Gospels as they now had them. Mr. Carpenter illustrated in the most interesting manner the method by which the oral teaching had taken form, and had in time produced the written material from which the Gospels had been composed. The lecture next Wednesday is on "The Literary Problem."

THE CHRIST OF PAUL.

VI.

THE PERSON OF JESUS.

(c) OF the mode of Christ's entry into this world the apostle says nothing. He describes him as being of Davidic descent (cp. Rom. i. 3, ix. 5), but it must remain uncertain whether this belief rested on any personal knowledge, on general report, or on a supposed conformity to prophecy. The phraseology which he employs has been thought to mean that he traced the lineage of Jesus through his father: and if this be not pressed to exclude the doctrine of the miraculous birth, the statement that "God sent forth his son, born of a woman" (Gal. iv. 5), must not be invoked to confirm it. As on other details in the personal career of Jesus, so on this, the Apostle is silent. Nor does he further describe the process by which the pre-existent Christ "emptied himself." He parted, we are left to infer, with the freedom and splendour of the heavenly life; but there is no hint that he surrendered any of those qualities or powers which constituted the true personality of the celestial manhood. What he was in knowledge and love and holiness as Son of God, he remained as son of David. Into the particulars of the infancy or growth of such a being Paul does not enter. These are not the questions that engage his thought. He accepts the contrast in its breadth and simplicity, and its moral grandeur awakes his passionate devotion. The condescension of this radiant spirit is an act of supreme self-devotion, which thrills every fibre of his heart. The effect is heightened when he reflects what was its object. The Son of God was sent in the likeness of sinful flesh for our deliverance; he wore our nature, but with a difference; he could suffer weakness, and death had him in his power; but the lusts which conquer us did not beset him, he "knew no sin" (2 Cor. v. 21). This statement belongs to the same large class of generalisations which gather round the Apostle's view of Jesus. It is not historical, it is, so to speak, theoretic;* it is a necessary element in his conception both of Christ's person and his work, and it is needless to inquire to which it more closely belongs. Paul's attention is fixed rather on the general aim and purport of his life; here, even more than in that upper sphere, "he pleased not himself"; he chose poverty, he bore obloquy—"the reproaches of them that reproached thee fell upon me" (Ps. lxviii. 10, Rom. xv. 3)—till compassion for man and obedience to God brought him to the cross. That single word sums up for Paul the uttermost sacrifice, the uttermost love. And in the sacrifice and the love both God and his Son have a share.

(d) One final necessity fell upon the Christ ere he could resume his heavenly life. Scripture required that he should be raised on the third day (1 Cor. xv. 4). Of the resurrection of the fleshly body Paul says no word; he tells of no wondrous change; nor does he speak of any empty tomb. We are left to infer how he might have supplemented his story in view of latter-day difficulties. But between the hour of dissolution and the re-entry into the world of spirit, what destiny awaited the dead Messiah? Could it be said of him the moment after frailty and pain had yielded to the doom allotted in every other case to sin, that he was then alive, living to God (Rom. v. 10)? The spirit of the ordinary man went down below; there, in the underworld, was the region of the departed. Thither, then, even the man "from heaven" must fare; and in the "abyss" (Rom. x. 7, a word introduced into a quotation from Deut. xxx. 11-14 to make it apply to Christ) he waited till God should raise him from the dead. As in the apostolic preaching, so in the letters of Paul, this is always interpreted as a divine act. Christ does not raise himself; he is raised. "He was crucified through weakness, yet he liveth through the power of God" (2 Cor. xiii. 4). The disciple "believes on him that raised Jesus our Lord from the dead" (Rom. iv. 24). "Jesus our Lord" is an almost unique combination, but the testimony to the great event as having its source in God, its operation by him, so pervades the language of the Apostle as to need no further illustration. What, however, is meant by the phrase "Jesus our Lord"?

(4) The bodily life of Messiah formed a brief transit between two vast and undetermined periods – the age of the heavenly manhood, prior to his descent to earth, and the age of exalted lordship after he had resumed his spirit form. It was the essence of Paul's message to "preach Christ Jesus as lord" (2 Cor. iv. 5); to make the great affirmation "Jesus is Lord" needed the aid of the holy spirit (1 Cor. xii. 3). The title was no doubt derived by him from the cycle of Jewish ideas about Messiah, and it carried with it the "seat at God's right hand" (Rom. viii. 34), in accordance with Psalm cx. 1. By this authority judgment was passed within the church (1 Cor. v. 4, 2 Cor. x. 8, xiii. 10); his will and word are the final ground of rule and faith (1 Cor. vii. 10, 1 Thess. iv. 15). It is in this character that Jesus Christ becomes the medium for the reign of "grace through righteousness unto eternal life" (Rom. v. 21); it is in him that God bestows eternal life as his free gift (Rom. vi. 23). Well may men look to him for aid, for he transcends all distinctions, and is "Lord of all" (Rom. x. 12):—

> And is rich unto all that call upon him; for, whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved:

Where the passage from Joel ii. 32, which is also quoted in Acts ii. 21, is applied to Christ. The Christian, therefore, belongs to his Lord, and all his life is consecrated to his service (Rom. xiv. 7, 8).

> For none of us liveth to himself, and none dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; or whether we die, we die unto the Lord. Whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's.

This sovereignty, of souls, however, did not belong originally to the man of heaven. It was the consequence and completion of his work of redemption, the goal to which the earthly life of humiliation was the needful prelude; for the Apostle thus justifies the demand for the disciple's devotion (Rom. xiv. 9):—

> For to this end Christ died, and lived again, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living:

and in language more emphatic still he places his elevation in inseparable connection with his suffering (Phil. ii. 8-11):—

> Being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross. Wherefore also God highly exalted him, and gave unto him the name which is above every name; that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things on earth, and things under the earth, and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

Whatever dignity Christ here possesses it has been conferred upon him; it does not belong to him by intrinsic nature. Moved by his perfect compliance with the divine will God lifts him into the loftiest eminence. This is the counterpart of that equality with God which he had refrained from snatching; now he is qualified by obedience to receive it. The Apostle sees him imaginatively enthroned as the great object of universal homage, in lieu of the contumely once heaped upon him. He expresses this in terms of ancient prophecy. When Cyrus was triumphantly advancing to Babylon the Hebrew seer discerned in the impending fall of the proud city the demonstration of the sovereignty of Yahweh, and in his name he summoned the nations to allegiance to the only True (Isa. xlv. 22, 23)—

> Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God and there is none else. I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every knee shall swear.*

These words suggest to the Apostle the height of Messiah's glory. Thrones and dominions, principalities and powers, the dwellers in the three zones of heaven and earth and the dim subterranean regions of the dead, all own his sway—a submission which redounds to the ultimate majesty of the God and Father who had thus made him Lord. There is, then, even in this seat of splendour, a distinction between the source and the recipient of authority; and in the solemn profession with which Paul marks off Christian truth from Gentile error, this is once more emphasised (1 Cor. viii. 5, 6)—

> For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or on earth; as there are gods many and lords many; yet to us there is one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we unto him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, through whom are all things, and we through him.

In ancient days prophetic thought had been content to confess one being as "God of gods and Lord of lords" (Deut. x. 17). The sovereignty thus formerly regarded as part of the divine prerogative has now been delegated to a second person at his side. What scope, however, is allotted to his rule? What objects are included in the phrase "all

* It was already part of the Pharisaic doctrine of the Messiah, for the pre-Christian author of the "Psalms of Solomon."

* It is characteristic of the elastic conceptions of the Apostle that he should use this same passage (in a free quotation from the Greek version) to establish the doctrine of the final judgment of God (Rom. xiv. 11, 12).

things" which issue from the one God and come through the one Lord? Does Paul thus ascribe a cosmic power to Christ, and was he in any sense the agent or instrument of creation? Such a function is undoubtedly ascribed to him in Col. i. 16, but it may be questioned whether it is now within the Apostle's view, for no other passage in our six letters confirms it. The comprehensive neuter, "all things" has very various applications—as a few illustrative passages may show:—

(Rom. viii. 32.) He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not also with him freely give us all things?

(1 Cor. xi. 12.) For as the woman is of the man, so is the man also by the woman; but all things are of God.

(1 Cor. xii. 6.) And there are diversities of workings, but the same God, who worketh all things in all.

(2 Cor. iv. 15.) For all things are for your sakes.

(2 Cor. v. 18.) But all things are of God (cp. 1 Cor. xi. 12).

(Phil. iii. 21.) According to the working whereby he [the Lord Jesus Christ] is able even to subject all things unto himself.

In none of these instances does the phrase mean the visible universe of rocks, trees, cattle, stars. It designates (among other meanings) the vicissitudes of life, the blessings or graces imparted by God, the operations of the spirit on the heart and soul of the believer, the powers that are subdued beneath the heavenly Lord. Now it is in this last-named function that all things are said to be through Jesus Christ. This limitation really excludes the cosmic application, for even though the man "of heaven" should be conceived to have preceded creation in those timeless depths, he was not yet Lord. Only after his death and resurrection did Jesus acquire the privilege of transmitting the Father's gifts to the believer, and it is these which, issuing from the eternal source of all salvation, are communicated in actual experience to the church by the life-giving fellowship of spirit first realised in Christ.

(5) It is among the prerogatives of the Lord Jesus Christ, as is seen in the words just quoted from Phil. iii. 21 to "subject all things unto himself." His sovereignty will include even the bodies of the saints, for the great change which will fit both dead and living for his glorious advent will be his work. But the dominion which he claims will not be undisputed. The "God of this world" has many votaries; and a whole band of superhuman powers follows in his train. Such are the "rulers" who ignorantly connived at Messiah's death, destined ere long to "come to nought" (1 Cor. ii. 6, 8); such are the principalities, authorities, and powers, which set themselves in opposition to his sway (1 Cor. xv. 24). Dim figures these, hardly more clearly outlined in Ephes. vi. 12, which serve to give imaginative expression to the great conflict between the evil and the good. As Paul conceives it, the struggle is not endless. The royalty bestowed upon the Son is wielded by him to bring it to a close. He is the agent to whom God has entrusted the colossal task of suppressing every rival, and mastering every foe. The details of the enterprise are not revealed. One by one the principalities are overthrown, the authorities are shaken, and the powers fall. Last to endure the fate it has so often inflicted, is Death. But when sin is dislodged from the heavenly places death can hold out no more; its strength is broken, and death itself dies. Flushed with success, triumphant on every side, will the Son now "snatch" at that equality which had once loomed before his view? Not to such a close does the mighty drama of the universe march forward. As at the beginning of the redemption process the Son "emptied himself" for the sake of man, so now he lays praise and honour and majesty and dominion, spoils of the holy war, at the feet of God; resigns the command entrusted to him, and submits to "be subjected to him that did subject all things unto him, that God may be all in all" (1 Cor. xv. 28). Beyond this stupendous climax the Apostle does not project his gaze into the timeless future. The end has come, and the Messiah's work is over. He has established the universal rule of God; creation no more groans and travails in its pain; the world returns to its Maker fair and free as he designed it; his undivided supremacy is realised; and the song which Paul overheard rises from the lips of the redeemed (Rom. xi. 33-36):—

O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past tracing out. . . .

For of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things. To him be the glory for ever. Amen.

MUSINGS.

By A Minister.

XVII.

I was fond in early days of dipping into commonplace books. A commonplace book is a kind of literary biography, and, if you think of it, the story of the mind's progress in pursuit of learning ought not to be of less interest than the story of the body's adventures in search of wealth or pleasure. Qui mores hominum multorum vidit et urbes is very well as the exordium of an Odyssey, but he has seen little of the world who knows only the men and cities of his own time, and has never lived in thought with the ages that are gone. It is pleasant, therefore, to have even the rough jottings of a scholar's wanderings in the world of letters. Dr. Johnson thought that the names of the schools or masters of great men ought to be preserved. Then, to do full justice, we ought to keep in mind the names of their nurses, for these also have had no small part in their education. Virgil, by the way, gives the name of his hero's nurse, his companion in exile, though he makes no mention of the Orbilius who taught him in Troy. It is not through their schoolmasters that the learned become illustrious. A student's real history begins when he puts himself to school, sets himself voluntary tasks, and does not spare the salutary rod, and his commonplace book is a register of that severer discipline in which the willing pupil and the exacting teacher are one.

Such a register was the diary in which Casaubon for seventeen years recorded his daily studies. The MS. of the "Ephemerides" was found in the library of Canterbury Cathedral, and was published, I believe, about fifty years ago. I remember little more than the often-used Latin sentences in which he notes the hours given now to reading and now to prayer, and urges himself to greater effort both in toil and devotion. They are something like the entries in Macaulay's Journal, running on for weeks together: "My task"; "Did my task"; "My task, and something over"; "Wrote fast and long"; "Wrote my regular quantity." In both lives there was the same stern love of labour, the same strict use of time.

Southey filled many volumes with the gathered fruits of wide reading. His "Doctor" is little more than a commonplace book thrown into narrative and dialogue, but the little more is touched with genius, and the connecting passages are full of quips and cranks and breaks and turns and interludes and surprises, with much mystification of the reader, and laboured concealment of the writer. On the first page of my edition was a portrait of the author, his back turned broadly on the public. Southey's humour was often ponderous; Macaulay thought him an insufferable jester; and in fiction he was hopelessly awkward in the introduction of character and scene; but the mind which threw off "The Three Bears," the delight of every nursery, and threw them into the midst of solemn pages written for solemn elders, was not wanting in playful fancy. The publishing tribe long ago plucked away this little flower, and the parent stem is left to wither unseen. No one, I suppose, reads "The Doctor" now.

It is easier to make a commonplace book than to make judicious use of it, for a scholar may show his scholarship, but must not parade it. The revival of letters led the way to a somewhat pedantic display of learning. The pages of Jeremy Taylor, for example, are thickly strewn with citations from ancient authors, from Homer to Prudentius. How he came by them has been the wonder of many readers, and why he showered them upon unlearned readers the wonder of many more. It was the fashion of his time, a fashion upon which Milton delivers his mind very plainly when he speaks of "marginal stuffings" and "horse-loads of citations." But Milton also had his commonplace book. It was discovered some two hundred years after his death. Its extracts are from eighty different authors, and consist chiefly of historical facts. To the better storehouse of memory he entrusted that wealth of old poetic thought which afterwards enriched his own verse with classical allusion.

I would not too much exalt that which, after all, is largely made up of other men's labours, but I see in the commonplace book a hidden piety which moves my admiration. It is more than a bare chronicle of regulated industry. It reveals the workings of a conscience, not the less moral for being literary, rendering account to itself in secret. It is one of the books which are no books, but I would give it a place not much below the shelf which holds the devotions and confessions of saints. I say this the more sincerely because, for myself, I would as soon post a ledger as keep a diary in any form.

There has been much speculation over the books and parchments which St. Paul left at Troas, and was anxious to recover. About the books I have no conjecture, but the Apostle was a man of "much learning," and of the parchments I could, therefore, hazard an explanation.

RECENT BOOKS ON THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

One noteworthy and very valuable result of the "higher criticism" has been to give an immense impetus to the study of the philosophy of religion among Protestants. A student of the University of Aberdeen was asked several years ago how he harmonised the teachings of Dr. Bain with Christian Theism, and his reply was that Dr. Bain's philosophy was good so far as it went, but that, of course, it could not reach the grand truths of "revelation," and hence it was the natural and proper thing to go, not to philosophy, but to the professors of Biblical criticism and exegesis for necessary light on the fundamental questions of theistic belief. From this grievous misuse of the Bible as a sort of supplement to philosophy it came about, as Dr. Martineau remarked, that half a century ago Protestants were very far behind the Roman Catholics in thorough acquaintance with philosophical literature, and even during the lifetime of the Metaphysical Society it was the Catholic divines, such as Cardinal Manning, Father Dalgairns, and Dr. W. G. Ward, who were Dr. Martineau's ablest coadjutors in his conflicts with agnosticism and atheism. But happily all this is now changed. Truer views of the function and value of the Bible are rapidly making their way. It is now seen that the basal doctrine of the incarnation of God in the consciousness of His rational creatures is indeed grandly exemplified in the Scriptures, but that its foundation and justification are to be found in the normal experiences and in the rational insight of all the world's greatest prophets, poets, and philosophers. This perception of the universal character of theological truths has sent the most cultured ministers of religion everywhere to the earnest study of religious philosophy, and it is this view of the true relation between philosophy and religion which is now introducing this subject into the regular curriculum of the newly-founded Universities in this country.

Among the books which this new condition of things among "orthodox" Protestants has called forth, one of the most valuable is Studies in the Philosophy of Religion, by George Galloway, B.D.* In an early number of the Hibbert Journal there appeared a very able defence by Mr. Galloway of Dr. Martineau's doctrine of Moral Freedom against the criticism passed on it by Professor Pringle-Pattison. It is, we think, to be regretted that the Edinburgh Professor vouchsafed no reply to the powerful arguments set forth in Mr. Galloway's paper. In the first essay of the present very interesting volume the Hegelian philosophy of religion is carefully examined, and its inadequacy as an interpretation of man's moral and religious experiences is conclusively shown. A second paper discusses that form of idealism, akin to Berkeley's, which has found recent supporters in Professor James Ward, Dr. Hastings Rashdall, and others. This, too, is pronounced unsatisfactory, and in another essay Mr. Galloway gives his own view of "The Ultimate Basis and Meaning of Religion," a view which has very important points of agreement with the religious philosophies of Lotze and Martineau. Not the least valuable and suggestive part of the book is the final Essay, which very acutely criticises the views of the Ritschlians.

Another treatise which is likely to be very serviceable both to ministers and to students who are preparing for examinations in the philosophy of religion is Selections from the Literature of Theism,* by Professor A. Caldecott, M.A., D.D., and Dr. H. R. Mackintosh. The editors of this admirable series of extracts from the works of the great philosophers are evidently eminently well equipped for their task. Long passages bearing on the different phases of the philosophy of religion are selected from Anselm, Thomas Aquinas, Berkeley, Kant, Cousin, Lotze, Martineau, and others. Each of these extracts is introduced by a brief but very luminous sketch of the writer's philosophical system, and is accompanied by helpful footnotes elucidating difficult passages. The introduction to the chapters dealing with "Religion in the Critical Philosophy" is an excellent summary of the main features of Kant's religious philosophy, and the footnotes to the long extract from "The Critique of Pure Reason" show keen philosophical insight. More than twenty pages are devoted to Dr. Martineau, and the editor, rightly discerning that it is in the treatment of the ethical side of man's relation to God that Martineau's contributions to the philosophy of religion are most important and original, has selected that impressive section in the Study of Religion which deals with "Right as Universally Valid." In the introduction to this passage Dr. Mackintosh, after describing the "inferential" mode of reaching belief in God which forms a large part of Dr. Martineau's formal philosophy of religion, proceeds to explain that—

> This Intellectual and Ethical Rationalism, as has been pointed out, reposes at bottom on a fundamental intuitive perception of the being and character of God, and in Dr. Martineau's last work he declares that "in the very constitution of the human soul there is provision for an immediate apprehension of God." He distinguished the faculty of reverence, accordingly, as par excellence, "the religious sense." But this aspect of his theory was never fully worked out. Isolated expressions could also be quoted to suggest that for him the sense of beauty was one of the "confluent intuitions" which meet in the thought of God; but neither did this receive any adequate recognition in his formal philosophy. He is greatest, unquestionably, when expounding what he would have called the ethical aspect of God's self-revelation to humanity.

It is somewhat surprising that no extract is given from Martineau's elaborate and singularly able defence of the Freedom of the Will; and throughout the volume the editors, we think, have failed to give to this fundamental question proportionate presentation in their selection.

The third of these philosophic defences of theism from the point of view of "the new orthodoxy" is entitled The Essence of Christianity.* Its author is Dr. W. A. Brown, D.D., Roosevelt Professor of Systematic Theology in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. The two preceding works deal mainly with questions of pure theism, and do not discuss the points which differentiate theism from some forms of Christianity. Dr. Brown, on the other hand, while maintaining that Christianity is the ultimate philosophy of religion, yet appears to make Christ, rather than God, the centre and inspiring source of the religion which Jesus founded. The final result of his inquiry into the essence of Christianity is thus summed up:—

> Christianity, as modern thought understands it, is the religion of Divine sonship and human brotherhood revealed and realised through Jesus Christ. As such it is the fulfilment and completion of all earlier forms of religion, and the appointed means for the redemption of mankind through the realisation of the Kingdom of God. Its central figure is Jesus Christ, who is not only the revelation of the divine ideal for man, but also, through the transforming influence which he asserts over his followers, the most powerful means of realising that ideal among men. The possession in Christ of the supreme revelation of God's love and power constitutes the distinctive mark of Christianity, and justifies its claim to be the final religion.

The book is a learned exposition of the progressive accounts of the essence of Christianity which are found in the Ancient Church, in the leaders of the Reformation, and finally in the chief modern philosophers and theologians. It is written with marked ability, and reveals wide reading and sound scholarship. In our view its chief value consists in the full and, on the whole, accurate description of the forms of the philosophy of religion set forth in the writings of Schleiermacher, Hegel, and Ritschl. The very numerous footnotes not only give quotations from the originals which substantiate the statements in the text, but also a fair bibliography of the several authors, and interesting illustrative passages from recent German literature. Students of the philosophy of religion will find this a useful work, even though some of them may think, as we do, that the natural and logical outcome of the writings of such thinkers as Schleiermacher and Hegel is by no means that "Christocentric" view of the absolute religion, in which Dr. Brown, following Albrecht Ritschl, sees the finality of religious thought.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

In this month's Contemporary the most attractive article will probably be found by most of our readers in Mr. W. Hall Griffin's on "Early Friends of Robert Browning," one of whom, Joseph Arnould, wrote in 1845 of his poet-friend, "He is a noble fellow. His life so pure, so energetic, so simple, so laborious, so loftily enthusiastic. It is impossible to know and not to love him." In this number Canon Cheyne replies to Dr. Emil Reich's onslaught of last month on the "Higher Critics," with a cogent remonstrance, "Shall we put the Clock back in Biblical Criticism?" Canon Cheyne speaks of his critic as "a much-travelled and widely-read man," whose comments might be of real value "if he can moderate his tone, and be a little less eager to make points," and if he will "resume for a time the critical and philological study of some special branch of ancient history," as the corrective of too wide a range, and too superficial a knowledge of critical literature. Sir Edward Fry, in his article on "Science and Education," utters a timely warning as to the relative value of scientific knowledge and moral insight. This is his conclusion:—

We live in an age when physical science has advanced by strides, and I fear lest "the unlocking of the gates of sense and the kindling of a greater natural light" may lead many to offer an undue pre-eminence to science above morals in the scheme of education; lest we should forget that it is not power that is a blessing, but the good use made of such powers as we possess; and lest in the art and practice of education a somewhat superficial psychology should be made to take the place of that influence of the mind and soul of the teacher on the minds and souls of the taught, without which all science in teaching will be useless.

The Nineteenth Century and After opens with a valuable article by Mr. John Morley on "Democracy and Reaction," noticing the book by Mr. L. T. Hobhouse on that subject. Lady Wimborne renews her championship of the Protestant faith, appealing naturally to the Articles, in her article on "Rome at the Reformation," and Prince Kropotkin has a very interesting article on "The Morality of Nature," in which, however, he does not succeed in persuading us that Darwin's theory gave a true explanation of the sense of duty in man. Mr. Slade Butler's curious article on "The Greek Mysteries and the Gospel Narrative" deserves careful attention. Sir W. B. Richmond writes in very high appreciation of Watts, setting over his article the motto "From the Utmost to the Highest." We had thought the motto was, "The Utmost for the Highest," as truly expressing the spirit of the great artist's life. Watts, it is here said, "ennobles noble themes, and does not degrade his genius when he tells an appalling story. He is never melodramatic, always epic or lyrical, and that is why we have called him the Æschylus of modern painters as well as an interpreter of the more gentle Tennyson."

The Independent Review opens with some strong political articles, that on "Labour," by Mr. Arnold Holt, in particular, deserving sympathetic attention. "The Labour Movement in Russia" furnishes useful insight into recent movements, and has for appendix the very thorough programme of the Russian Social Democratic Labour Party. Mr. C. S. Roundell furnishes some interesting "Recollections of Mr. Gladstone." Mr. Brailsford's article on "A Levantine Messiah" tells the curious story of a seventeenth century Spanish Jew, a native of Smyrna, who at the critical moment submitted to Islam, but still maintained some secret claims to a divine commission. His followers, the sect of the Dounmé, half Jewish and half Moslem, appear to be still the dominant power at Salonica. Mr. Lawrence Binyon writes of "Watts and National Art," declaring that "the last century claims him as its most typical and commanding expression in English painting."

The Monthly Review opens with a curious rhapsody on "Man," by Maxim Gorki, full for the most part of rather terrible superlatives. More human and much more refreshing is the article on Edward Burne-Jones. The article on "The Effect of the War on Russian Public Feeling," by L. Villari, should be also noted.

This month's World's Work and Play is not given over so entirely to motors as the February number, but the motor has supplanted the Editor's notes on "The March of Events," in the first place. Mr. J. H. Whittey, M.P., writes on "The Urgent Need for Land Reform," and there are also articles on "Can the Townsman Farm," and "A German Labour Colony."

OBITUARY.

ROBERT HAMPSON.

We have to record the death of Mr. Robert Hampson, on Feb. 24, at St. Leonards-on-Sea, after a long and wearisome illness, at the age of 71.

His name has long been familiar in many of our households in connection with various movements for social reform, while his spirit of fairness and chivalry towards women made him specially zealous in striving to obtain recognition of their powers, and in the breaking down of barriers which prevented them from entering certain professions.

As a young man he had intended to enter the medical profession, but after two years' study at the Manchester Medical School and Royal Infirmary he was obliged to relinquish all idea of becoming a physician, on account of a very serious illness, which permanently affected the spine. In 1864 he qualified as pharmaceutical chemist, and practised first for many years at Alderley Edge, near Manchester, and afterwards in London, where he was elected on the Council of the Pharmaceutical Society. Here he soon became known as a vigorous worker, and many excellent reforms were carried out largely at his instigation; among others was that of admitting women to the laboratories, and allowing them to enter for examination. The following resolution passed at the Council meeting on March 1, will show the estimation in which he was held by his confreres:

That this Council records its regret at the death of Mr. Robert Hampson, who for twenty-seven years served as a member of the Council, and for nine years filled the office of treasurer to the Society. His strong character, generous impulses, and cultured habits won the esteem and regard of his colleagues, and his work in connection with the modifications of past procedure to meet modern needs, should always command the approbation of those who desire rational progress in pharmaceutical administration.

When a medical student Robert Hampson came to know Caroline Passman, then a teacher in the Lower Mosley-street Schools, under the Rev. Travers Madge, and this lady became his wife.

Having the same aims and ideals they worked together in many a good cause. In the course of their labours Mrs. Hampson was brought into contact with the sad lives of young girls who had strayed from the path of virtue, and to the work of uplifting them and of setting them once again in the right road she thenceforth consecrated her life; and when Mr. and Mrs. Hampson removed to London a home was started in which to carry on her unique form of rescue work, a work that was continued until a few months before her death. Naturally such an undertaking meant an act of self-denial on the part of the husband almost as great as to the wife; but as both were filled with enthusiasm for the uplifting of humanity, they were, both of them, able and willing to make the necessary sacrifice.

After Caroline Hampson's death Winifred House was made into her Memorial Home, and became the well-known Convalescent Nursing Home for Invalid Children, of which Robert Hampson was one of the hon. secretaries. And although for some years past he has been too ill to take any active part in its management, his name was retained, and his strong interest in its welfare never flagged.

In 1895, Mr. Hampson married Miss Mary Emma Marr, and once more enjoyed the comfort of a happy married life; indeed, had it not been for this lady's devoted care and skilled and loving tendance, his wearisome illness would have been almost impossible to bear.

The funeral took place at Ore Cemetery, the Rev. Gardner Preston officiating.

M. P.

MISS FANNY MALCOLM.

There passed away on February 27, at her residence Hill Hall House, near Belfast, an old and much-loved member of the Remonstrant Presbyterian congregation of Dunmurry, where her father, the Rev. Andrew George Malcolm, D.D., laboured most successfully from 1807 till 1809, when he was called to Newry, dying there in 1823. Miss Fanny Malcolm was the fifth child of Rev. Dr. Malcolm by his marriage with Miss Eleanor Hunter, a member of a leading Dunmurry family, and her baptismal name was that of her grandmother, Fanny, daughter of the Rev. Andrew Kennedy of Mourne, co. Down. Her eldest brother, Rev. James Malcolm, died minister of Chester in 1855. Another brother, Mr. W. H. Malcolm, of Belfast, and latterly of Holywood, where he died in October, 1899, was a man of cultivated mind and fine taste. The useful little volume, "Shakespeare and Holy Writ," was from his pen, as also a charming work, "Flowers of Shakespeare," which, unfortunately, has not yet got beyond the manuscript stage. Another brother was Andrew George Malcolm, M.D., who died in 1857, and whose valuable services to the Belfast Royal Hospital will not be forgotten for many a long day.

Miss Malcolm, who was in her eighty-eighth year, was a woman of broad and deep sympathy and very earnest piety. She retained to the end her interest in all that makes for human welfare. Her life was rich in faith and good works, and it was with vivid expectation of the joy to which she was being borne away, that she fell asleep.

The funeral services, both at the house and the Dunmurry burial-ground, on Thursday, March 2, were conducted by the Rev. J. A. Kelly, who on Sunday morning preached a memorial sermon, in which he spoke of the great loss the congregation had sustained and paid a reverent tribute to the memory of their departed friend.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN

A LITTLE girl who was extremely fond of fruit went one afternoon into the room where a plate of pears stood on the sideboard. She had been told never to touch fruit or anything that was left out; but as she passed into the room the delicious smell met her, and she took a pear from the dish, and looked at it and smelt it. It was too much for her; she was just going to bite it when something happened to her, and she suddenly put it back on the dish. She stood silent, and thinking. Had she heard something? Why did she put it back? She did not know; she only knew that something stopped her just as she was going to be naughty. She felt startled and sorry. She turned round and saw her mother sitting by the window sewing. She ran to her, and began to cry. After a little she looked up, and said, "It wasn't you, mother, was it?" "No, dear, I did not speak." "Then it must have been God," said Dorothy.

She never forgot that moment when she first felt that God was close to her; and when she was quite old the sudden flash would come back to her with which she then first really knew God.

That is what conscience means; God with us, making us know without a doubt what is right and what is wrong. But God leaves us free to obey or not to obey. Dorothy could still have eaten the pear, if her conscience had been less strong and awake. And if she had, do you know what would have happened? She would very likely have excused herself, saying, "Mother would have given it to me if I had asked."

Perhaps; but you did not ask.

"It's only a little thing; no one will miss it; it doesn't matter."

Yes; the pear is a little thing; but your eating it was a great thing, for it was the only naughty thing that offered itself to you to do, and you did it. And that no one will miss it does matter greatly, because it makes it easier to do such a thing again.

For what do these excuses mean?

That you are blinding your conscience and making it duller for the next time, so that when another temptation comes you will find it easier to disobey the call which Dorothy heard—the call not to do what is wrong.

All the powers which God has given us He has given to be used, and if we do not use them they gradually die away. If a boy breaks his leg, and has to keep it quite still and useless, it loses its power, and when he begins to walk again he can hardly use it, and hobbles about till exercise brings back its power. If you have been in a dark room for a long time, and suddenly come out into the light, you cannot see anything till your eyes get back their power of seeing in the light. So it is with our conscience: if we do not use it it goes to sleep, and it may take a very startling awakening to bring it back into use.

A boy named Loveit was at school amongst a lot of companions.* He was a good-natured boy, and above all things he loved to be popular amongst his schoolfellows, and he got a name for being the best-natured fellow of all the boys. But, unluckily, in order to be thought so he was often tempted to do things that were not right, so anxious was he to please. One day the boys were very eager over a game of battledoor and shuttlecock in the playground, and Loveit and Tarlton had counted up to 320, when the sun dazzled Loveit, and he missed his stroke, and the shuttlecock dropped. Tarlton dared anyone to play another game with him, and flung the shuttlecock up into the air, and it fell into a lane which was outside the playground, into which the boys were forbidden to go. No one dared to go for it, but they wanted it, and Tarlton tried to make Loveit go for it by flattering him about being so good-natured. At first he refused, but when Tarlton began to ridicule him and said he was "afraid," Loveit leaped the fence and went. When he came back he brought news of a tree in a neighbour's garden covered with rosy apples. After this nothing would satisfy Tarlton but that they must get some of those apples. Loveit was greatly shocked, and tried to persuade him against the scheme; but he only ridiculed Loveit for having any scruples, and Loveit was too weak to stand out alone; especially when Tarlton said, "Do, man, pluck up a little spirit, and be one of us, or you'll make us all hate you." "Hate me?" the idea was too dreadful, and Loveit silenced his conscience, and gave in. So every night after they had gone to bed a party of boys got out through a window, and went and robbed the apple tree. Soon the owner found out, and he believed the boys were the thieves, but being a kind old man, and fond of boys, he did not wish to get them into trouble. So instead of telling the master he borrowed a large dog, and chained him to the apple tree. This baffled the boys the next night, for the dog was fierce, and they could not get near the tree; and Loveit stuck in the hedge almost within the dog's reach, where he called in vain to his "friends" to help him, and was left to fight his way out alone. After this things got worse and worse; and Tarlton confided to Loveit that he had got a piece of poisoned meat with which to kill the dog. Loveit was horrified; and now, being awakened to what Tarlton was, he at last refused to have anything to do with him. But at night, when Loveit's friend Hardy wanted to get his kite fetched in, and called the servant boy Tom to get it for him, Tom came out of Tarlton's room, and Loveit saw that the corner of a blue handkerchief, in which he had seen Tarlton's poisoned meat wrapped, was hanging from his pocket. He watched from the window, and saw Tom go towards the apple tree and the dog. "He's gone to do it! How cruel! how wicked!" he said; and found Hardy close by, who asked what he meant. Loveit could bear it no longer, and told Hardy all. In a moment Hardy was dressing himself, and was off towards the apple tree. He was just in time to catch Tom, who on being discovered flung the handkerchief containing the meat to the dog, and ran away. Hardy seized a pitch fork, and stuck it into the meat, and dragged it away from the dog, who was furiously pulling at the handkerchief. As he jumped in at the window he met the undermaster, and was called up before him. Hardy had promised Loveit that he would not betray him, so he could only insist that he was innocent, even when Mr. Power found the meat in his pocket. And when Hardy told him to take care, for the the meat was poisoned, he was locked up for the night in what the boys called the "Black Hole." Next day the head master had all the boys before him to find out the culprits. Everything looked very black for Hardy, especially the poisoned meat being found in his pocket; but he stoutly denied having been guilty of any part of the affair. At last the blue handkerchief was found to have Tarlton's initials on it, and all the truth was discovered. Tarlton was dismissed from the school. Loveit had had a lesson which he never forgot as to turning a deaf ear to his conscience, and doing what he knew to be wrong, and all because he wanted to be popular. You see how easily he let himself be led on from bad to worse, till a very rude awakening came to him, and opened his eyes.

WEEDS.

DID you read what Mr. Livens said last week about Weeds? Here is another little bit for which there was no room in that talk. You can read it again, and put this in, if you like, just before he begins to talk about the moral, about the middle of the second column.

"Why, what work do they do?

"They grow, and mean it, too. And as this is done mainly on materials cunningly extracted from the air they cost next to nothing, and your garden is all the richer when the battle is over and their bones dissolve in the ground where they are buried. They are not above doing you a good turn in other ways too. With a real spirit of chivalry they will protect the weaklings. Look at that bed of winter onions, every one of which has set out in search of its fortune armed with nothing better than a minute and flimsy green spear. Those perky young carrots, too, each with a feather in his cap—for all their bravado, they would have made a poor display of themselves on their bleak windy stand had not John Chickweed come along and out of sheer good-nature wrapped his green jacket round their shivering toes. Now they can fend for themselves, so we bid John Chickweed good-morning and he takes his farewell. In great dull towns where they are left to grow or are wisely sown on unused ground or railway embankments, the weeds do their little best to purify the polluted air."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL IDEAL.

THE address given last Saturday evening by the Rev. ADDISON A. CHARLESWORTH, to the London Sunday School Society, a report of which appears in our present issue, set very clearly before his audience of teachers the high ideal of the work to which they are devoted. Religion, he insisted, must always be the great end kept in view in the Sunday-school, no less than in the church. Whatever else may be done in the school, whatever other advantages it may afford to the children and young people gathered into it, the essential thing is that the sense of reverence, the consciousness of God in their own lives, should be awakened, and rightly interpreted to them, to give them strength and inspiration for the true life as children of God.

This religious awakening and leading in the true way comes not so much by any direct teaching as by the personal influence of the teacher. One who takes a lesson in what is regarded as an ordinary secular subject may be teaching far more religion, kindling the spirit of love and trust in his scholars' hearts and lives more effectually, than one whose formal subject is even the Gospel record or a great Epistle of ST. PAUL. It is not Bible teaching necessarily that carries with it the teaching of religion, though in the right hands, when the true spirit is there, the Bible is the great instrument of enlightenment and inspiration. Mr. CHARLESWORTH recalled the old days when it was necessary to teach the elements of ordinary education in the Sunday-school, reminding his hearers of the great devotion thrown into that work; and he told of a teacher of more recent times, who still continued to teach arithmetic to his Sunday class. He was a busy man, he said, and found that subject better suited to his powers than others which might be regarded as more appropriate, but which required more preparation than he was able to give. But while his scholars worked at their arithmetic he would go round to each in turn and have a quiet word with them, getting thus into sympathetic touch with their lives, gaining their confidence, entering into their difficulties, and so finding opportunity, as occasion arose, of instilling the most helpful lessons of the higher life. The presence of such a friend, honoured and loved by those to whom he gave so ungrudgingly of his kindly help, would furnish the surest means of wakening and encouraging the better side of their nature, kindling in them genuine religious impulse and aspiration.

Many grateful testimonies have been borne by men and women who received practically the whole of their early education in the old Sunday-schools, to the inestimable benefit conferred through such teaching of the three R's and what went with it. So a first insight was gained into the meaning of religion, and the foundations of honourable character were laid. From their teachers, perhaps without many words about religion, they received object-lessons in devoted Christian service, the beautiful spirit of discipleship, and a deep, calm faith, which remained with them through life, among their most sacred and quickening memories. And now that the work of elementary teaching is so much better done in the day-schools, and our Sunday-school teachers have a wider field open to them and can devote themselves more directly to the subjects of profoundest human interest, they should take to heart that lesson, and see to it that they bring to their work a spirit as devoted, a sense of the urgency of their mission as profound, as held the teachers of that elder time to their humbler tasks. They had the one thing needful, without which the best equipt modern teacher, with far better opportunities of service, will fail to impart that which is of more worth than all the learning of the world.

The subject-matter of the teaching in a Sunday-school may be very various. One may wish that the young people growing up there should receive some systematic instruction in the elements of moral and religious truth, and in the great lines of religious history, both in Bible and later times; but what is of more consequence than this is that every teacher in the school should be teaching a subject which kindles his own deepest interest and reverence and love; that a heart on fire and deeply moved by a sense of the divine meaning of life, may kindle a like response in the children's minds and hearts. The Gospel story, or the story of some other noble life, God-inspired, may furnish the best means for such teaching: it depends on the teacher. Others may find a simple lesson in natural history more helpful; and surely no disciple of him who said, "Consider the lilies" will deny that it may be so. In any case the spirit of the teacher, the direct personal influence, is the vital thing; just as the tone of the school as a whole, the spirit and ideal of character which dominate its order, is of more conquence than even the most admirable system of instruction. A happy spirit of reverence and earnest purpose and loving kindness, ruling in the teachers, will make the children glad to come, and open the way for the teaching of the greatest lessons of all: and this the teachers will feel to be a work to which they can thankfully devote their best gifts, and find in it the purest joy of service.

MORAL AND RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF FREE TRADE.*

BY THE REV. EDGAR INNES FRIPP.

Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.—MATT. vii. 12.

ONE of the proofs, it seems to me, of the love of the Creator is the fact that He has made man dependent upon his neighbour. The world in which He has placed us and the nature with which He has endowed us are constituted for friendly relationship and service. The earth varies in different parts in climate, soil, mineral wealth and vegetation. It is not alike everywhere, nor intended to be sufficient in itself in any particular region. One portion is hot, another cold; one consists of water, another of dry land; one is mountainous, another a vast plain; one is rich in wood and coal, another in gold and diamonds; one yields corn, another cattle; one is suitable for the production of sugar, another for potatoes; one supplies cotton, another furs; one is full of building stone, another of clay for the baking of brick. It is obviously a world for travellers and traders. By staying in one country and confining oneself to the resources of that country we shall not know the beauty of the world, nor enjoy its wonderful riches. Moreover, each country benefits by admixture with others. A wise farmer gets seed from other districts, and introduces new breeds of cattle into his stock. Blends of metals make a finer copper and steel. Variety of wools give a better cloth. All this means exchange. So with man. As the earth has varied qualities in different areas, man has diverse capacities among different races. We are not intended to be alike, nor to do the same work, or to do the same work in the same way. What is a pleasure to the black may be a toil to the white, and vice versa what the white enjoys the black may find intolerable. They were made to assist one another, to supply one another's wants, to exchange their services. And this involves Trade. Of all animals man is the only commercial animal. Just as he is sometimes defined as "the rational animal" so he might be defined as "the trading animal." Because he is rational he is a trader. He is not like other animals, contented with what is immediately round about him. He looks beyond that small environment, and is glad to give something that he has in abundance in exchange for what he has not. Hence so far back as we can go in history we meet with traces of travel and commerce. We read how the men of Shechem were willing to make a compact with the sons of Jacob, saying to them, "The land shall be before you, dwell and trade ye therein, and get you possessions." And when the Israelites were in Egypt they were shepherds and breeders of cattle among a people who were growers of corn. The two great and ancient industries of pasture and agriculture thus jostled together side by side. There are traces of very early visits by the Phœnicians to Britain. In a British village dug up from the bogs of Somerset have been found pieces of pottery either brought by Phœnician merchants or copied from Phœnician patterns. We learn from Homer how widespread over Europe were the Phœnician traffickers, and the prophet Ezekiel (chapters xxvii. and xxviii.) gives us a vivid picture of the famous Phœnician city Tyre at the height of her prosperity. That God intended men to be traders is proved by the fact that wealth begins and accumulates not in isolated regions, where employment is strictly reserved for those at home, however rich the soil or salubrious the climate, but by the great waterways, as at Nineveh on the Tigris and Babylon on the Euphrates, and the venerable cities on the Nile and the coasts of the Mediterranean. Tyre was one of the ancient clearing-houses of the world. Its harbour was open for the incoming of imports and the going out of exports. The prophet tells us of her merchant fleets, of linen from the flax lands of the Nile, of metals brought from Spain, mules and horses from Armenia, ivory from Ethiopia, precious stones from Syria, wheat and honey from Judah, sheep from Arabia, wine and wool, steel and yarn, spices and gold and cloth, cassia and cedar wood, from various countries. And so rich was Tyre, such was the wealth of her citizens and the magnificence of her buildings, that she seemed to lift up her head among other cities, and dwell like a goddess. What was the cause of this prosperity? Trade—exchange—the bringing of things from where they were abundant and cheap and less wanted, and sending them where they were scarce and dear and much in request, in return for other things similarly abundant where produced and elsewhere scarce and commanding good prices.

Now, what the prophet shows us at Tyre we may see with our own eyes in our own country and all over the world. Men serve one another by trade. Cotton grown in the tropics is spun into thread under the damp skies of Lancashire; corn ripened in California or the wheat-fields of Russia is turned into flour at Birkenhead and into biscuits at Reading; wool shorn from the sheep's back in Australia or Central Asia is woven into cloth in Yorkshire; coal dug up in England and Wales supplies glass and metal furnaces on the Continent; and sand from the quarries in Mansfield fetches a big price at the foundries in Belgium and Germany. These and ten thousands of similar exchanges constitute trade. Our life in Mansfield to-day is dependent on innumerable exchanges with different localities of England and all over the earth. And this interchanging goes on apace. Nothing can stop it. Taxes and tariffs and other artificial restraints may hinder it, but eventually, like a great and growing river, it will some day sweep them all away. Every year a progressive community does more trading, makes more exchanges with other communities, is less self-contained and self-dependent. It is the will of God that it should be so, and notwithstanding what selfish interests and despotic rulers and ignorant governments may do to check the process, the Divine Will and Wisdom are bound to prevail, and ere long make trade free from pole to pole.

For free trade is simply natural trade. It is merely allowing men to exchange who want to exchange, and to exchange in the manner they desire. It is trade uninterfered with, taking its own course—like water seeking the level. You cannot for long prevent people buying what they want and where they want, and it is always best for the whole that they should do this.

Nevertheless, obvious as this is when we think about it, we must remember that there is an ancient, deep-rooted savage prejudice, that has come down to us from pre-industrial and pre-trading times, in the people of one country against the people of another—and even in the people of one town against those of the next. We are suspicious and envious of the stranger, and inclined to look upon him as an enemy. This instinct, I say, has been inherited from a barbarous antiquity when neither life nor property was safe from marauders. And so strong is it in human nature, that it has always been easy for short-sighted or unscrupulous governments to use it for evil. Rulers in want of money, or powerful moneyed interests that have desired to profit out of the community's needs, have had little difficulty in imposing duties or taxes on goods from abroad, creating the impression in the people's minds that they injured not the people themselves, but the foreigner.

As a matter of fact a tariff or a duty injures both, and equally. It must be so. It is simply impossible to hit the foreigner without hitting the native also, and in precisely the same degree. For consider what trade is. It is exchange. It takes two to trade. Two at least must wish to exchange or there will be no exchange. It is voluntary on both sides. There is no forcing or aggression. People exchange because it is an advantage to both. No one can buy unless there is someone wanting to sell, and no one can sell unless there is some other wanting to buy. Therefore a tax on goods coming into a country hurts the foreigner who wants to sell them, but at the same time hurts the man at home who wants to buy them.

And remember again—all trade is exchange of goods for goods or services for services. The use of money may obscure this fact in the minds of persons who have not thought the matter out, but it is clear. All buying and selling is ultimately giving goods or services in return for goods or services to the benefit of both parties. There cannot be exports without imports, and there cannot be imports without exports. What we send out pays for what we bring in, and what is sent here pays for what is taken away, and both importers and exporters make a bargain. If our exports are great it simply means that our purchasing power is great for the acquisition of things from abroad. We don't send goods away for nothing, and foreigners don't send goods here for nothing, and the payment in both cases is only for the moment money—ultmately it is and must be goods. The value of an English sovereign abroad is its power to obtain a sovereign's worth of English goods, and the value of a German twenty-mark piece in this country is its power to purchase twenty marks' worth of German wares. People ignorantly complain of the fact that England is flooded with goods from abroad. It is nothing in itself to complain of. It is simply evidence of the flood of goods we are sending abroad. If we are sending vast quantities of cotton and woollen goods, machinery and coal, into other countries, we must necessarily look out for vast quantities of goods from other countries in our shops and houses. The two are the necessary concomitants of each other. We cannot increase our exports without increasing our imports, and large imports mean large exports—large purchasing power, security, and credit.

I repeat then, that a country cannot hinder trade, cannot hamper exchange, by imposing a duty on imports without injuring its own people as well as the foreigner. It is a double hurt. If it checks imports, it also necessarily checks exports. If it makes it difficult for goods to come in, it thereby diminishes the things going out to pay for them. So fallacious is the selfish intention.

Yet there is a popular statesman who goes up and down the country bidding us as a people to retaliate—to hit back—not to take an insult lying down. It is an appeal to the savage instinct, and is without wisdom as it is totally devoid of Christianity. Because France and Germany and America, and even our colonies, are selfish or short-sighted enough to injure both us and themselves by imposing taxes on goods from this country, we are to imitate their folly and injure both them and ourselves yet more. That is to say, because the American hits the Englishman in the eye and strains his wrist in the process, we are to hit him in eye and break our wrist! For we should suffer more than the American trader. We have gained by Free Trade—though, of course, we should have gained far more if other countries had followed our example.

Now sixty years ago, partly through necessity, partly through the wisdom of our statesmen, we went in for a very large measure of Free Trade. We said—So far as we are concerned we will not make it difficult to exchange goods with other lands. To a very considerable extent we adopted the teaching of the Golden Rule, and have done unto others as we wished them to do unto us. "Come," we said to the foreigner, "to our markets freely, whether or not you admit us freely to yours.'' And to some persons that seemed suicidal sentiment. There are always plenty of people willing to look askance at anything that fell from the lips of Jesus Christ. ''Good in theory,'' they say, ''impossible in practice.'' They would not teach their children to say this, nor would they say it of many things outside of business. I suppose that nobody whose opinion is worth citing would maintain that, if we found ourselves in a company of people who told lies about us, we, in self defence, should speak falsehoods about them. Retaliation in this case is clearly wrong. Surely it would be better to go without a character on the lips of liars than to become a liar too. Or if certain customers cheat me, am I to cheat them—or, to make matters even, cheat others? I do not think this will recommend itself to any respectable merchant. Or if a quarrelsome or drunken neighbour strikes me in the face, though I may be tempted to hit back—especially if I am a strong man—I shall scarcely win the approval or respect of sensible men by such a course. What is pardonable perhaps in the schoolboy or the yokel is unpardonable in the gentleman. And I must say I shall not think highly of English dignity or English strength if we, as a nation, follow the advice of our pugnacious statesman and abandon the high-minded policy that we have pursued with great success for more than half a century.

What is good in theory is ultimately always good in practice, and it has been so with England in its adoption of Free Trade. Cobden and Bright and Gladstone were right. Free imports has given us an amazing advantage in our competition with other countries. By being able to procure our material and food and appliances, and the latest discoveries in machinery and science, immediately and cheaply from every country whence they can be had, without hindrance, our manufacturers, when they have chosen to exert themselves, have been able to turn out a better class of goods, in innumerable branches of industry, than any other country, and to beat the foreigner, in spite of his hostile tariff, in his own market.

There was never such wealth in England or in any country as there is here to-day, and it is largely due to Free Trade. Our wealth might be far, far greater yet if only we went in for more freedom. Not less, but more liberty, is what we want—the total abolition of tariffs and taxes on industry instead of a return to them. Those who suffer in this country from want of work and want of bread will not look to ''Protection'' to help them, but to a further extension of the Golden Rule. If there is poverty and misery and injustice in England it is not the result of Free Trade, or of freedom of any kind, but the deficiency of it. It is due to our iniquitous land laws, to the continual rise of rent, to the burden of our mining royalties, to the cost of keeping up a luxurious and extravagant aristocracy, to our disgraceful liquor laws, to the neglect of education, to the sporting and drinking and gambling habits of a large section of the people, to the intolerable expenditure of the Government on armaments, to the waste involved in an ill-organised and over capitalised railway system, and similar impediments to business and enterprise. And the true reformer and lover of his country will turn his attention to these evils rather than be seduced by the apparent virtues of a scheme that promises prosperity at home by inflicting an injury on the foreigner.

Free Trade has not failed in this country, nor has its influence been without effect abroad. We have been pioneers in a policy that is certain to be followed by other nations after a time—not in so short a time as Cobden enthusiastically believed, but in no long time notwithstanding. Sixty years ago almost every city in Italy had its little tariff-ring about its walls, whereby anyone bringing anything in to sell was made to pay a toll. It was believed that the city by so doing raised a revenue for itself and kept employment in the hands of its citizens. Yet these cities were miserably poor. And gradually it has dawned upon them how absurd is the idea of a community growing rich by keeping good things out. There is now an approach to Free Trade all over Italy. It is the same in Germany. Within the borders of the great German empire nearly every local tariff has been removed. It is the same over the vast territory of the United States in America. It cannot be very long before the same wisdom that has demonstrated the advantage of a country trading freely throughout its own territories will convince men of the benefits to be derived from an unfettered commerce with countries outside. We have led the way, and we should be proud of it. For sixty years we have been faithful to freedom, and I think we shall not now be so weak, so pusillanimous, as to forsake it. We shall not return like a dog to its vomit, and declare for the brutish principle of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth.

FROM PALERMO.

The Rev. S. Farrington,* in one of his recent letters to the Christian Register, gives the following description of the welcoming of the new Archbishop at Palermo :—

For five months Sicily has been without its primate. Palermo being the capital city of the most beautiful island of the Mediterranean, its archbishop ranks as ''Siciliæ Primus.'' But now ''the exalted wisdom of the Vicar of Jesus Christ has given the Palermitans a man illustrious, sound, illuminated with a warm heart, filled with charity, justice, and vigilance,'' a ''new man exactly adapted to us.'' So says the local paper. So believe the well-satisfied people.

We heard that the streets were gay with flags, that preparations for illuminating the exterior of the cathedral were completed, that something was at hand, we knew not what. But we went forth to see. Going up the long Corso Emanuele, we found the sidewalks dense with people, the window balconies filled up to fourth and fifth stories on either side the way, and at length had to enter a tram to get on to the cathedral. Arriving there, we found the gates to the considerable square in front of it closed, and the street lined with a double row of policemen.

Boldly approaching the chief of these, we asked if we could be allowed to enter. By no manner of means! So, abandoning all hope, we entered a little open space, not as yet crowded, intending, with resignation, to look on from afar. Soon a well-dressed man seemed interested when from our language he discovered that we were English. He bowed politely. Would we like to witness the welcome to his Excellency? the honours Palermo was about to confer upon its new Cardinal Archbishop? Yes, we should very much. But there is no chance. We tried to get through the line of the police, but in vain. ''I can get you in, come with me.'' Taking us across the street, and saying something to one in authority, he soon had us within the guarded precincts. Then, suddenly, ''Would we like, there was plenty of time, to go into the archiepiscopal palace?'' It would be a great pleasure. So, passing liveried officials, we were soon going through the vast halls, and the rooms not so vast, in which the Primate was so soon to find his home. We were shown pictures, precious rings, jewels, the bedroom, and the bed on which to-night he would sleep, also the library. It was evident that an archbishop has no great need of many books, but such as there were, well bound. While we were thus exploring, all the bells began a tremendous clang and roar. He had arrived! He would soon be here; ''in a moment,'' said our attentive, providential friend. But it was quite two hours into which that moment stretched. All the working men of Palermo, in their ordinary working-day clothes, but carrying banners of many colours, were preceding him on his way from the station to the cathedral. On and on they came, quietly, without haste, without rest, until we wondered if their long line would ever end. We had been placed in a window of the archiepiscopal palace that we might have the best possible view. But suddenly it dawned upon a stout ecclesiastic that it might not be the proper thing for a lady to be seen in the window of an abode sacred to the male sex. Very politely, but firmly, he said, ''It is impossible, signora.'' To avoid the possibility of a scandal, of course we left, but not without a protest from our faithful guardian and guide. He could persuade the police, but not the priest. From the palace he took us into the cathedral, which we found full of the shipbuilders, the labouring men in all their fraternities, standing, with banners furled, closely packed from door to distant altar. It was something amazing, unique. Not so in England. Archbishops there of either the Anglican or the Roman Church have no such ovations from ''the common people,'' rather from the nobility and gentry. The poor man there, the day labourer, cannot afford ''to dress well enough to go to church,'' especially at times of such high rejoicing. When the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster was enthroned I noticed working men in side niches, in high galleries, but not in the chief seats. Not the enormous majority of those present. But here dress does not count, at least did not when Mons. D. Alessandro Lualdi received this enthusiastic welcome to Palermo. It was a touching sight—the interior of the cathedral that day—the entire floor filled with artisans, men who earn their living, and a scanty one as a rule, by their daily labour, and all so orderly, self-respecting, brothers of Christ, and of the highest in his church. And their little boys of from five to fifteen! There they were standing on the costly inlaid altar rails, perched high on the top of confessional boxes, clinging to saints and angels wherever they could find a place from which to see over the heads of their elders. Many of them were far from washed and combed for the occasion. Their boots or shoes were white with dust or mud. Yet on costliest mosaic, in the niche of loveliest shrine, with arms or legs twined about sculptured seraph. No one rebuked them! One thought of "Suffer them, forbid them not, of such is the kingdom." Into this midst, preceded by chanting choirs, with the great bells ringing pæan overhead, and organ triumphantly expressing the gladness of the throng, the really fine, noble-looking archbishop came up the nave to his throne. Then our guardian, with many bows and handshakes, left us. He had been courteous to us for three hours. We had never seen him before. We have not seen him since. We do not know who or whence he was.

Two days later this new archbishop was enthroned. Again the day was great. Bishops, not a few, wearing their mitres, canons, priests, religious orders of various names and garbs came to honour the occasion and assist in the long ceremonial. But what impressed me as remarkable at this function was the presence and participation in it of clerics of the Orthodox Greek Church. In fact, not far from Palermo there is an old Albanian community of Greek Christians whose members fraternise with the Romanists in their midst. On high occasions here Greek seminarists and priests join the heretical seceders from their faith to give volume, if not sanction, to the religious ceremonials. So likewise, when Unitarianism attains its final ascendency, the scattered fragments of an older orthodoxy will be welcomed to swell the scenic impressiveness of its high occasions. To see their new archbishop enthroned, the cathedral once more was thronged. Again the poor in apparel were in evidence, but in their midst the well-dressed man of business or of a profession. The rows of chairs on the floor were too close to each other to prevent any kneeling. But from 10.30 to 1.30 attention did not flag as one splendid robe after another, each symbolical of something unknown to the outsider and heathen, was laid on the broad shoulders of Mons. Lualdi. He is a finely formed man, with a pleasant face, well rounded, and coloured. It says at once, "I am no ascetic." It also says, "I am strong of will, quite capable of doing the work here given me without faltering or misgiving." One who has known him at Rome tells me, "He is a very decent man, but ambitious." His ambition, if it be to keep and tend the sheep here given him—the poor, the labourers, the lowly, those whom worldly ambition fleeces as best it can, such people, though not so degraded as those General Booth is ambitious to keep from perdition in other lands—will bring the blessing these Palermitans seem to expect, and the only one a decent man's ambition would care to confer. The best thing to be said, perhaps, for this new man is that his face, though younger, is not unlike that of the Pope who has appointed him, and that he has something of the Pope's more free and democratic spirit.

DO UNITARIANS NEED A REVIVAL?

To this query there can be but one solution. We sadly need the vivifying forces and the Divine illumination of our whole religious fabric. A new touch of brotherhood, deeper consecration, and spiritual regeneration—these are our crying needs. Withering indifference and sordid materialism are creeping with their benumbing touch into our churches, and we want a reawakening to arrest the deadening process. Unitarianism is a beautiful faith, divine as Christianity—we are all agreed in making this statement—but to many a Unitarian it is a dead faith, one locked amongst the treasures, which are dearly valued but seldom used. In declaring without hesitation that we need a revival the statement is not meant to convey that the theology, or even the methods, of other churches, should be adopted by Unitarians. We want religion to become the primary consideration, the central factor of life. We want our faith to be based on the distinctly spiritual elements of the human soul. How can this much desired consummation be achieved? Surely not by the assumption of self-righteousness, and intellectual superiority, and the condemnation of excellent work done, for example, in Wales at the present time. By ejaculations which savour of hypocrisy—such as "this kind of thing is not for us"—we put ourselves out of tune with the forces of life that move so mysteriously in this age.

Revival in Wales.

The Rev. George Critchley, in an able article which appeared in your columns a few weeks ago on "Revivalism," stated, "It is not wholesome religion." Examine briefly what power this religion which he stigmatises as "not wholesome" actually possesses. During three months or so over 77,000 persons in Wales have been induced by it to make an effort to lead a clean life. In the old theological phraseology they have been born again. In this vast army of new recruits are numbered some of the vilest specimens of humanity, the dregs picked from the defiled cesspools of guilt and shame and immorality, the social pariahs, and the degraded, that make the streets of our large towns hideous at night. At Cardiff, late one night, from fifty to sixty of the fallen ones were gathered in from the streets into one of the churches. The tales these outcasts told were fearful in their pathos. They promised amendment if the world would only give them a chance. A refuge could be found for half a dozen only at the Salvation Army Home; the rest had to be allowed to drift back again no one knew whither. Principal Edwards and Mrs. Edwards often take some of these unfortunate ones into their own home, until a proper shelter can be found. The need of accommodation being so forcibly demonstrated, four houses have been opened in Cardiff alone, where the fallen can be sheltered until they are strong enough to make a new start. Hundreds of children enjoyed a happy Christmas last year for the first time in their experience. They possessed warm clothing, comfortable homes, Christmas fare, and sober parents to attend to their wants. And the religion that is capable of bringing the touch of brotherhood, cleanliness, and love into the life of so many people, and is instrumental in converting desolate houses into real homes for hundreds of children is stigmatised as "not wholesome," but "vociferous appeals to strange passions."

The Rev. Hugh Black informed his congregation that he went to Wales to test the Revival, but found to his dismay that he himself was tested. A similar confession is made by thousands of church members. Nominally they were Christians, but it is since the advent of this spiritual awakening they have commenced to live a truly Christian life. Ministers who have preached the Gospel for twenty years suddenly awake to the terrible realisation that they have filled their high office perfunctorily. Instead of delivering a living message from hearts aflame with love for humanity, a message that would find a quick response in the hearts of the hearers, they find that familiarity with sacred things and the vulgarising touch of worldliness had quenched the living flame in their souls. But the Revival has fanned the dying embers into a fire—a fire, they feel, that shall never be quenched. In view of such testimony, does it not sound somewhat ungracious and hypercritical to condemn the exaggerations, and hover fussily around the accidental fringes of a great movement, instead of recognising the Divine element in it, and acknowledging freely that at the core the Spirit of God is moving graciously? The words of Canon Cremer, as reported in the Manchester Guardian, on February 22, and spoken to a number of Manchester clergymen, seem applicable to us. "To point to the exaggerations and hysterical symptoms which had accompanied the revival in different places was surely a foolish, unkind, and graceless task. Was there any good thing without imperfections? It was impossible for any human manifestation of religion to be perfect."

In justification of the severe condemnation passed on the exaggerations of the Revival, the words of Jesus have been quoted more than once. "The Kingdom of God cometh not with observation." The same thing can be said of "moral suicide" and "spiritual atrophy." They come whether we lie in wait for them or not, but they are none the less real and terrible on that account. Would not another saying of Jesus be more to the point, "By their fruits (and not the accidents) ye shall know them"? The vitally important thing is that the Kingdom of God should come, either with or without observation.

A Little Fire Needed.

Mr. Critchley confesses that "a little fire would not do us any harm." The Rev.

W. Whitaker, of Cardiff, has discovered in the Revival in Wales a very significant suggestion, viz., "That the ways of the Spirit are not yet exhausted!" This is certainly a most remarkable statement for a minister of the Gospel to make. Mr. Whitaker thus proceeds:—"There may be—there must be if some of our dearest faiths are not to turn out lying mockeries—for England a revolution in its spiritual condition;" which, being interpreted, surely means—England needs a Revival. About four years ago the governing body of the Manchester Unitarian Association sent out a circular urging the necessity of deepening the spiritual life of the constituent churches. The Pastoral Letter sent by the Triennial Conference to the Churches about two years ago emphasised the same need, and recommended a more regular attendance at divine worship. There is practical unanimity with regard to the need of a revival. Social worship of God is not a source of gladness, but often undertaken with considerable reluctance. The grand spiritual realities of our faith do not appeal with sufficient force and vividness to their nominal upholders. Unitarians need spiritual regeneration. We have experienced the intellectual baptism (at least, most Unitarians nurse this conceit), we now require to be baptized with the Holy Spirit and with fire. Jesus said, "Ask, and it shall be given you." Can we ask with sufficient earnestness and consecrated purpose? Unless we seek, conscious of finding, our labour will be in vain.

Tentative Suggestions.

I venture to make the following suggestions in a tentative manner. (a) Would it be out of place in a free church, if a few of our earnest ministers were sent on missionary tours to the different centres to demonstrate by a week's mission the need of spiritual awakening, and to point out, not that others disseminate spurious theology, but that Unitarians have wandered to the borderland of materialism and agnosticism, and stand in need of reviving their faith in a living God, who is a Heavenly Father, a true Friend, and Comforter? (b) In addition to the Sunday services, is it not possible to open our churches at least once a week, when the members should make an effort to meet in a less formal manner than on Sunday, and looking each other in the face give expression to our most sacred convictions and experiences, and in this way build each other up in a religious sense and prepare our hearts and minds for the manifestations of the Divine Spirit in answer to our appeals? Some may object to the above suggestions as savouring of orthodox methods. But the seed must be sown if there is to be a spiritual garnering, and we should not be afraid of new methods if thereby the Kingdom of God and His righteousness are to be realised. Jenkyn Thomas.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

Annual Meeting.

The annual meeting was held in the Council Room at Essex Hall, on Saturday evening, March 4. Tea and coffee were served at 6 o'clock, the members and friends being received by the President, Mr. John Harrison.

The President, in taking the chair for the business meeting, expressed his great pleasure in being present, and his regret that illness had prevented him from taking part in the year's work as he had wished.

Mr. Ion Pritchard, as treasurer, presented the accounts. The general account showed a balance of £1 4s. 6d. in hand, the subscriptions amounting to £17 19s. 6d., and the total receipts to £31 9s. The cost of the musical festival, £9 14s. 9d., had been for the first time more than met by receipts (£11 1s. 2d.). The accounts for the Southend Holiday Home were less satisfactory, for there was a balance of £25 9s. 6d. due. The year's maintenance had cost £127 1s. 10d. The annual subscriptions, amounting to £76 8s., were not so disappointing as they might seem, for Lady O'Hagan had for several years subscribed £25, but with the intimation that this would not be continued. She now subscribed £5 5s., and the deficiency must be made up. He gratefully acknowledged the contribution of £10 10s. from the Laymen's Club, the proceeds of a concert given on behalf of the Home, and urged the necessity of securing more annual subscribers.

Mr. Alec Barnes, hon. sec., read the Committee's report, which recorded a year of steady activity, and referred with special satisfaction to a new departure in the holding of United Teachers' Conferences, after the example of the Oxford Summer Session Conference. One such meeting had been held at Stamford-street, November 26; a second at Unity Church, Islington, February 11. Particulars of the year's general meetings were given, and the advantages of the Southend Holiday Home were emphasised. There had not been so many guests as in the previous year. The Committee reported with regret that Miss A. J. Lawrence had felt obliged to resign her treasurership of the Country Holiday Fund, and reported her suggestion that as their children now could have the full benefit of the larger society, there was not sufficient reason for continuing their separate effort. A sub-committee had carefully considered the matter and it had been decided to discontinue this branch of work. In the past year 382 children from 16 schools had enjoyed the fortnight's holiday in the country. An adverse balance of £36 had been met by generous response to a special appeal. The Oxford Summer Session last July, though not so largely attended, had been as successful as any held, and it was intended to hold the next session in 1906. It was noted that the elected delegates from the schools had not attended the meetings of the Committee as regularly as could be wished, some never having been present, and the report concluded with an earnest appeal for more teachers.

Mr. F. E. Allen read his Visitor's report on the work of the schools, in the course of which he spoke warmly of the value of the publications of the Sunday School Association. He noted with pleasure a more general activity in allied institutions, such as library, Band of Hope and Mercy, gymnasium, guild, and savings bank.

Mr. Barnes read the report of the Country Holiday Fund, and Mr. Ion Pritchard of the Southend Home. In doing so, Mr. Pritchard spoke warmly of the services rendered by Mr. J. Murrow, the local hon. secretary at Southend, and proposed a vote of thanks to him, which was cordially passed.

The President moved, and the Rev. F. W. Stanley seconded, the adoption of the reports and accounts, and in doing so the President emphasised some of the chief points of interest in the reports, and the chief needs of the work.

On the motion of the President, seconded by Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. Alec Barnes, who had served for twenty years as Secretary, was elected President; Mr. Ion Pritchard was re-elected Treasurer, and Mr. R. A. Wooding, LL.B., was elected Secretary. Mr. A. Savage Cooper as Auditor, and six members of the Committee, were also elected.

The Work of the Sunday-School.

The Rev. Addison A. Charlesworth then gave an eloquent and earnest address on the work of the Sunday-school. He had nothing new to say on that subject, he said, no new light to throw on the great problems with which they were chiefly concerned. But even to look at old problems in familiar ways might not be without interest and profit when the problems lay close to the heart of life's reality. What is the end, the object of our schools and the work there? he asked. Certainly not merely to amuse the children for an idle hour on Sunday. He recalled the days before elementary education was general, and spoke of the devoted work done in the Unitarian schools in Birmingham to meet that need, both on Sundays and week-days. There was still need for the spirit of those times, and for that sense of a great urgency calling them to the service of the young, although they had no longer to teach the same subjects.

The school was closely connected with the church, it was an expression of the church's own spirit. That which made the church necessary made the school necessary. It had the same end in view. The Sunday-school was not a school of theology, its chief purpose was not in tracing and teaching the history or metaphysic of dogma. In a well-conducted school dogma was not heard of, until it appeared in the questioning mind of the young people; then it had to be met and seriously dealt with. Generally it was quite subordinate, as it was in the church. Nor was the school organised chiefly for ethical culture. It was not inspired by the unsatisfying and rather hopeless infinite of duty. To him the meaning and value of the school and its purpose lay in religion. It was concerned, as the church was, with religion, the interpretation in simple and interesting ways of their spiritual consciousness to growing boys and girls and young men and women, the interpretation of their life under the illumination and inspiration of the conception of God. Their consciousness of a higher righteousness, a loftier good, their aspirations and ideals were brought home to them as the very revelation, the coming into their lives of God. They were led to see that in being true to those higher thoughts and ideals they were brought into oneness with the will of God, and so God Himself was in their life; they were realising and expressing the Divine thought and will and love. God was the inspiration of their lives, incarnate in them: so they were led to see their lives as divine. That had its relation to the conception of ethical duty. Being taught to give themselves simply to that Divine, which was in contact with their consciousness, they had given themselves to that to which duty only pointed. They had given themselves implicitly to that which was already perfect, and so, instead of the hopelessness of morally realising the ideal in themselves, they had the consciousness that the battle in a sense was already won, that they had attained and were at one with the infinite Goodness. That was the great truth in the old dogma of justification by faith. Through such experience they had a new spirit and courage to face the detailed duties of life. That was the very essence of the mission they had in their churches and schools, and it was to get that conception, in such ways as they individually realised it, into the minds and hearts of the boys and girls and young men and women, which was the great end of their work as Sunday-school teachers.

That meant a sense of great responsibility on the part of the teachers. Anything perfunctory became absolutely impossible; they were too conscious of the greatness of the work, of the mission placed in their hands. To go into class unprepared, or to take up the work in a perfunctory spirit, was to give to their scholars an impression of the unimportance of religion, which was the tragedy of so much Sunday-school work. No true teacher, any more than a minister, could go without preparation of mind and spirit. Every teacher must be imbued with the sense of God, and impassioned with the desire to make God real to the boys and girls. Education was not everything, though it was a good thing. Their work was a matter of contact of spirit with spirit, the touch of living faith in the hearts of those whom they would move, a making real of the ideal, a revelation of the God who was so real to them, and that could be done by those who had not much of what was called education, for they had the finest education of all, the education of the spirit.

In Orthodox schools with which he had been connected, there was a custom that at the close of school once a quarter, the teachers held a meeting with the elder scholars who cared to stay, for prayer, for a thinking over of their work in the presence of God, seeking together for the Divine inspiration and wisdom. There was no cant about it; it was the simple necessity of spirits that desired to do their work and get the right inspiration for it. He thought they might well adopt some such means for the expression of their desires and aspirations.

As to the finding of teachers, he always thought that if there was the right spirit in the church, and it was doing its work, the spirit in the church must find its expression in those who would feel the necessity of work among the young. Where teachers were not to be found, it was an implied criticism on the church. It was no doubt wise for schools to cultivate their own teachers. In one school he had known, the senior class, both on the boys' and girls' side, provided teachers to take the vacant classes, and each pupil in turn was required to give such a lesson before his own class and teacher as he would give if called upon to take a class in the school. His work was then criticised and he got to understand the right method of teaching.

Mr. Charlesworth also dwelt on the helpfulness of special religious services for the school, and the value of setting the choir to render special music; and also of training the children in habits of regular giving for some unselfish purpose, as a beautiful expression of their religion. It was best when the object was connected with children, and there must be no compulsion; they were trained to the love of spontaneous giving.

As to the attaching of the young to the churches, he believed that if the teacher worked in the school in the spirit he had tried to indicate, if the interest of the church was the interest of the school, and the same ideals and inspirations were in the teachers as in the minister, then the reality for which the church stood would become a necessity in the scholars' lives. The minister should be in close personal touch with teachers and scholars, and to this end the formation of a guild was of great value. They must feel that ministers and teachers were co-workers, inspired by the same ideals, helpers one of another, engaged in some of the finest and noblest and most essential work that was being done to-day. He concluded with the prayer that for schools and churches alike there might be a new outpouring of the Spirit of God, that they might be moved to fuller service, and more unselfish devotion.

In warmly thanking Mr. Charlesworth for his address, Mr. Ion Pritchard referred to the subject of special music for the school choirs, and commended Mr. Hugh Atkin's musical setting of some of the Parables. Mr. C. A. Ginever pleaded earnestly for direct religious teaching in the schools. Cordial votes of thanks were passed to Mr. Charlesworth and to the President, and the meeting was brought to a close.

Swinton.—The series of special Sunday evening services held by the Swinton congregation during February in the Pendlebury Co-operative Hall was successfully maintained; the attendances varied from 170 to 220. The first service, as we have already reported, was taken by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, at the last the Rev. W. E. George gave an address on "The Faith of a Free Church." At the close Mr. George and a member of the committee extended a very cordial invitation to all those present who were not already connected with the church to join the congregation in their usual Sunday services.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Departme should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdare.—At the Highland-place Chapel on Friday evening, March 3, a lecture on "Agnosticism and Religion" was given by the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, of Clifton. The Rev. R. J. Jones presided, and the audience numbered about 120. In the course of his lecture Dr. Warschauer noticed the loose way in which the term "Agnostic" was used, and concluded by adducing evidence for the existence of mind, will, and personality in the universe. The Rev. J. Morgan Jones (Congregationalist), in proposing a vote of thanks to the lecturer, spoke in high praise of Dr. Warschauer's answer to "God and My Neighbour."

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The eighth annual sermons were preached last Sunday by the Rev. W. C. Hall. According to custom an extra service was held in the afternoon, at which several sacred solos and new anthems were rendered. Considering the extremely inclement weather, the attendances were good; in the evening the church was almost crowded, and many friends from other Nonconformist churches in the town and district were present. Collections amounted to £8. Mr. Hall will preach his farewell sermons on the 19th inst.

Barnard Castle.—At the close of the evening service at the Free Christian Church, on March 5, which was conducted by Mr. Charles Bell, of Redcar, an illuminated address was presented to him in acknowledgment of his services to the congregation, extending over a period of more than fifty years, both as a preacher and in arranging for pulpit supplies. The chair was taken by Mr. George Lee, of York, and the presentation was made by Mr. A. Morton, the oldest member of the congregation. In acknowledging the presentation, Mr. Bell said that he had found much happiness in the duties which had fallen to him in connection with that congregation.

Crewe.—The addresses given during February by the Rev. H. Fisher Short on "God and My Neighbour" were followed with great interest by a congregation averaging about 130, and nearly half of these remained each evening after service, in response to Mr. Fisher Short's invitation to those who wished to ask questions on the subject dealt with. On the last evening a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Short for the way in which he had received and answered questions.

Derby. — The Friargate congregation is mourning the loss of Mr. William Henry Goodey, who died on Saturday, February 25, in his sixtieth year. Mr. Goodey was an Oxfordshire man, but had been in Derby for thirty-five years, in the employ of the same firm, that of Messrs. Longdon & Co., with whom he had risen to the position of managing director. He was greatly respected, and had done much to promote happy relations between employers and employed. A man of considerable reading and of generous disposition, he served as warden and treasurer of the Friargate congregation, and will be sadly missed. A funeral service was held in the chapel on Thursday, March 2, prior to cremation at Birmingham. The Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, who officiated, paid a warm tribute to their friend, as one whose life consecrated the common duties of the day, and hallowed the ordinary trades of life. He was "not slothful in business," but "fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

Glasgow.—The Rev. E. T. Russell reports the serious interest shown by the audiences which attended the series of doctrinal lectures he has given during the past months, under the M'Quaker Trust at Govan and Shettleston. After an hour's lecture on each occasion a considerable time was devoted to questions, and a large number of tracts were distributed.

Hull.—In reporting the last of Mr. Carpenter's lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" at the Royal Institution, the Hull Times, of March 4, had a friendly note expressing warm appreciation of the lectures, and in view of the great thirst for religious knowledge among the public, suggesting that Trinitarian bodies might also do something of the same kind to make people acquainted with the grounds of their belief.

Mossley.—On Sunday last the pulpit was occupied by Mr. Fred Duxbury, who in the afternoon recited Tennyson's "Enoch Arden' to a good congregation. Both services and recital were much appreciated.

Maidstone.—On Wednesday, March 1, the annual school winter treat and sale of work took place, when the results of much of the work of the winter months were in evidence. During the evening over two hundred and fifty persons were present. The first part of the programme, after tea, was mainly musical, and was carried out by the scholars. Mr. F. W. Ruck distributed the prizes and medals, and the meeting was also addressed by Mr. M. A. Ruck, the treasurer, Mr. A. J. Ellis, and the Rev. S. S. Brettell. Mr. Brettell sympathetically referred to the loss the school and congregation had sustained by the death of Miss Ellis, who was superintendent and secretary of the Sunday school. The sale of work, which was organised by the ladies of the Sewing Circle, produced a substantial sum.

Newchurch.—Memorable services were held last Sunday, when the Rev. J. E. Manning, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was the special preacher. His morning subject was "The Battle of Life," the evening subject, "The Broad and the Narrow Way." In the evening a special service of dedication was held, when no less than a hundred and fifteen new members were welcomed into the fellowship of the church. A special platform had been erected in front of the Communion, and here Mr. Manning was supported by the Rev. J. J. Shaw, minister, and Mr. H. Nuttall, president of the church. After his sermon, Mr. Manning spoke a few words of welcome, congratulation, and counsel to the dedicants, who occupied the first six rows of pews. Then came the hymn "Breathe on me, Breath of God," at the close of which Mr. Manning extended the right hand of fellowship to each individual, having first addressed the following words to each section:—"In the name of the committee and honoured minister of this church I welcome you into the fellowship of this church, and so into the wider fellowship of the church of God." The dedicatory prayer was then offered by the Rev. J. J. Shaw, and a truly memorable service was brought to a close. There was a large congregation, numbering about 400 people. On Monday evening, in the school-room, Mr. Manning delivered to about 250 people his lecture:—"What Unitarians believe about God." As on Sunday evening, many visitors from other local churches were present. The lecturer was at his best, and was followed throughout with the closest attention, and apparently with the keenest interest. The Rev. J. J. Shaw presided, and the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, of Rawtenstall, opened the meeting with prayer. At the close, Mr. H. Nuttall moved, and Miss A. A. Haworth seconded a vote of thanks to Mr. Manning, and to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The vote was received with enthusiasm. Mr. Manning also visited and addressed the scholars in the school on Sunday afternoon.

Portsmouth.—On Wednesday evening, March 1, a lecture was given in the High-street Chapel by the Rev. Charles Roper, of Manchester, Mr. C. F. Dear presiding. There was a good attendance. "The kind of revival most needed," was the subject of the lecture, and after contrasting the artificiality of the Torrey-Alexander Mission, when compared with the Revival in Wales, Mr. Roper dwelt on the moral effects which were evident in Wales, and went on to speak of more permanent results for the good of mankind which would arise from truer views of the divine order of the world and human life in communion with the divine. The revival most wanted, he said, was not the forcing of men to the penitent stool to pray and sing and confess, but the irresistible force of human brotherhood moving in the hearts of men, so that the anomalies of our national and civic life might be destroyed, the conditions of life amongst the poor improved, more civic energy and disinterestedness displayed, less money spent on armaments and more on education, the sweetening of the environment of our children so that they may develop into better men and women, and the care of the feeble and the aged. A revival which discarded the authority of church and book, and heeded only the living voice of God speaking in the hearts of our fellow-creatures.

Tavistock.—A successful sale of work in aid of the Abbey Chapel Renovation Fund, followed by a miscellaneous entertainment, was held in the Town Hall on Wednesday, March 1.

Yeovil.—A series of six Thursday evening addresses on "Religion To-day," is being given in the old Vicarage-street Chapel, which has been for some time closed. The first of the addresses was given on Feb. 16, by the Rev. Rudolf Davis, district minister. In the course of his address, he said that there never was a time when so many who read and thought for themselves were in the right way interested in matters of religion. The percentage of attendances at places of worship was not a criterion of the religion of a people. Much church and chapel-going was purely perfunctory and conventional. Much of the deepest religion of the day was outside all the churches, because the articles, creeds, confessions of faith and the general atmosphere of the worship were out of date, inconsistent with the actual experiences of life, out of harmony with the promptings of conscience, and the aspirations of the heart. He proceeded to speak of the larger conceptions of the universe, which now compelled a reconstruction of theological thought, and also made an earnest plea for the sympathetic consideration of other forms of religion beyond the circle of Christianity. The Western Chronicle devoted more than half a column to a report of the address.

CADBURY'S COCOA

THE ABSOLUTELY PURE COCOA

IS A FOOD-BEVERAGE THAT SUSTAINS THE SYSTEM IN STRENGTH AND HARDIHOOD, AND KEEPS THE BRAIN CLEAR AND ALERT FOR ALL EMERGENCIES.

"HEALTH" says:—"Cadbury's Cocoa has in a remarkable degree those natural elements of sustenance which give the system endurance and hardihood, building up muscle and bodily vigour."

N.B.—Cocoa is strongest when pure, but if treated with alkali a dark coloured article is produced, which appears stronger to the eye. Some doctors consider this addition of alkali to be injurious; it also destroys the delicate flavour. This can be detected by comparing the scent when a tin of Cadbury's Pure Cocoa and a tin of alkalied cocoa are freshly opened.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

CORRESPONDENTS are requested to note that from Monday next, March 20, until April 17, the Editor will be abroad, and that no communication for THE INQUIRER should be sent to his private address, but only to the office.

WE publish this week a letter from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie as to the meeting of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers to be held at Geneva at the end of August, and a preliminary programme. This will be found after our leader on the subject, and we trust that this will set many of our friends thinking and planning how they may this year work in their summer holiday abroad with attendance at the Geneva meetings. If sufficiently large parties can be organised, the cost of getting to Geneva and back will be comparatively small, and once there, friends will be free to go their own way.

WHAT shall that way be for those who take a fortnight's holiday before August 28—31, or after? And which would be wisest? Is the latter half of August or the first half of September likely to be best for a Swiss holiday? And how can those who have never been in Switzerland, and have to manage as economical a holiday as possible, best use those precious days? It will be necessary, for the sake of the cheap fares there and back to make Geneva the starting point and the point of return. Is it best simply to go up to Chamonix, or to some high place up the Rhone Valley? Or could one in a fortnight usefully take the train from Geneva to Lucerne, and then work one's way up to the Furca Pass over into the Rhone Valley and so down in stages to Geneva? Perhaps some friend who is at home in Switzerland will kindly furnish the novices who are turning over such questions in their minds, with some good advice. We will gladly find space for it within reason.

THE Japanese forces occupied Mukden on Friday of last week after a crushing defeat of the Russians in what is described as the greatest battle known to history. Lines extending over eighty or ninety miles, some 800,000 men engaged, the killed and wounded estimated at over 100,000 on the Russian side, and on the side of the victorious army at over 40,000; these are figures which stagger the imagination; but one ought not to shrink from the effort to realise something of the awful suffering entailed, the agony and desolation not only on the field itself, but in months and years to come, and in the home lands on both sides. Surely this must suffice as an awful lesson in the criminal insanity of such a war. One hoped at the beginning of the week that Kuropatkin would be completely enveloped and compelled to surrender with his whole force; but his shattered army has broken through to the North, and the conflict must be renewed, possibly over another 300 miles of country to Harbin. One gleam of hope there has been in the rumoured failure of the new Russian loan, which, added to the seething discontent of the country, may compel the Tsar at last to accept terms and make peace.

FOUR episcopal appointments were announced last week: Dr. Edward S. Talbot, Bishop of Rochester, to be Bishop of the new see of Southwark; Dr. J. R. Harmer, formerly domestic chaplain of Bishop Lightfoot at Durham, and since 1895 Bishop of Adelaide, to be Bishop of Rochester; Dr. C. S. Gibson, vicar of Leeds, to be Bishop of Gloucester, in succession to Dr. Ellicott, resigned; and the Rev. J. P. Hughes, M.A., vicar of Llantrisant, to be Bishop of Llandaff. With reference to Dr. Talbot's acceptance of the bishopric of Southwark the Guardian wrote last week :—

> His acceptance of this very exacting task with a minimum stipend, and a portion of the sum required yet to raise, will strengthen the affection which Dr. Talbot has gained from both clergy and laity in the new diocese, and also the admiration felt for him by Churchmen generally for his strenuous and sympathetic work among all classes. Southwark diocese, even when fairly launched and provided for in the matter of funds, can never give to its bishopric the support which a great municipality like Birmingham is able to offer; but no one has been more successful than Dr. Talbot in identifying the Church with all that is best in municipal and public life.

THE L.C.C. return of the homeless persons of the metropolis is probably incomplete, but as it stands it is a terrible exposure of the little success of our religion in dominating our civic life. That there are more of these hopeless creatures than there were a year ago is no more than is to be expected, for trade is worse. But there have been unemployed funds. It is true, though it is significant that the work of the Central Committee is stopped because the public has grown tired of subscribing. The numbers of the homeless are given as 1,869 men, 312 women. Two thousand one hundred and eighty one persons found under arches or walking the streets at the dead of night. Many of these doubtless are vicious or idle people who do not want to live decent lives. But without exception there was a time when they were not thus. They have fallen, perhaps have been pushed down into the mire. Surely the resources of humanity are equal to doing something better for them. Better still, if society would do something better with them before they fall.

THE framing of a national temperance policy was not the least important of the many subjects dealt with at the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches at their meetings in Manchester last week. A resolution was moved by Mr. George White, M.P., strongly condemning the Licensing Act. It urged the need of such an amendment as would substitute for existing compensation arrangements the granting of licences for a definite and short term without any claim to compensation, the establishment of a licensing authority representing the people that shall control the issue of licences in suitable areas, entire Sunday closing, closing on election days, and a great increase of the annual licence duties. Seconding the resolution, Mr. E. C. Rawlings urged the Churches to take a more serious and sustained interest in Temperance Reform. What they wanted was a direct veto by the people, and until they got that they would not be able to deal effectively with the drink evil. The resolution was carried.

The Examiner, which has throughout taken up an attitude of judicious criticism towards the Torrey-Alexander campaign, has a leader on "Revivalism and Theology,"[1] from which we take some sentences:—"The spirit of revivalism which is abroad just now is forcing to the front several questions of first-rate importance. Among these two, at least, are likely to cause some trouble, and need to be faced: — Is Revivalism necessarily bound up with an old-fashioned theology and an unscholarly interpretation of the Scriptures? The second is the converse of it: Is a liberal theology incompatible with the simple preaching of the Gospel? These questions may both be answered in the negative, though the simple negative is misleading, and does not convey the whole truth. . . . There is no reason to suppose that those who accept to the full the modern teaching as to Bible and Christian doctrine generally are more disloyal to Christ, or less anxious to bring men to knowledge of truth as it is in Him, than those whose thought on these things cast in moulds some half a century old." These last words are full of instruction as to the mental state of a community in which apology for Biblical criticism is still needed.

At his recent enthronement as the first Bishop of Birmingham Dr. Gore gave an impressive address, in which he spoke of the call of that new departure to the Church to do her own spiritual work better, and then added:—

But also, and as a direct consequence of this, our Church ought to make a more effective contribution to the whole corporate life of Birmingham, and bear more effective witness for righteousness and for God. No city has shown a better public spirit than Birmingham, but there is a danger in a city, like a Church, dwelling on its past. There is a danger of the due succession of men of public spirit failing, a danger that the best men, the men of richest gifts and opportunities, may fail to feel the call to public service as their fathers felt it. There are ugly spots and grave moral risks in the civic life of Birmingham, and of all other cities: and, like every society with a noble past, she needs fresh efforts, yes, a constant succession of fresh efforts, and from all classes of the community; and I do not hesitate to say that, as compared to other bodies, the Church of England has not played its proper part in the past in contributing to the civic life of Birmingham. Certainly as our own Church life becomes more vigorous, our contribution to the civic life, our public witness for righteousness, ought to become more vigorous also.

Claiming for the Church of England the right of independent action, the Bishop said that in seeking to do their own work better they would entertain no kind of desire to interfere in the life and work of others, and he continued:—

If I speak for myself, I must say that when, for my own inspiration, I think of great Birmingham Christians of the last generation, I think first of two names, neither of them of my own communion—the first a personal, spiritual influence of world-wide power and incomparable attractiveness, John Henry Newman; the second, the man who seemed to me to represent ideally the combination of a Christian prophet with a Christian citizen, I mean Robert W. Dale. Thus I, at least, cannot be half-hearted in my esteem of those who are not of my own communion.

At a subsequent meeting of welcome in the Birmingham Town Hall, the Rev. J. H. Jowett, as a representative Nonconformist, gave an address, in the course of which he said:—

I welcome Dr. Gore as a powerful addition to the social forces working in the common life of the city. No one can have even a slight familiarity with the life and work of Dr. Gore without recognising his great passion for social reform, and his ardent endeavour to enthrone the largest ideals in the government of the State. It is something to have a man coming into our midst—a man of massive and wealthy and sanctified endowments—who will proclaim the sacredness of civic service, and who will urge upon our gifted young men and women that there is no more hallowed form of labour than to invest their gifts for the common good. This city is by no means impoverished in its public men. I should say it is peculiarly and specially rich. But there are vast resources unused, untapped, untouched, and I, for one, am anticipating with confidence that the co-operative help of Dr. Gore will result in the unsealing of more of this wealth, and its consecration to the general welfare of the city.

A letter was also read from the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, who regretted that he was unable to be present, and heartily congratulated the city on having in its Bishop the constant presence of one "who had gained their deep respect and affection by his high character, his distinguished abilities, and his unselfish devotion."[2]

The Bishop of Birmingham, in replying to the addresses of welcome at the Town Hall, after his enthronement, having cordially responded to the Rev. J. H. Jowett's welcome on behalf of the Nonconformists, made the following reference to the possibilities of fellowship in the common study of Christianity: "There is another matter. I am quite sure, in the whole of Europe, there is going on an inquiry into the basis of our religion; an inquiry into the meaning and origin of Christianity which is strangely and wonderfully increasing, independent of the lines of demarcation between the different communions. There is a great community of scholarship growing up in Europe, which is being ministered to by Roman Catholics, Anglicans, by Greeks, even by Russians, by Lutherans, by members of all kinds of denominations, some ancient and some modern. Now, I believe profoundly in this fellowship of common study. Sir Oliver Lodge is here, and I am sure he will agree with me that there is a great movement of men's minds. There is in the vast variety of men a great and most sincere desire to re-examine the basis of moral and religious truth, on which we all alike stand. And I am quite sure that that examination cannot be too free, too common. What I want, so far as I may be allowed as a humble scholar to administer to it, what I should like to do is to bring together men of different kinds and different points of view, like Sir Oliver Lodge and Mr. Jowett and a great number of people who are interested in these religious questions, in order that we may meet freely face to face with one another, get to know one another better, on the ground on which we stand, for I am quite sure we are in a time of transition, and that the lines, both of union and division, in the future are not altogether those which have prevailed in the past. It is in this freedom, in the fellowship of a common study of what our religion means, that I see the great forces of reunion in the future, and I believe Mr. Jowett will agree with me in that."[2]

A session of the great gathering of the Evangelical Free Churches was devoted to the Sunday-school problem, than which there is not one of greater difficulty for all churches, orthodox and unorthodox alike. Underlying the words spoken was the tacit assumption which we none of us care to state openly—the confession of present and widespread failure, although one speaker was able to draw encouragement from the abundant criticism bestowed on the schools. The most trenchant speech seems to have been delivered by Alderman J. C. Meggitt, J.P., whose one desire was to have the work "thoroughly done" in contrast to the slovenly and perfunctory conduct which is so common. To this end, he held it essential to have officers specially trained and devoting their whole time to the work of the school. A reminiscence of the speaker's shows the nature of much of the teaching: "When I was a boy I was taught that the world was created in six literal days, and that all incidents mentioned in the Bible actually took place." He spoke of the terrible awakening when he first learnt that this was not the case, and of the thousands of scholars who had been made careless, indifferent, godless by the crude theology of their teachers.

Clearly, more adequately trained teachers are needed if the instruction in the Sunday schools is to be made of avail for life and godliness, for at the present time and in almost all Sunday schools the majority of the teachers neither know how to teach nor what to teach. Possibly Dr. Munro Gibson is too optimistic in his forecast of a time when "Educational experts would reckon the Sunday-school the most important and most promising field for the exercise of their talents. . . young ladies would devote themselves to special training for the work with the same enthusiasm as has been shown in qualifying for the nursing profession."[2] At present, at any rate, teaching a class on Sunday is not a profession, and is often a pastime; until this is altered we cannot hope for greater efficiency.

Dr. John Watson (Ian Maclaren) announced last year his intention of resigning the pastorate of the Sefton Park Presbyterian Church, Liverpool, which he has held since September, 1880, and last Monday evening he formally placed his resignation in the hands of the Presbytery, and it was accepted with great regret. In a valedictory address Dr. Watson, having spoken of the very prosperous condition of the church, claimed that he had worked with honesty in the sense that he had declared the truth according to the light given him and without fear of man. The reason why he was now returning to them his commission and ceasing from the regular ministry, was simply because he was worn out and could not go on. He had never been a strong man; he had always had to do his work with the hindrance of bodily weariness, and now his strength seemed to be nearly exhausted. The Lord Mayor of Liverpool, who is a member of Dr. Watson's church, said that the city would be the poorer for his resignation. His sermons had been an inspiration to business men.

A scheme for the creation of a Garden Suburb for London, at Hampstead Heath, has been made public. The promoters have the option of purchasing 240 acres of land surrounding the new extension of the Heath, and sloping towards the north-west. It is proposed to put within the reach of working people the opportunity of living in a cottage with a garden within a 2d. fare from the centre of London, at a rent possible for them to pay; to lay out the new suburb on an orderly plan, so as to retain as many advantages as possible for all residents; to provide houses for more wealthy persons who can pay £40—£150, as well as for cottages paying 7s. 6d. a week, so that there may be community of interests and better understanding among the classes, and not merely a suburb of one class of people; and to preserve natural beauty, so that not only the suburb itself shall be pleasant but the view of it from the Heath shall be in harmony with the general landscape.

Mrs. Barnett's name, as secretary for the scheme, is a guarantee of energy in its furtherance. Earl Grey was chairman of the Trust until his appointment as Governor-General of Canada. It is highly desirable that further extension of London should take place on Garden City lines in place of the long rows of monotonous houses, without general plan, and without much consideration for the comfort and pleasantness of life for the inhabitants which is the normal development of English towns. Those who would assist in such an enterprise by contributing capital, content with a moderate rate of interest, may get further information from Mrs. Barnett at Toynbee Hall, Whitechapel.

The Friends' Social Union has recently issued several useful leaflets, primarily intended for adult school readers, but well adapted for general distribution. The last batch of these includes:—The Problem of Poverty, by Mr. Seebohm Rowntree; Local Government, by Dr. George Newman; and What Adult Schools can do in the Villages, by the Organising Secretary of the A.S. National Council, Mr. Edwin Gilbert. They are published by Mr. Percy Alden, at 2s. 6d. per 100.

A lecture by the late Canon Ainger on "The Art of Conversation" appears in this month's Cornhill. It is full of good things, of which the following is a sample: "Some persons have no perception of what can, and what cannot, be attained in conversation, and will ask you questions requiring a month or two to consider, and then another month or two to answer, between the courses at a dinner party! I remember once a lady I sat next to asking me suddenly: 'Canon Ainger, what is your opinion of Carlyle?' Well, I hope I have been decently brought up, so I did not make the rejoinder which would have best expressed my feelings. I did not reply, 'Goodness gracious, madam, how can you ask such a preposterous question under such preposterous circumstances?' (I remember I was just beginning my fish.) For, you see, my neighbour was not even opening a discussion merely—in itself most improper at such a serious moment. She wanted, apparently, an encyclopædia article off-hand; and that, too, without my knowing (a thing in itself most important) the previous history (as a physician would say) 'of the case.' But there is a time for everything, the wise man has said, and there are times for discussion and times for conversation, and the two things are far from being the same thing. Conversation is wanted by most people as a healing agency after the rubs and the worries and the exhaustion of business or domestic cares; and discussion, if it brings mental activity into play, is often just what the overtaxed mind does not seek."

The enthusiasm of the alumni and friends of the Home Missionary College remains unabated. Both by means of public and congregational meetings, by special Sunday services and personal canvass, they are carrying on their work for their Jubilee Memorial scheme. Meetings have been held at Sheffield, Warrington, Stalybridge, Colne, Pendleton, and Blackley, and services at Moss Side and Newry. A great many more meetings have been arranged, and all this in addition to the series held last autumn.

Of the autumnal Jubilee meetings an interesting detailed report has just been issued, together with a further appeal and a statement as to the present position of the fund. The fund has now turned thirteen thousand pounds, and the subscription list represents over one thousand donors. Amongst the newly added names are those of Professor J. Estlin Carpenter, Revs. J. C. Odgers, F. E. Millson, Dr. Mummery, A. N. Blatchford, Mrs. G. Holt and Miss Holt, Mr. Henry Lupton, Mr. Edwin Tate, the Right Hon. Justice Andrews, the Right Hon. Mr. Thomas Andrews, the Right Hon. Sir Andrew M. Porter, Master of the Rolls in Ireland, Sir Robert Lloyd Patterson, Mr. Stanton Preston, Mr. T. B. Bowring, Mr. W. Gibson, and many others. It is very gratifying to note the great number of small subscribers in the list, and the promoters of the fund owe a great deal to the generosity and enthusiasm of Ireland which are shown in every one of the twenty pages of the subscription list.

THE CHRIST OF PAUL.

VII.

The Person of Jesus.

(Concluded.)

(6) The inquiry which has brought us to the ultimate subjection of the Son shows that at either extreme of his history he passes from the Apostle's view; his function has not begun, or it has ceased; and the field of eternity is occupied by God alone as source and goal of all things. He is the ground of their subsistence, the means of their growth, the end of their being. Has he, however, a partner in his nature? Did the Apostle conceive the Lord Jesus Christ to be also God? So far as the term "Lord" is concerned, it is admitted that "it does not in itself necessarily involve divinity"; * on the lips of Christians it "denotes the idea of 'Sovereignty' primarily over themselves as the society of believers (Col. i. 18, &c.), but also over all creation (Phil. ii. 10, 11; Col. i. 16, 17)." Neither can the title "Son of God" be claimed in proof of a metaphysical participation in Deity, in view, on the one hand, of its recognised Messianic significance with its probable derivation from Ps. ii. 7, and, on the other, of the free use of this designation to describe the soul that is surrendered to the divine guidance (Rom. viii. 14),—

For as many as are led by the spirit of God these are sons of God.

If the question is not settled by the specific phraseology of the Apostle it must be decided on more general grounds. It is noteworthy, for instance, that he nowhere employs the simple antithesis "the Father" and "the Son" as though both (in some sense) shared a common nature. "The Son" is named but once (1 Cor. xv. 28), and the counterpart in that passage is "God, even the Father" (Greek, "the God and Father"); Paul nowhere writes "God, even the Son." Beside "God the Father" or "God our Father" the Apostle sets "and the Lord Jesus Christ" in obvious distinctness. This is a regular and solemn formula in salutations (Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 3; 2 Cor. i. 2; Gal. i. 3; Phil. i. 2; 1 Thess. i. 1). Its uniformity is, however, broken by some changes: thus Gal. i. 1,—

Jesus Christ and God the Father who raised him from the dead:

or, again (Rom. xv. 6; 2 Cor. i. 3; xi. 31), with a definiteness that seems decisive,—

The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.†

Had Paul conceived of Jesus as God, almighty, self-existent, in what sense could he have spoken of the Father as his God. That the Deity of the Father is an ever present thought to the apostle, all readers of his letters will readily admit. It is his emphatic declaration, as we have seen, that to Christians there is but one God, the Father (1 Cor. viii. 6); and the ascription to Christ of the separate title Lord appears designed to prevent any encroachment upon the nature of him who is God alone. So he is the ultimate object of praise (Phil. iv. 19, 20),—

* Professor Sanday and Rev. A. C. Headlam, "Romans," p. 10.

† Sanday and Headlam here reject the rendering of Meyer, Liddon, and others, "God even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."

My God shall fulfil every need of yours, according to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus. Now unto our God and Father be the glory for ever and ever.*

And with even greater emphasis, Rom. xvi. 27,—

To the only wise God, through Jesus Christ, be glory for ever.†

Through almost every conceivable mode of expression does the distinction here implied find utterance. Paul commends the Thessalonians for their "labour of love and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ before our God and Father" (1 Thess. i. 3); he prays that "our God and Father himself, and our Lord Jesus" may direct his way unto them (iii. 11), or that they may be established unblamable "before our God and Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus with all his saints" (iii. 13). Instead of affirming that Christ was God, he tells the Corinthians that "God was in Christ" (2 Cor. v. 19);‡ or that "God hath shined in our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (iv. 6);§ or that "he who stablished us with you into Christ and anointed us is God" (i. 21). Twice does he in emphatic terms lay out the ascending scale (1 Cor. iii. 21, 23; xi. 3),—

All things are yours . . . . and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's.

The head of every man is Christ, ... and the head of Christ is God.

Into the triumph-song of "the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God" (Rom. xi. 33-36), no other name is admitted; overwhelmed with the divine majesty filling all space and time, he can only conclude—

For of him, and through him, and unto him, are all things. To him be the glory for ever. Amen.

What, then, is the significance of another doxology in Rom. ix. 5? The passage is thus translated in the Revised Version:—

For I could wish that I myself were anathema from Christ for my brethren's sake, my kinsmen according to the flesh: who are Israelites; whose is the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises; whose are the fathers, and of whom is Christ as concerning the flesh, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.

Yearning over his race, recalling the long history of their preparation in law and prophecy for the Messiah's day, Paul looks with grief on the possibility that because they have rejected Jesus they may be rejected in their turn. How great the calamity that the chosen people should be false to the purpose of their election! Ah, could he save them, how willingly would he be "anathema from Christ" for their sakes. Theirs were the covenants and the promises, theirs were the patriarchs, and of them was the Messiah according to the flesh. If the words that follow are correctly referred to Christ, two things are affirmed of him: (1) that he is over all; (2) that he is "God blessed for ever." But the early manuscripts used by the Christians had no stops, and the words may therefore be divided in several other ways, as the Revisers' margin shows:—

Whose are the fathers, and of whom is Christ as concerning the flesh. He who is God over all be (is) blessed for ever.

Whose are the fathers and of whom is Christ as concerning the flesh. He who is over all is God, blessed for ever.

Whose are the fathers, and of whom is Christ as concerning the flesh who is over all. God be (is) blessed for ever.

Some other slight variations have been proposed; but for our purpose all translations may be reduced to two groups, those which identify Christ with "God blessed for ever," and those which do not. Where eminent scholars have come to such different conclusions, it cannot be said that the words themselves contain anything absolute and final. In the important note of Prof. Sanday and Mr. Headlam it is pointed out "that the question is one of interpretation, and not of criticism."* It is natural, therefore, that those who approach the words along different paths of inquiry should form different estimates of their significance. In no other passage does Paul apply the name "God" to Christ. In view of the gradations which we have already traced between the Christian, his Lord, and God the Father, we may ask whether it is likely that the Apostle does so here. Whatever may be the case in the early decades of the second century, "it must be admitted," say our commentators, "that we should not expect it in so early an Epistle as the Romans." One theologian, like Principal Fairbairn,† finds in it the natural culmination of the Apostle's thought. Another, the late Prof. Jowett, decided otherwise, and partly on the ground that "had St. Paul ever spoken of Christ as God he would many times have spoken of him as such, not once only, and that by accident." The lamented Dr. Bruce refrains from expressing such definite conclusions, and contents himself with the cautious remark, "On the whole, in spite of personal predilection, one is constrained, after perusal of learned monographs, to admit that the bearing of this famous text on the deity of Christ is by no means so certain as at one time he may have been disposed to think."* With the distinguished Oxford scholars already named we must allow "that there is no impossibility either in the word or the ideas expressed by the word occurring so early." But there is a wide interval between the impossible and the improbable. The tenor of the Apostle's thought tends to maintain a constant distinction between God and Christ; his subordination of the Son to the Father is generally acknowledged;‡ and how is such subordination compatible with the recognition of them both as God? Could Paul have conceived the Father as possessing more Deity than the Son, or have distributed the Godhead between unequal members? Doxologies (of a similar, though not identical, type) are not unknown elsewhere in the Apostle's correspondence (e.g., Rom. i. 25; 2 Cor. xi. 31); and the closing words of Rom. xvi. 27, already quoted, emphatically mark off Jesus Christ from "the only wise God."

(b) The same general considerations must govern the interpretation of the benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 14),—

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the holy spirit, be with you all.

Three names, it is true, are here associated; must we infer that "the three august Beings here spoken of are bound together by the tie of a common divine nature?"* There is nothing in the terminology to suggest it. The Apostle desires for his Corinthian converts that they may possess the favour of their heavenly lord, feel the love of God who forgives and sustains them, and share in the gifts of the spirit. We have seen that Jesus Christ is the personal medium through whom the divine blessings are transmitted; he is himself the great manifestation of the love of God; — as he is also by nature spirit. How far the holy spirit can be regarded as a separate being in the thought of Paul is doubtful. In some passages it seems to be a divine energy or power; in another it is boldly identified with the Lord; elsewhere it seems equivalent to God (1 Cor. xii. 4-6),—

Now there are diversities of gifts but the same spirit. And there are diversities of ministrations, and the same Lord. And there are diversities of workings, but the same God, who worketh all things in all.

Here are the same three terms; but the first, which there carries no personal significance, is practically unified immediately afterwards with the third (ver. 11):—

All these worketh one and the self same Spirit, dividing to each one severally even as he will.

The fact is that the religious idiom of the Apostle is largely his own creation. It springs out of the struggle of his ideas and emotions to find adequate utterance. His expressions are not the product of a systematising mind. He had to feel his way by degrees, and he did not escape occasional incongruities. He apprehended certain great spiritual conceptions with passionate intensity, but he did not define them clearly. The share which he ascribed to Jesus Christ in changing the whole character of his inner life, became the basis of a far-reaching construction of the power of Jesus. This was confirmed by a wider experience, and his estimate of the nature and functions of Christ tended to acquire a still warmer glow. But it was not, after all, framed along the lines which the Church ultimately adopted. The conception of the man "of heaven" did not gain a fixed place in the religious imagination of early Christianity: could the disciples of Paul succeed in replacing it by any more permanent form?

LITERATURE.

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW STORY.*

Like "Lady Rose's Daughter," Mrs. Humphry Ward's new story, "The Marriage of William Ashe" is concerned exclusively with people who move in the "highest society," in a generation belonging not exactly to our own day, but somewhere in the latter half of the nineteenth century. Once again the heroine is a remarkable young woman, of brilliant and fascinating powers, of aristocratic but unwholesome origin, and the story this time has an altogether tragic ending. The dramatic interest is sustained with great power from beginning to end, and there is abundant genius in the portraiture; but less even than in "Lady Rose's Daughter" are we permitted here glimpses of the nobler elements of life. The books are undoubtedly popular. Of "Lady Rose's Daughter" we are told that 165,000 copies have been sold, and of the new book the first impression was sold out before the day of publication. Yet we earnestly hope that Mrs. Ward will feel that this vein is now sufficiently worked out, and that she will take us next into some more refreshing places in the great field of human life.

William Ashe, a rising politician and heir to a peerage, comes upon the scene after a successful election, and is appointed Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Liberal Government. After a three weeks' acquaintance he becomes engaged to Lady Kitty Bristol, and the tragedy of the story is in the working out of her ungoverned impulses, which repeatedly threaten to ruin his political career, and do finally destroy their marriage, though the fatal act of desertion is at last brought about more by the crime of another and the despair of an over-wrought mind than by her own deliberate choice. She warned Ashe at the time of their engagement that she should make him miserable: "I have—a wicked, odious, ungovernable temper." "I have fancies—overpowering fancies—and I must follow them." "You don't know the mischief I can do. And I can't help it, it's in my blood." But Ashe is desperately in love, and, moved also by a generous pity, takes the risk. In the end, when he has found his wife again and she is dying—a scene of deep human tenderness and pathos—she says to him: "William, dear!—I haven't had a brain like other people. I know it. It's only since I've been so ill—that I've been sane! It's a strange feeling—as though one had been bled—and some poison had drained away." So the morbid strain in the whole story is acknowledged—due to a miserable origin and a bringing up which left the girl without any love or respect for either of her parents.

And over against this there is no higher influence set than that of her husband's character—a man of "ironic temper and easy standards."

As for loftier things, "self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control"—Duty—and the passion of high ideals—who was he to prate about them? The little Dean, perhaps!—most spiritual of worldlings. Ashe knew himself to be neither spiritual, nor a hypocrite. A certain measure, a certain order and harmony in life—laughter, and good humour, and affection—and, for the fight that makes and welds a man, those great political and social interests in the midst of which he found himself—he asked no more, and with these he would have been abundantly content.

But these he found, through bitter experience, were not sufficient, and towards the close of the story, when the blow has fallen, and he is questioning in miserable solitude what it was that weakened him with his wife and led to the catastrophe, he is pictured thus as canvassing his own character:—

> The Christian, no doubt, would say that his married life had failed, because God had been absent from it, because there had been in it no consciousness of higher law, of compelling grace.
> Ashe pondered what such things might mean. The Christian—in speculative belief—fails under the challenge of life as often as other men. Surely it depends on something infinitely more primitive and fundamental than Christianity?—something out of which Christianity itself springs? But this something—does it really exist—or am I only cheating myself by fancying it? Is it, as all the sages have said, the pursuit of some eternal Good, the identification of the self with it—the "dying to live"? And is this the real meaning at the heart of Christianity?—at the heart of all religion?—the everlasting meaning, let science play what havoc it pleases with outward forms and statements?
> Had he, perhaps, doubted the soul?
> He groaned aloud: "O my God, what matter that I should grow wise—if Kitty is lost and desolate?"
> And he trampled on his own thoughts, feeling them a mere hypocrisy and offence.

That is all the help that Mrs. Ward gives us in this story towards a solution of the painful discords of life, for on this stage no one appears of clearer insight or loftier aims than Ashe—unless it be the little Dean, who, in spite of his warm affections and earnest pleading for the forgiveness of love, hardly intervenes with commanding power. When at last Ashe has found his wife again and she has told him how she was finally entrapped to her ruin, he tried to comfort her, we are told.

> But what comfort could there be? They had been the victims of a crime as hideous as any murder; and yet—behind the crime—there stretched back into the past the preparation and antecedents by which they themselves, alack, had contributed to their own undoing. Had they not both trifled with the mysterious test of life?—he no less than she? And out of the dark had come the axe-stroke that ends weakness, and crushes the unsteeled inconstant will.

Eleanor, as Mrs. Ward has pictured her, in a very different tragedy from this, found the more perfect peace, when she learnt to say with deep conviction, "Ah! what is true, is the 'dying to live' of Christianity." But for William Ashe the end is simply recognition of the inevitable penalty of the "unsteeled, inconstant will," and the great tenderness of human love in the presence of pain—love and pity and forgiveness, and the great reconciler, Death.

DR. BROOKE HERFORD'S "EUTYCHUS."*

This little book, daintily bound and pleasantly printed, reproduces a number of papers contributed by Dr. Brooke Herford to the Unitarian Herald during the years 1860 and 1861, while he was minister at Upper Chapel, Sheffield. The last paper ends with an anecdote of an old minister. "A prim young Evangelical was rather shocked at him one day for what he thought unbecoming levity, and said with great surprise: 'Sir, are you a serious Christian?' 'No,' was Dr. M.'s prompt reply, 'No, sir, I am a jocose one.'" That is the spirit in which these papers were written and anonymously published by the young minister of thirty years, in the character of a layman who took the name of "Eutychus," and wrote with much sympathy of his ancestor, the young man who dropped off to sleep and fell out of a window, because "Paul was long preaching." The modern "Eutychus" begins with a paper on "A 'Lay' View of Sleeping in Church," and other of these "Pulpit and Pew Papers" are on "Some People who Always Come Late," "Praising God by Proxy" (about choirs), "A Country Tea Party," "A Rather Fastidious Congregation," "Overmuch Discourse," and "Parsonic Acid." There are eleven papers in all, and they touch with the writer's characteristic humour and good-nature on many of the weaknesses both of congregations and ministers. He wrote from intimate experience of congregations the most respectable and of the humblest in Lancashire and Cheshire, and there are some good stories from these days now so long ago. One of the best is of a little country chapel in Cheshire, where the singing was led by a young girl and an old man with a great venerable fiddle in the gallery. "Leading," however, is hardly the right word; for when the first hymn was given out, "Eutychus" relates:—

> After striking the chord, the old fiddler and the girl struck up together. It was a tune I had never heard—a fearful tune, full of strange twists and repetitions—a tune that seemed as if it would never come to an end. By the tattered music-book, towards which the old man's massive spectacles were turned, it must have been a tune that all the congregation had known from childhood, but no one joined in.
> But with the second hymn worse things happened. It was a complicated tune, and the girl with her thin treble went wrong.
> Whereupon the old man, who evidently had as much as he could do to keep right without the distraction of someone close by him going wrong, broke in upon the performance with a loud "stage aside," which was well heard all over the place—"Sit thee down!" and when the poor girl made one more fruitless attempt to get into the tune—"Sit thee down, I say; I conno' fiddle to thee!"

There is an amusing account of some of the candidates who came to preach before a country congregation, and a more serious passage telling of the minister who was ultimately chosen, a man somewhat unconventional in appearance, but with a kind of rugged strength about him, whose face lighted up in conversation, when the ice was broken, till his ungainly features had a fine and noble look. And when he preached, it was with simplicity and earnestness. The man was forgotten in his subject, for he spoke right to the heart and conscience.

* 'Eutychus and His Relations: Pulpit and Pew Papers." By Brooke Herford, D.D. (London: Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 2s. net.)

I never was more struck than on this occasion with the fact that even the most fastidious people are open to true and deep impressions, the moment religion is preached to them in a very earnest and simple way. Here was a man with half a dozen peculiarities, which would have repelled ordinary people, and yet they ceased to be noticed because he appeared to be really absorbed by the great thoughts of religion, and to long to reach the souls of his hearers. It was a sermon which seemed to make us all feel humbled, and yet there was nothing morbid or depressing in it; and, while holding up very high ideas of religion and of duty, it was spoken in a brave helpful tone which had an encouraging and invigorating effect upon the soul. I do think our preachers have it more in their own power to do a good work than they are generally aware of. For, at the bottom of all the fastidiousness and conventionality of which they complain as hindering their influence—even in those who seem most worldly and least open to religious impressions—there is a spiritual nature, with wants and longings deeper, perhaps, than ever find their way into words, ready to give a hearty response to anyone who will break through the superficial crust of reserve, and speak, not in timid propriety, to the critical mind, but with earnest conviction to the living soul beneath.

These are samples of the contents of this amusing little book, which will be found to have its serious uses also. Many friends will be glad to have it, as one more memorial of a life rich in genial wisdom and wholesome laughter, and its power of strong, helpful ministry.

We have received the first number of a new penny monthly paper, The Labour Record and Review, edited by Mr. F. W. Pethick Lawrence (19, St. Bride-street, London, E.C. Subscription by post, 2s. per annum). This March number opens with a very interesting character sketch of James Sexton, the Labour leader and Parliamentary candidate for the Central division of Hull. Mr. Sexton is president-elect of the Trade Union Congress to be held at Hanley this year. The Record is full of interesting matter, reporting Continental as well as British labour news, and having on its back page (p. 32) a list of Labour articles in the Reviews.

The "Religious Life" is the life of a Religious Soul, a spiritual vitality of being which runs along every line of its activity, puts duty into every link of its relations, and trembles through every fibre of its influence. It is the highest and finest activity of this Soul which we are, not which we have; for my soul is not mine, it is Me; it is, I repeat, the highest and finest activity of this Soul which we are, facing the Infinite, in contact with God, and taking by virtue of our own will the supreme control of all our responsible existence, which we call the Religious Life; and it is the actual realisation of this life which differentiates one man from another in the world far more clearly, for all noble human purposes, than any distinctions of race, colour, creed, social condition, intellectual capacity, or culture.—T. W. Freckelton.

OBITUARY.

REV. J. J. GEORGE.

The Rev. John Joseph George, who passed away at Aberdare on Friday, March 10, had been living in retirement for more than twenty years, but was still represented in the ministry by his son, the Rev. W. E. George, of Swinton. Born at Dudley, March 2, 1822, Mr. George was one of the earliest students of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board in Manchester, and on the completion of his course became, in 1860, minister at Warminster. Four years later he removed to Aberdare, as minister of the Highland Place congregation, and served there until, in 1882, the chapel was closed. On its re-opening, in 1890, he rendered considerable help as a faithful member of the congregation, occasionally occupying the pulpit, and Aberdare remained his home to the end.

Preaching on Sunday evening at Highland Place, the Rev. D. J. Williams, of Merthyr, referred to the loss sustained by the congregation in the death of their former pastor, whom they looked up to as an exemplar of Christian virtue. At the close of the service a vote of condolence with Mrs. George and her children was passed, on the motion of Mr. J. W. McEwen, seconded by Councillor L. N. Williams. The Dead March in Saul was played.

The interment was on Tuesday, at the Aberdare cemetery, when the Rev. R. J. Jones, of the Old Meeting, officiated.

MRS. LUCKING TAVENER.

We regret to record the death of Mrs. Tavener, the wife of the Rev. Lucking Tavener, which took place at Ipswich on Wednesday, March 8. She had been ailing for several months past, but it was not until a few weeks ago that her malady, which was internal cancer, became acute. From her childhood Mrs. Tavener had been associated with religious work, and she endeavoured to keep in touch with those whom she instructed. Members of classes which she took many years ago made anxious inquiries after her during her illness, and she sent messages to them from her sick bed. For some years she was engaged in work in the Baptist denomination, and later she was leader of a Bible class at the Brotherhood Church, Southgate-road, London. She followed her husband with deep sympathy, and strengthened him in his time of theological difficulty and his search for light. And throughout their wedded life she was a helpful companion. Although she had the care of a family upon her, she took a keen interest in the various institutions and meetings both at the Stepney and the Ipswich Chapels. After meeting many people, as we do to-day, to whom religion makes no strong appeal and in whom the sense of God is feeble, it was delightful to hear her speak of Him with the frankness and confidence of a child. She had no doubt as to His presence and love in the world. She felt Him near, and one could see that she strove to order not only her outer life, but her inner life of thought and feeling as in His presence. There was no ostentation in her religion, though she did not hesitate to speak of it, and it needed no great insight to perceive that hers was a devotional mind. When her pain was severest, and she realised that her strength was ebbing away, she turned to those about her and said with cheerfulness, "The valley is not dark." In her heart she bore the sufferings of the poor and needy, and many found in her a kind friend. The social problems of our time interested her. She will be remembered for her devotedness as a wife and mother, for her patience and endurance; but if her life taught us anything it was to believe in God. She leaves five children, the youngest of whom is seven. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall in the Friars-street Chapel, Ipswich, on Saturday, March 11, when there was a large gathering of friends. A. H.

THE JOWETT LECTURES.

The second of the present course of Jowett Lectures on "The Earliest Sources of the Life of Jesus: a Study of the Literary Relations and the Historical Value of the First Three Gospels," was given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter at the Passmore Edwards' Settlement, Tavistock-place, on Wednesday evening.

The subject of the lecture was "The Literary Relations of the First Three Gospels." It was clear, the lecturer said, that Justin Martyr, in the middle of the second century, used our first three Gospels; but could we be sure that he had those Gospels in the exact form in which they have come down to us? And then he gave examples of how the text has been modified; e.g., the acknowledgment of Jesus as Messiah at Cæsarea Philippi, where our Matthew makes Jesus add: "Thou art Peter, and on this rock will I build my church," &c. That verse was not in the Gospel as Tatian used it for his Harmony, nor can Irenæus have found it in the Gospel, for in his eager championship of the claims of Rome he quotes the beginning of the passage, but stops short at the words which would have been his strongest evidence. The verse first appears at the end of the third century at the time of the great controversy on the primacy of Rome. So, too, with the triple baptismal formula in the last chapter of Matthew. Mr. Conybeare had shown how the Gospel as Eusebius had it contained the simpler form, "Baptize in my name," with nothing about Father, Son, and Spirit, which was a later addition to the text, at a time of controversy in the fourth century. Sometimes a late addition to the text such as the story of the guilty woman brought to Jesus, in John vii., established itself; other additions failed to do so, such as the remarkable verse found in the famous Beza MS. at Cambridge, about the Sabbath breaker.

Having described the relative position of the synoptic gospels, Mark being the earliest, of date soon after 70 A.D. and Luke and Matthew between that time and 100 A.D., Mr. Carpenter spoke of the different materials from which they were composed, showing the dependence of the other two on Mark, and on another source or sources, not merely oral traditions, but written records. He also showed how, while the original tradition of the teaching was in Aramaic, the language Jesus used, the gospels we have were from the first written in Greek.

Other interesting points he touched upon, with ample illustration, and in conclusion referred to the striking parallel to be found in the lives of the Persian Bab. The first life of the Bab, who was executed in 1850, was written by a disciple who was himself put to death two years later. This was for some time lost sight of, but another life was written in 1880. In this country there are two copies of this later life dated 1888, and already one sees variations introduced, tending to magnify the chief figure and the miraculous element in the story. How this process is traced in our Gospels subsequent lectures will show. The subject of the lecture next Wednesday is "The World of the Jew," and the subsequent lectures up to Easter are as follows:—March 29, "The World of the Gentile"; April 5, "The Messianic Idea"; April 12, "The Messiah's Career: the Baptism, Temptation, and Transfiguration"; April 19, "The Virgin Birth and the Ascension." In Easter week there will be no lecture, and the first three Wednesdays in May will be devoted to the first three Gospels, not in their conventional order, but chronologically, Mark, Luke, Matthew. The lectures are freely open to the public.

THE FIRST FAINT FLUSH.

Marvel of marvels! How from out the wintry shield
Of Nature comes the first faint flush of green!
The avenue its ashy brown must yield,
As creeps the tiniest lightest touch e'er seen,
On every tree and field.

Then slowly, oh! how slowly, but how sure,
The greys and browns give way—and now is seen
Across the branching trees, wide arching o'er,
A veil most delicate of purest green
That cheers our hearts yet more.

The sun sets in a sky of orange-gold,
As clear as only wind-swept March can give,
The scattered houses on the hill stand high,
In purple shades that only are achieved
When Nature takes her hold.

Through winter days our hearts have learnt to sing
Of patience and of hope, while well we knew
That soon a louder song of gratitude would ring,
As buds, and sky, and breeze unite to tell
That now we have the Spring!

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN

Tom was very fond of drawing; and when, in school, the teacher dictated the sums that the children were to do, instead of writing them down, he began to draw on his slate. Betty sat next to him, and saw what he was doing, and she told him to be quick else the teacher would be round; but Tom went on drawing a horse, and added a dog or two to his picture, and did nothing about his sums. At last when Betty had done her own sums she looked at Tom's slate, and put up her hand and smudged the horse and dogs all across. Tom pushed her away angrily. The teacher saw and began to come towards them, and Tom held out his hand, and said, "She's rubbing mine out." "How dare you do so, Betty, naughty girl! Give me your slate. Did you copy this sum from Tom's?" Betty's face was aflame with indignation. "No, teacher, I did it myself." "She rubbed mine out," said Tom; and, sure enough, there was no sum there. "I didn't, teacher," cried Betty. But the teacher would hear no more, and sent Betty out of the class, while Tom smiled comfortably at her as the angry tears ran down and she hid her face in her pinafore. She had left her slate on the desk, and while the teacher's back was turned he hastily copied the whole sum from Betty's slate without troubling to work it himself, and then waited, doing nothing. When the slates were examined Tom's sum was all wrong, because he had copied it in such a hurry; and, besides, there was a smudged dog left in the corner. He had to stay in to do his sum right and have a lecture about the drawing; but no one knew the rights of the matter about Betty, and she went home with a very sad face to tell her mother all about it. Poor Betty had to suffer for conscience sake.

In a school for big girls the French master used to give them poetry to learn, and at the lessons they had each to repeat a few lines but were all to learn the whole piece. Some of the girls did not look at it at all till they came to the lesson, and when the first girl repeated her six lines they used to count the girls, and see which lines were likely to come to them, and then they did not even learn those, but kept their books open below the edge of the table, and read out the lines that fell to their share. That was cheating, and not only cheating the master, but their parents too, who sent them there to learn, and expected them to do it.

From the smallest thing we do to the greatest, conscience is always our companion. We may shut our ears and determine not to hear, or we may open wide our hearts and welcome it as our closest friend. We may shuffle and excuse ourselves; we may say it is silly to be so particular; but right remains right and wrong remains wrong.

St. Paul says, "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as to the Lord and not unto men." That is the whole secret; if we do everything "as to the Lord, and not unto men," all deceit, or untruth, or laziness, or shuffling will be impossible. An open heart, looking to God to know what He wishes us to do, and shows us to be right, will guide us straight and make us strong to do all we do with all our might and all our heart.

Do you know what ought means? It means that the thing we ought to do is the thing owing. To whom is it owing? Why, to God. Then, if we do not do what we ought we do not give to God what is owing to Him. And if we did not give to a man what is owing to him we should be dishonest. You know how bad we think it if workmen and tradespeople are not honest; if they put bad work or bad materials in because "no one will know" who did it; if the clothes you buy come undone because the machine stitching is not finished off; if the fruit on the stalls looks so fine and fresh that you are tempted to buy it, and then the shopman scoops up shabby fruit from behind, and leaves the good fruit where it is seen. When you pay your money you expect good things in exchange, and feel cheated if you get what is bad. We heard lately in the war of the poor Russian soldiers having such bad boots supplied to them that they did not last more than one day, and then their feet were frozen and cut and they suffered dreadfully. Where were the consciences of traders who could have the cruelty to make such things and send them out for the soldiers?

When some Arctic explorers went out into the cold, dark regions to seek for another expedition which had gone before and not been heard of again, they came at last on an immense heap or "cairn" made of tins of meat. As they looked at it the awful truth came to them that these were tins of provisions which the earlier expedition had taken with them to live upon, all of which on being opened were found to be quite bad and quite unfit to eat; and that the poor fellows who had got so far amongst the ice and snow and bitter cold, after enduring all other hardships, had died of starvation—all owing to the wicked tradespeople who had supplied them with bad meat.

A gentleman kept a school with the help of his wife, and they had four children of their own. Some bad times came, and the school failed, and the father died, leaving many debts which he was unable to pay, and the people to whom he owed money were obliged to be content with only a part of what was owing. Usually this is supposed to be sufficient, and the relations are not required to do more than pay a share of what is left to each "creditor." But the wife brought up and taught her children herself, and taught the eldest boy that a truly honourable man would not be satisfied with that, and would try to pay every penny that was owing. The boy grew up, and got an appointment in South Africa, in connection with the gold mines; and he determined that he would save every penny that he could out of his earnings to pay the rest of his father's debts. By much hard work and self-denial he was able just before last Christmas to pay off every one of those debts; and when he received the receipts for the money he sent them all as a Christmas present to the mother who had taught him what was true honesty and true conscientiousness. That story I read in the newspaper.

LONDON, MARCH 18, 1905.

THE INTERNATIONAL AT GENEVA.

The two volumes, "Liberal Religious Thought at the beginning of the Twentieth Century," and "Religion and Liberty," published in London and Leiden respectively, remain as a permanent record of the first two meetings in 1901 and 1903, of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. They are of great interest and value, not only on account of the specific contributions to religious and theological thought contained in the papers and addresses there gathered together, but even more for their testimony to the unity of spirit amid diversities of race and language which pervaded those two remarkable assemblies. For those who had the happiness of being present at London in 1901, or at Amsterdam in 1903, these printed records are a reminder of delightful days of warm comradeship and of a deepening sense of the greatness of the cause to which liberal religious thinkers and workers in many lands are devoted. Especially in the London meetings, we believe, perhaps from the freshness of the experience, there was a quickening spirit which deeply stirred the faith of many hearts and confirmed in them a larger hope for the coming days. In both gatherings the bonds of international sympathy were more closely drawn, and in the companionship of distinguished representatives of the Liberal Protestants of France, Germany, Holland, Switzerland, and other countries, and of our brethren of the Unitarian Churches of America and Hungary, we had the happiness of feeling that it was a time of mutual strengthening and encouragement.

And now a third meeting is to be held this year, in the last four days of August, at Geneva. In the letter, which follows this article, from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, one of our English representatives on the Committee of the Council, some particulars are given as to the four days' meetings, with promise of a fuller programme to come, and also as to the facilities offered for reaching Geneva. It will be seen that the cost need not be great, and we trust that it will be widely recognised by members of our churches throughout the country that here an opportunity is offered to them, not only of enjoying a holiday of unusual attractiveness and the stimulus of such a great gathering with all its varied interests and pleasures, but also of helping to bear a testimony, and by their presence to deepen the sense of world-wide fellowship in the Liberal Faith, devoted to the service of true enlightenment and a living religion adequate to the needs of the present day.

Geneva is an admirable centre for such a gathering, easy of access from all parts of Europe, and with all the glories of Switzerland close at hand; and in itself a noble city, with great historical memories, dominated indeed by the personality of Calvin, and stained by the crime of the murder of Servetus, but long since quickened by the energies of a freer spirit, and last year marked by the significant endeavour, in the erection of the "expiatory" monument to Servetus, to testify to the dominance of that new spirit in those who still acknowledge themselves in their religious life the sons of Calvin. Several of the Swiss cantons are strongholds of liberal religion, and they will doubtless be largely represented in Geneva. In South Germany liberalism has had freer scope than in other parts of the Empire, and we trust that its strength will be manifested by a notable contingent, representing its genial brotherly spirit and earnest religious life. For the Liberal Protestants of France the attractions of Geneva should prove even stronger, and we hope that in this third meeting of the Council there will be an ampler blending of nationalities than either at Amsterdam or London: America, we have reason to hope, will again be well represented; indeed, that is already secured by the appointment of Dr. M. J. Savage as preacher of the English sermon, and we certainly shall not grudge our American brethren the honour, but rejoice to feel that Dr. Savage will speak for us as for them. Then for our kindred in the faith in Holland and Denmark, we must hope that, as for England, the added attraction of a holiday among the mountains of Switzerland may help to overcome the difficulty of the great distance, and we shall have the happiness of meeting again, as two years ago, to draw still more closely the bonds of our friendship, and make our common contribution towards the strengthening of the Faith of Freedom and its effective spiritual power in the lives of men.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS THINKERS AND WORKERS.

Meetings at Geneva, 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st August, 1905.

Sir,—Two years ago a large number of Unitarians from this country attended the delightful and inspiring meetings of the International Council in Holland. This year the meetings will be held in Switzerland. It is highly significant that such a gathering should be held in the ancient city of Calvin, and the local committee rely on the presence of a large and representative gathering from every country in Europe.

I have pleasure in forwarding you particulars of the meetings, in the hope that they may interest some of your readers and induce them to attend. Many congregations, with a little enthusiasm and effort, might undertake to pay, or make a contribution towards, the expenses of the minister; and if he were accompanied by one or more of the congregation, all the better. There will be no difficulty in providing accommodation for a large party, if early intimation be given.

Provided not less than 30 people travel together on the outward journey, a second-class ticket from London, by Newhaven, Dieppe, and Paris, to Geneva and back, available for 25 days, can be obtained at Essex Hall for £3 10s. 6d.; by Dover, Calais, and Paris to Geneva and back for £3 19s. 6d. The tickets are available by both day and night service. The members of the party can return individually any time they like, within 25 days, with the privilege of stopping at the principal stations en route.

An "Accommodation Committee" has been formed at Geneva, and those who possess Membership Tickets will be able to obtain bedroom, with attendance and three meals, at pensions for an inclusive charge of 4s. to 6s. a day. Accommodation at hotels will cost from 7s. 6d. to 10s. a day.

Messrs. Thomas Cook & Son will provide tickets from London to Geneva and back, including board and lodging there for a week, for £5 5s.; or, including dinner at Paris on the way, and hotel accommodation at Geneva, for £6 6s. These tickets are also available for 25 days.

Programme of Proceedings at Geneva:
A detailed Programme will be issued later.

On Monday evening, August 28, the proceedings of the International Council will begin with a sermon in French. Then will follow a Reception to Foreign Delegates.

On Tuesday, August 29, at 10 a.m., the President will deliver an address, then will follow reports and papers. After luncheon, there will be open conference and discussion on the papers. In the evening, from 5 p.m. to 9 p.m., there will be a picnic on the Lake of Geneva.

On Wednesday, August 30, at 10 a.m., there will be a sermon in German, followed by the reading of papers, dealing with the theoretical side of religion, with conference and discussion after luncheon. In the evening there will be a conversazione.

On Thursday, August 31, at 10 a.m., there will be a sermon in English by the Rev. M. J. Savage, D.D., of New York, followed by the reading of papers dealing with the practical side of religion. In the afternoon, there will be an organ recital in the Cathedral of St. Pierre. In the evening there will be a banquet.

French, German, and English will be spoken at the meetings. Papers are not to exceed twenty-five minutes; speeches are limited to ten minutes. The heads of the papers will be printed in all three languages, and distributed among the audience.

Membership Tickets.

The price of the Membership Ticket is 16s. (twenty francs). It entitles the holder to attend all the meetings, the pic-nic on the Lake, the Conversazione, the Banquet, and also to a copy of the published report of the proceedings. Wives or relatives accompanying members can procure a ticket for 8s. (ten francs), which will entitle the holder to the same advantages, with the exception of the copy of the report.

Dates of Departure from London.

Provided that not less than 30 tickets are, in each case, purchased beforehand, the first party will leave London on Friday, Aug. 11; the second party on Friday, Aug. 18; the third party on Friday, Aug. 25. Those who travel by the first party will have two weeks' holiday in Switzerland before the meetings; those by the second, one week before and one week after; those by the third will be in good time for the meetings, with two weeks' holiday afterwards if they wish. Chamonix is easily reached from Geneva; so are many other places of great interest and beauty. Pension and hotel charges for a week at other places will be much the same as at Geneva, but people will be left to make their own arrangements.

It is hoped that quite a large number of delegates and their friends will attend the meetings at Geneva from all parts of Great Britain and Ireland. It will facilitate the work of preparation if applications for tickets are made at an early date.—Yours, &c.,

W. Copeland Bowie.

Nothing is so weakening as repression, or enforced idleness, which soon becomes willing idleness. The child's power can only be developed by use. Discretion and skill are learned through the blunders of practice. Do we not learn to talk by stammering, and to walk by stumbling? When the little one first begins to reach out and grasp, and cry for something, it is an inspired impulse to activity. Then comes the mother's opportunity to encourage independence, by letting the child help itself as fast and as far as it can do so with safety. If, at the same time, the affections are wakened and warmed, the little hand that is now reached out to take will soon be reached out to give.—Charles G. Ames.

"JESUS SAITH."

VIII.—The Soul's Self-Knowledge.

Jesus saith, The Kingdom of God is within you; and whosoever shall know himself shall find it. Strive therefore to know yourselves, and ye shall be aware that ye are sons of the Father.

Only the first clause of this saying is familiar to the reader of the Gospels; only this first clause has the unmistakable ring of the authentic utterances of Christ: the rest sounds like the deduction drawn by a Hellenic or Hellenised disciple from the Master's own words—a Greek "scholium" upon an Aramaic aphorism. As such it is far from valueless; indeed, it may help us to look with a renewed interest and desire to understand at some of the deepest words ever spoken by Christ, words with whose sound some of us may perhaps have become too familiarised to try and attach any meaning to them.

In insisting upon the inwardness of the Kingdom, Jesus rebuked the whole tendency in men to look for help, improvement, salvation, to external conditions. Ever, instead of exerting themselves to advance the kingdom, people lounge, figuratively, at street corners, waiting for the consummation to take place which will transform the earth and bring in the reign of universal happiness. Societies and individuals are alike in this, prone to make the expression of pious hopes for a desired consummation do duty for the effort that would bring it to pass. But God's Providence is no cheap substitute for man's improvidence; the kingdom of heaven, the mainspring of every reform, every conquest over sin, is within us; its coming is not a celestial coup de théâtre, but is enacted in hushed solemnity on a viewless stage, the mystery of a spiritual birth.

The contrary opinion has its root ever in man's low estimate of man, as Christ's paradox expresses most daringly his wonderful belief in man. Was it credible that the kingdom of God should be within humanity as he knew it—commonplace, fickle, unheroic, undeveloped spiritually and morally? Jesus was fully aware of the manifold frailties and imperfections of human nature; nevertheless, he discerned—and therein lies his glory—behind and above the poor and sordid actual in man his heavenward potentialities, and by affirming his belief in them he encourages us, too, to believe in our own powers and our own destiny. He saw that, unless in the hearts of men, it was useless to look for the Divine event at all, because the Divine Idea has ever to incarnate itself in human forms in order to become operative, mighty to save and transform. To tell sinful, "fallen" men that the kingdom of God is within them is to supply them with the most powerful stimulus and help to rise again.

To discover the kingdom then, we must look into and know ourselves; but such self-knowledge is difficult of attainment. On no subject, to put it quite plainly, are we so liable to error as this one, lacking as we do not only true perspective, but too often the very intention of impartiality. Think of all the circumstances that combine to vitiate, to deflect, to confuse our judgment—how frequently our perception of the truth is obscured by self-interest—with what ingenuity we all weave and embroider fair-coloured excuses to drape the ugliness of our transgressions withal, and hide them even from our own eyes. Think but of the fund of self-deception there is in human nature, of the deadly because unconscious adroitness with which we pose to ourselves, idealise our motives, glorify our passions, turn the best side of our actions towards our own gaze even more than towards the world's. What adepts we are at the trick of moral self-rehabilitation, which Nietzsche, the bitter cynic, exposes thus: "'I have done that,' says my memory. 'I cannot have done that,' says my pride, and remains inexorable. In the end—my memory gives in." Would we know, dare we face, the truth about ourselves?

All true knowledge of our actual selves begins in conviction of sin; nor, until we have taken this first step, can we hope to proceed any farther. If we would know ourselves for sinners, let us measure ourselves against Christ: how have we not reversed his rule, set aside his example, sought our life, shunned making sacrifices, shown ourselves bold and defiant towards God, fearful and subservient towards man! Such self-knowledge cannot but be painful; but the pain endured is a guarantee of life, for dead things do not feel. We could not know that we have strayed but for the knowledge that there is a true Way; we could not feel grievously aware of the distance separating us from the Kingdom of God had we not some inextinguishable glimmer of that kingdom still within our souls; we could not feel condemned by the comparison of our errancy with Christ's holiness, but for the invincible intuition that we are of the same nature as he, and that where he led we can follow. And thus the same self-knowledge which struck us such deep wounds is that which causes them to be healed—nay, they were struck for our healing; the Christ by whose side we shrank abashed within ourselves, in the consciousness of sin, is the same Christ who enables us to rive its fetters and tread them under foot. The kingdom is not to be found until we acknowledge that we have failed to seek it: the true seeking and the true finding, let us be once more assured, are all one.

"Seek, therefore, to know yourselves, and ye shall be aware that ye are sons of the Father." This is the last and highest step in self-knowledge: as we could not sorrow over our imperfections, were it not for the "type of perfect in the mind"; as we could not feel exiles in the realms of sense, did we not carry within ourselves the conviction that by rights we belonged to a spiritual dominion; so we could not, left to ourselves, feel so orphaned on earth, but from a quenchless yearning after a Father in Heaven. With every step upwards, with every prompting of our baser nature successfully resisted, with every approximation towards the stature of Christ, that yearning deepens into assurance, and we know ourselves, not unrelated atoms, but sons of a Father, dear to Him, the objects of His everlasting care, partakers of His nature. Such knowledge is the Kingdom, here and now.

Jesus saith: "O spirits that wander, spirits that pine, spirits in prison, would you be delivered, would you find the kingdom? Seek, then, within yourselves—let me make you know yourselves for what you are, and what you may be. And fear not lest the consciousness of sin smite you with the sharpness of death; for yours shall also be the victory over sin and death—the victory I myself have fought—the victory of true self-knowledge. Let your loins be girded about, therefore, and grasp your staff, and follow me, that where I am, ye may be also; for verily, I say unto you that as many as receive me, to them give I the power to become sons of God."

THE REVIVAL IN WALES.

Sir,—May I venture a word of very gentle criticism upon the interesting article, "Do Unitarians Need a Revival?" by the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, which appears in The Inquirer of the 11th inst. That we do need it is beyond a question, but to be of permanent value it must be one which keeps within the lines of wholesome and rational religion, not one which arises out of superstition and mental infirmity. There is surely something of the nature of a fallacy in the contention that because, in this particular instance, the excitement consequent on what I ventured to call religious hysteria has taken a harmless and even beneficial direction, the condition itself is to be regarded as desirable. The direction which an emotion of this kind will take is largely influenced by the general state of feeling in the community amidst which it arises. Our morality has become so far civilised as to direct the emotion referred to towards such elementary duties as those described in the article. But there have been times when it was not so. The excitement awakened during the era of the Crusades appears to have been the result of as genuine a Revival as this in Wales, but it led to a cruel waste of human life. The self-inflicted sufferings of the Flagellants and others arose from a similar source, and the victims pleaded that they were "moved by the Spirit" as honestly as the followers of Mr. Evan Roberts.

The dangerous character of the emotion roused by religious hysteria lies just in this, that it may take almost any direction and prompt its subjects to almost any sort of deed.

While, therefore, it is matter of rejoicing that in this particular instance of the Welsh Revival it has taken a salutary course, that by no means proves the wholesomeness of its origin. When we hear that a man is under the control of such hallucinations as those which the newspapers ascribe to Mr. Evan Roberts; when we are told of these strange silences, the coming of signs and all the rest, we are manifestly in the region of the cataleptic visionary. If similar symptoms appeared in a man unconnected with religion we should at once attribute them to mental disease.

It is to this aspect of the Welsh Revival, and to this alone, that the word "unwholesome" was applied, and the events of the last few weeks make it less possible than ever to withdraw or modify the term. George Critchley.

DR. CHANNING ON FREE TRADE.

Sir,—The moral and religious aspects of Free Trade are matters of much graver and far-reaching importance than any question of material profit or loss which it involves. Your publication of the very admirable discourse on the subject, delivered by the Rev. E. I. Fripp, clearly indicates your recognition of this fact. You and he alike perceive the imperative need of the relations of nations being conducted in accordance with Christian principles and precepts.

Mr. Fripp's luminous utterance leaves nothing to be desired. Wherever selfism holds sway, whether in the affairs of nations or of individuals, it is sure sooner or later, to defeat its own base ends. Mr. Fripp rightly points out that if there is poverty and misery in England to-day, it is not the result of Free Trade. But for Free Trade it would be far greater than it is. It is mainly due to a variety of causes which he enumerates. Foremost among these causes he justly places the conditions under which land is held in this country, an inheritance from feudal times which the ingrained conservatism of the English national character stupidly perpetuates into the changed conditions of modern society, as it perpetuates the absurdity of a hereditary chamber of legislature. When shall we as a people awake to a perception of the fact that our land laws are practically a blight upon our civilisation, an arrest of moral as well as material progress?

The statesmanship of Cobden and Bright was essentially religious statesmanship and the statesmanship of common sense. So far from the principles and policy which they advocated having become in any sense effete, there was never greater need than there is to-day of their practical adoption. Their aims were not confined to securing for the nation those economical advantages which Free Trade has brought with it. They sought to permeate every sphere of political action with the Christian spirit through and through. They had their limitations of foresight, as we all have, but they had more than an ordinary share of political wisdom. Since their day we have fallen upon evil times, which they could never have anticipated. We have beheld during the last few decades a miserable decadence in the moral tone of the national life, which every high-minded man among us views with sorrow, and with something like shame. Various causes, which space will not permit me to enumerate, have brought about this state of things. Unquestionably one of these causes has been the material prosperity which we have gained by Free Trade. There has been a shadow side to the gain. There has been a growth of wealth and luxury, a wide spread of the spirit of hedonism, a relaxing of the moral fibre of the nation's soul. As a people we think less robustly, we have lower ideals, we have less political and moral earnestness than we had fifty years ago. But moral progress, like the ocean tides, has its flow and ebb. Just now this nation of ours, and others as well, are in an ebb.

At such a time it were surely well if there resounded from the Christian pulpits of this country and America, with fitting enforcement, the following noble language of Dr. Channing:—"Free Trade," said that enlightened and saintly minister of the Gospel, "is the plain duty and plain interest of the human race. To level all barriers to free exchange; to cut up the system of restriction, root and branch; to open every port on earth to every product; this is the office of enlightened humanity. To this a free nation should especially pledge itself. Freedom of the seas; freedom of harbours; an intercourse of nations free as the winds. This is not a dream of philanthropists. We are tending towards it, and let us hasten it. Under a wiser and more Christian civilisation we shall look back on present restrictions as we do on the swaddling bands by which in darker times the human body was compressed." Who does not say Amen to this?

The regeneration of human society will never be fully accomplished till the same Christian virtues and graces which ennoble individual character become the characteristics of national and international policy all the world over.

A KEY TO THE EDUCATIONAL DEADLOCK.

Sir,—The deadlock in national education is the religious difficulty, in connection with which important sections of the community insist upon opposite modes of action as a matter of principle. One or the other section is, no doubt, making an unwarrantable claim, but both are convinced that it is the other.

Broad and simple religious teaching, emphasising that in which there is the most general agreement, and avoiding as far as possible the points of difference, though not entirely satisfactory to anyone, would appear to be an admissible compromise between different forms of religious belief. It would not meet the case of those who are opposed to all alike, though they would perhaps generally be willing to submit to it. But it encounters the irreconcilable opposition of Anglicans and Roman Catholics. For such ignoring of what are to them essential doctrines they regard as tantamount to denial, if not of the doctrines, yet at least of the necessity for believing them. It affords no peaceable and permanent solution of the difficulty: It is no key to the deadlock.

Neither does secular education, banishing religion entirely from public elementary schools, entirely avoid the difficulty. It does, indeed, relieve the State from all interference in the strife of creeds and denominations, and so preserve its neutrality, and must be resorted to if no agreement can be attained. But it is a hammer for breaking the deadlock, not a key for opening it. It would not only be denounced, in the battle of Shibboleths, as Godless Education; it would be regarded by important sections of the community with genuine and intense aversion. That is a fact of which account must be taken. And there is the further consideration that it is not adjusted to the general state of public opinion, so far as appears from the elections and the practice of School Boards.

But there is yet another possible alternative, a key to the deadlock, if only it fits the wards; which is right in principle, and might be generally acceptable, or at least tolerable, in practice. That is, that the State and the subordinate educational authorities should be entirely neutral in the matter of religious teaching; neither prescribing anything, nor proscribing, but leaving the matter entirely to those who have a direct and personal interest in it, and only interfering to prevent hardship or injustice.

And who are the persons directly and personally interested? Not the denominations, and not the subscribers to the schools. Their money gives them no right to impose their beliefs on the children of the poor, or to subject publicly paid teachers to their tests. A State-controlled market for the purchase and sale of consciences is a spiritual abomination.

There remain two classes of persons—the parents and the teachers. The parents have a right to an absolute negative voice, that their children shall not be taught doctrines to which they object in schools to which they are legally obliged to send them. That right is allowed to them by the Conscience Clause; but they seldom venture or, perhaps, care, to assert it against the school managers. Their position also appears commonly to be that they desire, really though not very strongly, that their children shall have some religious training, but do not so much care what it is. The claim of the parents is only negative. They have no right to prescribe what religious teaching, if any, shall be given by the teachers, who may be Catholics or Unitarians, Jews or Agnostics.

Then there are the teachers, whose interest in the matter is almost universally ignored. Yet they alone have any positive right in the matter—the right, subject to the consent of the parents, to impart to the children under their care the principles, ethical or religious, which make the strength and sacredness of their own lives. It is no business of the State to forbid them. Such prohibition would be imposing upon them an ignominious condition; though not so bad as dictating to them what they are to do in the sphere of the things of the spirit, of which sincerity, freedom, and spontaneity are the vital breath.

As a matter of principle that appears, me judice, to be the key to the educational deadlock. No church and no individual would be wronged. No one could object on grounds of public principle in a matter of private and voluntary action. The negative voice of the parents would be practically secured; for they would have no fear of the teacher, especially when supported by the public authority, whose only duty would be to maintain the rights of individual parents, and to prohibit teaching to which there was a general objection.

A suggestion to place the question of religion in elementary schools on a foundation entirely different from that on which all existing systems are based, will naturally appear impracticable. But the right principle has a way of working best. And what course is more likely to lead to satisfactory results than to leave the matter to those who are immediately and personally concerned? It would at least have two good results: It would cut the ground from under the present irreconcilable conflicts; and it would secure that all religious teaching should be living, sincere, and free.

There may be insuperable difficulties in practice. But if the principle is right it is worth considering, and the difficulties might prove to be only chained lions. I would rather leave them to be suggested by others; but there are two which are so obvious that they must be noticed even in propounding the scheme. Many teachers might not care to give any religious teaching, because they had no living interest in it. In that case there is nothing better than that they should refrain from the attempt to impart what they do not possess. That is an advantage, not an objection.

A graver difficulty arises in connection with teachers who belong to churches which are subject to sacerdotal authority and control. Pressure might be brought to bear upon them which would not leave them free agents. But they would at least have all the liberty they cared to exercise. Their position would not depend upon their submission to clerical control. And if they were induced to abuse their trust by propagandism, against the wishes of the parents, it would be the duty of the education authorities to restrain them: and the parents would easily be able to enforce their objection.

It has to be remembered that, under existing conditions, no scheme can be universally satisfactory. And the best is that which leaves least valid ground for objection; and which most avoids friction, and the interference of contending sects in the national work of education, and at the same time satisfies the legitimate desires of those who alone are directly or personally concerned with the question of religious teaching in public elementary schools.

C. D. BADLAND.

WE hear it said that time will stanch the wounds and heal the sicknesses of our hearts. But time is nothing of itself. It never healed a baby's finger of its slightest hurt. But it is full of healing things, of cooling draughts for fevered hearts and brains, of balsams for our aches and miseries, of poppy and mandragora to medicine us to that sweet sleep which we owed yesterday, and of more drastic remedies to cleanse us of our shame and sin. It is full of nature, it is full of humanity, it is full of the divine beneficence, the eternal goodness, new every morning, fresh every evening, and ministering with unfailing bounty to our bodies and our minds; to our hearts, our consciences, our souls.—J. W. Chadwick.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE UNITARIAN MISSION.

THE 41st annual meeting was held at Park-lane, on Wednesday, the 8th inst. Divine service was held in the chapel at 3 p.m., conducted by the Rev. J. M. Whiteman, of Burnley. The preacher was the Rev. J. C. Odgers, of Liverpool, who preached from the words: "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth." After the service the business meeting was held. The officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows:—President, Mr. W. W. Hadley; treasurer, Mr. D. Healey; auditor, Mr. J. Chadderton: chairman of committee, Mr. T. Harwood; vice-chairman, the Rev. J. J. Wright; secretaries, the Revs. R. T. Herford and J. Moore.

A pathetic incident in the proceedings was a reference to the sudden death of the chapel keeper, who had been killed that morning down the mine. On the suggestion of the Rev. R. T. Herford, a spontaneous collection was taken for the immediate benefit of the orphans, amounting to £6 1s. 3d.

After tea a public meeting was held in the school. The chair was taken at 6 p.m. by the retiring President, Mr. W. Britton, supported by the Revs. J. C. Odgers, J. J. Wright, R. Travers Herford, H. D. Roberts (Liverpool District Association), J. A. Pearson (Manchester District Association), E. D. Priestley Evans, J. Moore, and J. E. Stead.

The CHAIRMAN, in a brief speech, gave a hearty welcome to the Mission on this its first visit to Park-lane. He explained that want of accommodation had been the reason why the Mission had not been invited before, but that now they had new schools they gladly welcomed the Mission and the representatives of kindred associations. It did a great deal of good to come into contact with those from other centres, and he had no doubt that the members of Park-lane Chapel would be stimulated by the visit paid them on this occasion.

The Rev. J. C. ODGERS, in a stirring speech on some lessons to be drawn from the Welsh Revival, pointed out (1) that it is undoubtedly a movement of the Spirit. He spoke of its power for good upon the life and character of those who came under its influence. (2) It is characterised by an almost entire absence of dogmatic theology. The great object seems to be not the enforcement of any creed, so much as it is the practical reform of the life. And (3) one of its most remarkable features is its influence upon young people; which suggests the importance of our trying to interest more deeply the younger ones amongst us, and making them feel that they really belong to a living Church, and that they are wanted to help in the work we have to do.

The Rev. E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS spoke of having more enthusiasm in our work. He emphasised the "five points of Unitarianism": (1) The Fatherhood of God; (2) The brotherhood of man; (3) The leadership of Jesus; (4) Regeneration by character—or sanctification; (5) Progressive life, onwards and upwards.

The Rev. H. D. Roberts, with a masterly combination of sarcasm, humour, and pathos, referred to different types of Unitarians. He then spoke of comprehension as being something more than breadth, it includes depth as well. This led him to speak more particularly of the late R. A. Armstrong, who was a most truly scholarly man, having the broadest sympathies, combined with accurate scholarship, that made him an ideal minister of our free faith. From such an one we get a truer conception of the work we have to do. Even if there were no such thing as Trinitarianism at all, we have a Gospel to preach—the Gospel of a pure and consecrated life.

The Rev. J. A. Pearson spoke with a good deal of humour on the special work of the N. E. Lancs. Mission as set forth in its printed report. The eight Mission stations are maintained mainly by subscriptions and collections at the 28 chapels which are within the area of the Mission. He did not speak as a business man, but only as minister; still, he did not know of any other association that did so much work at such a small expense. He hoped the friends of the Mission would rally to its support, and not only pay off the amount owing to the treasurer, but place the Mission funds in a satisfactory condition.

The meeting was concluded by the singing of a hymn, and the benediction.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EASTERN COUNTIES.

The churches in the Eastern counties have been busy each in its own way during the last few months, and little united work has been possible. In previous years we have generally had similar courses of sermons delivered in four of our churches at the same time, and the ministers have prepared special discourses with more than their own congregations in view. For instance, the Executive has arranged courses of sermons on the principles of Unitarianism. One minister was asked to deal with the Bible, another with Salvation; another with the Incarnation. This winter the ministers have kept almost entirely to their own pulpits, but have nevertheless made special efforts.

Mr. Newell continues his missionary zeal in the villages of Bedfield and Framlingham. At Bedfield he is opposed by a new and local sect which has no distinctive name, but which is none the less narrow on that account. At Braintree Mr. Fuller secures more and more outside recognition, and has been called upon more than once to be chief speaker at meetings on the Education Question and on Gambling—a vice which unfortunately is becoming as common in the country as in the town. Mr. Lawson has resigned the pulpit at Diss, having preached his farewell sermon on the last Sunday in February, and is now engaged in non-ministerial work. The congregation is small; only one service is held on the Sunday, and the scope is not very great. It is to be hoped that one of our older ministers, or one who has special study to pursue, will be appointed. A young man with no special work would simply rust at Diss.

Mr. Rump performs the duties of a village pastor at Hapton with great faithfulness and tact, and has formed societies which are helpful, especially in driving away the tedium of village life. At Yarmouth the Rev. John Birks has started institutions which have united the congregation, and an encouraging annual report has just been presented. The Ladies' Society is organising a bazaar for April 6. Steady progress has been made, and the congregation has gradually been lifted out of the state of hopelessness into which it sank during the long vacancy which preceded Mr. Birks's settlement.

At Ipswich Mr. Tavener is still making the steady headway which has distinguished his ministry there. Several new members have been added to the congregation. His work has been seriously interrupted by the very painful illness of his devoted wife. He will have the deepest sympathy of his many friends in this sad trial; they will know there is something heroic in Mr. Tavener which will carry him safely through it.

I understand that money is still required to complete the repairs of the ancient chapel at Long Sutton, where Mr. Pond has ministered for fifteen years.

I fear much of this letter must be taken up with Norwich, because important events are just now connected with the Octagon. It is impossible to give any idea of our work. We are fast growing into an Institutional Church, with which already over a dozen societies are associated. And the Institutional Church is the church of the future. Modern life demands that personal interest shall be taken in people and especially in the young, and that the church shall not only give religious instruction on the Sunday, but religious direction on the week-day. The word "religious" must not be left out, and the greatest difficulty the heads of an Institutional Church will have to meet will be to lead all to worship, and to see that every week night has as its objective the Sunday services, to which every society shall bring strength, and from which it shall receive light.

Three events must have special mention. First, we have had the privilege of hearing Mr. Carpenter's lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience." They were not attended by the large numbers for which we hoped, especially after the ecclesiastical interference of the Bishop and the Dean had aroused interest. This was chiefly due to the fact that a fee was charged for admission. The average attendance was 145. Those who were present thoroughly appreciated the lectures, and were charmed by Mr. Carpenter's personality and scholarship. The same people were present throughout the whole course. Mr. Carpenter excelled in explaining in a simple and attractive manner the most knotty problems of theological controversy. On subjects which were difficult to expound, and which required the most careful suiting of word to idea, he spoke without references to notes, except for purposes of quotation, with readiness and ability. Those who heard the lectures are deeply grateful both to him and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The lectures have done great good. After long silence we have been heard outside our own building.

Our need of Sunday-schools becomes more imperative. Recently I have had to form a minister's class, to which fifty young people above the age of sixteen now belong. We have to meet in the chapel for want of space, and our Sunday-schools are now split into four sections. Add to this the inconvenience of our week-night meetings, when we have to consider not merely whether a night is suitable, but whether a room will be free. Owing to the strenuous efforts of Mrs. James Mottram, and the generosity of friends outside, we are now in a position to purchase the site, for which we have had to pay the Ecclesiastical Commissioners a high price. The conveyance of this is about to be made. £4,000 is now required to erect and furnish a building. It will be said that this is a large figure. So it is. Norwich people would be content with less, but then it is a memorial to Dr. Martineau. Is it to be worthy of him, or is it to be mean compared to those erected by other denominations to men of less than half his importance? The name should be honoured by the building; and those who reverence his memory and are proud of his connection with us should see that the memorial is a fitting one. But forgive me for preaching. No doubt they will. Bis dat qui cito dat, which is, being interpreted, double your intended subscriptions, and let us have them early. In 1906 the Octagon will have stood just a century and a half. Can we not celebrate this event by opening our new building? Our young people, many of whom are engaged in factories, have raised £50 in less than two years by contributing one penny each weekly.

Connected with this is the celebration of the Martineau Centenary on Good Friday, of which readers of the Inquirer have heard. We are hoping that Norwich generally will do honour to Dr. Martineau as the greatest of her sons, and there is some reason to believe she will.

Commenting on an appeal for hospitality the Eastern Daily Press says:—

"Mr. Gladstone was not alone in regarding James Martineau as 'the greatest thinker of his age'; and if that description may seem exaggerated as applied to any age that numbered amongst its great men, Ruskin and Carlyle and Browning, let it be remembered that it is often the finer quality of thought that militates against the wider sort of popularity that many men of his time enjoyed by comparison with Martineau. Norwich will unite in doing honour to the memory of a great philosopher, whose influence upon the opinion—and, what is more than the opinion—the ethical temperament and the character—of the race has been one of the great formative forces during the past century. It has been exercised more upon teachers and thinkers of the age, and through them indirectly upon general thought, than directly in the popular sense upon the general thought itself—and has probably been all the more powerful for that reason. It is not always true that a prophet has no honour in his own country: And Norwich will do itself honour by falsifying the proverb in celebrating the Martineau centenary in a way worthy of such an occasion."

Norfolk is an ideal county for a holiday. No one could do better than spend his Easter vacation in the neighbourhood of Norwich, and attend the meetings on Good Friday and Easter Sunday. The members of the Octagon will do their utmost in the way of securing rooms for the visitors and of planning tours. The journey will be a pleasant pilgrimage for everyone who undertakes it.

May I mention that I am preparing a lantern lecture on "The Martineaus in Norwich," which, I hope, will give some idea of Dr. Martineau's early surroundings, and the influences that were brought to bear upon him in his childhood. I shall be willing to deliver this lecture in any town provided my travelling expenses be paid, together with one guinea fee, or half-guinea where more cannot be afforded, the proceeds to be devoted to our Memorial Fund.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—Anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. C. A. Hall, of the New Church, Paisley, on Sunday last with large congregations. On Monday the annual soiree of the congregation was held in the Trades Hall. There was a crowded attendance of members and friends. A remarkable evidence of catholic sympathy was given by clerical speakers representing different Christian sects—Established Church, Congregational, Swedenborgians, and Jewish. A programme of excellent vocal and instrumental music was pleasingly gone through. The congregation will occupy the Union Hall during the building of the new church, which is to be proceeded with in May. Special services are being arranged for, so as to make the most of the opportunity of a more public meeting place.

Belfast Domestic Mission.—On Sunday last sermons in aid of the funds of this Mission were preached by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of London, in the morning at the First Presbyterian Church, and in the evening at All Souls' Church. There were good congregations. On Monday evening the annual meeting of subscribers and friends was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street. After tea the chair was taken by the Right Hon. Thomas Andrews, D.L. The attendance, in addition to a large number of ladies, included the Revs. Dr. Mellone, T. Dunkerley, J. A. Kelly, R. J. Orr, W. Weatherall, W. H. Drummond, D. Walmsley, A. Ashworth, G. J. Slipper, Richard Lyttle, W. G. Tarrant (London), Messrs. Herbert Darbishire, Robert Dickson, James M'Williams, Hugh Erskine, James Davidson (Windsor), W. H. M'Fadden, A. Duffin, LL.D., James Davidson (Knock), and Hugh Warnock. The Chairman said he had received a few days ago a draft report from Mr. Slipper. A more continuous stream of valuable work than had been done among the poor of Belfast by Mr. and Mrs. Slipper and their noble band of assistants he had never seen. It was beyond all praise. One of the fundamental rules of the association, and one which pleased him very much, was that there was to be no proselytising. Mr. and Mrs. Slipper attended first to the poor of their own Church, and then devoted themselves to those who were attached to no Church, and of the latter there were in Belfast unfortunately a large number. This rule worked satisfactorily, and no Church could find fault with them. Miss Charlotte Bruce, hon. sec., read the report of the committee, which gave a satisfactory account of the year's work, dwelling on the great advantage of the improved Mission buildings, and new efforts which had been made, as in the girls' club and the working men's club. Mr. Robert Dickson, as treasurer, presented a satisfactory account, and Mr. Slipper read his report, which was full of encouragement and brought out the essentially religious and helpful character of the work. The chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, spoke of the encouraging and the pathetic side of the work, and touching on what Mr. Slipper had said as to the number of mill hands who suffered from decline, he said that much improvement had been effected in the character of the mills. The Rev. D. Walmsley seconded the resolution, and said that never in his time had there been more devotion to that work, in honest loyalty to the intention of the founders. Rev. W. G. Tarrant, in supporting the motion, said he recognised in the unity of their congregations in that good work a most beautiful feature of Christian endeavour. Whatever differences there might be of opinion, practice, habit, distance, there was one endeavour to help the poor people of Belfast in a Christlike way, to touch their hearts, to help their outlook upon life, and bless them spiritually. Speaking of the health of workers in mills, Mr. Tarrant said it was a problem which confronted all honest and manly employers of labour. He would deprecate any tone of narrow, unsympathetic criticism of employers. He was glad to think there had arisen in the land so intelligent a body of employers, and that they were able and willing to co-operate with the law of the land. There were intelligent employers who had done their best to fulfil, and more than fulfil, the demands of the law. They had made the amplest provision for the health of their employees; but many of their employees, through ignorance, indolence, carelessness, or recklessness, ran great risks, and often the blame was put upon the wrong shoulders. Employees should be made to understand that, after all, they had a great deal to do for themselves. The education of the whole man was the one hope they could have of uplifting the masses of the people. A great deal of evil that came into the home, a great deal of the crime and vice that desolated society, was to be laid to the charge of one vice—indulgence in intoxicating drink. There ought to be vastly more enthusiasm in the cause of total abstinence from that which, more than anything else, lay at the bottom of all the trouble in the land. The reports were adopted. The Rev. W. H. Drummond, in moving a resolution of sympathy with Mr. and Mrs. Slipper, and of interest in the work, paid a high tribute to their work, and Mr. A. D. Duffin seconded the resolution, which was cordially passed. The committee was selected, and a vote of thanks to the chair brought the meeting to a close.

Birmingham: Hurst-street Mission.—The sixty-fifth annual meeting was held on Monday, March 6, the chapel being crowded. The Lord Mayor (Mr. Councillor Berkley), who as President had promised to preside, was unfortunately prevented from doing so by a serious accident which had occurred to the Lady Mayoress during the afternoon, and Sir Hallewell Rogers (the Deputy Lord Mayor), took his place, Lady Rogers also being present. He said it was impossible to be two years in office as Lord Mayor without coming into touch with the work done at that Mission by Mr. Clarke and his colleagues; and he thanked them on behalf of the city for the excellent and valuable work they were doing. The report of the committee showed that the ordinary expenses of the Mission during the year had amounted to £805, and the ordinary income to £797. Owing, therefore, to the successful efforts made last year to increase the subscriptions, the Mission was for the time being almost paying its way. There was still, however, an accumulated deficiency of £420, and an earnest appeal was made for help to place the finances on a really sound basis. The committee gratefully acknowledged the receipt of legacies of £100 from the late Mr. Samuel Baker, £50 from the late Mrs. Baker, and £50 from the late Mrs. Best, and were pleased to record that a sum of £250 had been left by the late Dr. Frederick Ellis for the benefit of the Mission. The committee, in conclusion, recorded their appreciation of the way in which Mr. Clarke discharged his duties as minister and missionary. The exhaustive report presented by the missionary, Mr. W. J. Clarke, gave particulars of a large amount of benevolent and religious work in connection with the Mission, including the work of the Police-aided Association for Clothing Destitute Children, the Military Veterans Association, the Court and Alley Concerts' Association, and the Walliker Society. Lady Rogers moved the adoption of the reports and an expression of appreciation of the faithful labours of the missionary, Mr. W. J. Clarke, and congratulated him upon the completion of another year of successful work. The Rev. J. W. Austin seconded the motion, and, referring to that part of the missionary's report dealing with the social problem, said he felt sure that if the churches of Christendom would only unite more on some simple basis of common work—in directions such as that Mission—the results at present attained could be multiplied over and and over again. The motion was carried unanimously. On the motion of Mr. J. H. Forrester, seconded by Mr. G. Smith, a vote of thanks was passed to the officers and committees, the choir, Sunday-school teachers, and auditor for their services. Mr. Russell Jolly was elected hon. treasurer, Mr. E. Ellis Townley hon. secretary, and Mr. E. Warren Tyndall hon. auditor. Mr. William Cheshire moved, and Mr. Townley seconded, a vote of sympathy with the Lady Mayoress, and a request to the Lord Mayor to be president for the ensuing year. The motion was carried unanimously, as was also a vote of thanks to Sir Hallewell and Lady Rogers and Mr. J. H. Forrester for their attendance.

Blackpool: South-Shore.—By the kindness of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. J. E. Manning was the special preacher on Sunday, March 12. The morning sermon was, "What Unitarians believe about God," and in the evening, "The Mysteries of God and the Mysteries of the Theologians." In the afternoon Mr. Manning delivered an address to the members of the Sunday-school. On Monday evening, March 13, he gave a lecture on "How the Doctrine of the Trinity came to be believed," and after the lecture a short conference was held, which dealt with the general work of the church. At the close of the lecture a hearty vote of thanks was given to Mr. Manning and to the Association.

Colne.—A course of four excellent lectures on "Evolution and Religion" was concluded on Wednesday evening, by the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal. The lectures were admirably illustrated by lime-light, many who had not previously entered the church building being present.

Darlington. — The services on Sunday, March 5, were conducted by the Rev. J. Wickstead, and those on the 12th by the Rev. S. Perris. There were good attendances, especially last Sunday evening, when Mr. Perris took for his subject, "Unitarians and the Revival." On Monday evening Mr. Perris delivered a lecture on "Tolstoy: A Russian Prophet and His Message." The church was comfortably filled by an audience which included a large number of strangers. Mr. George Armstrong, editor of the Northern Echo, was in the chair, and a hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the lecturer.

East Cheshire Christian Union.—In connection with the recent grand bazaar a soirée and re-union was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Friday, the 10th inst. The party was organised with the prime intention of publicly thanking the members of Manchester churches who assisted in the catering department, and the workers of the Provincial Assembly, London, and North Cheshire Sunday Schools stalls, for the splendid assistance they gave to the success of the effort. About 150 persons attended. The chair was taken by the Rev. Hugon S. Tayler, the newly-elected president of the Union. The thanks of the Union were conveyed by the Revs. B. C. Constable and W. C. Hall, who also referred to the courtesy of the Memorial Hall trustees, in granting the use of rooms for various purposes. Mr. Geo. W. Rayner Wood, whose services as a worker and opener were recognised, responded. He laid stress on the fact that the work of the bazaar had done much to bring friends of many congregations together in practical co-operation and sympathy. During the evening a pleasant surprise was provided in the presentation of water-colour sketches to Miss Jameson, the curator of the Hall, for her unfailing kindness at many bazaar and other meetings, and to the Rev. W. C. Hall and Mr. James Oliver, in recognition of their services as secretaries. A capital musical programme, under the direction of Mr. Ralph Kerfoot, was provided.

Flagg.—The Rev. J. W. Bishop, of Manchester, recently gave a lantern entertainment at a tea-party given to the Bible-class, conducted by the Rev. G. Street, of Buxton, and last week he gave another lantern lecture on "Picturesque Derbyshire," which was greatly appreciated. There were sixty present. The return to Buxton was through a blizzard of snow, wind, and rain.

Heaton Moor (Farewell Meeting).—A social meeting was held in the church on Wednesday evening, March 8, on the invitation of Mr. Water Higginbottom, chairman of the congregation, and Mrs. Higginbottom, to bid farewell to the Rev. Priestley and Mrs. Prime, on their removal to Brighton. Cordial good wishes were expressed to them for their new work in the south. After Monday next Mr. Prime's address will be 114, Stanford-avenue, Brighton.

Horsham.—On Wednesday, March 8, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed gave a lecture in the Free Christian Church on "Wordsworth;" and in the previous week, in connection with the Museum Society, Mrs. C. A. Ginever gave a lantern lecture on "Life in the Balkan States." The Rev. J. J. Marten presided. Both lectures were pretty fully reported in the West Sussex Times, and were much appreciated.

London: Little Portland-street.—At the annual meeting of the congregation held on March 15, it was announced that the Rev. John Page Hopps, who has conducted the service at the chapel since the beginning of the year, had accepted the invitation of the congregation to become its minister for twelve months from March 31, 1905.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The annual congregational business meeting was held in the Schoolroom on Saturday, March 11. Mr. Wigley, who presided, spoke of the increased attendances at the Church services, and the improvement also in the Sunday-school, also of the splendid work of the Rev. N. Anderton. He urged everyone to do all in their power to further the interests of the Church. At the close of the ordinary business, the meeting was addressed by the Rev. N. Anderton, and also by the Rev. Chas. Peach and E. L. H. Thomas, on behalf of the Unitarian Home Missionary College.

Manchester: Urmston (Resignation).—Rev. H. Kelsey White has resigned the charge at Urmston, and will conclude his four years' ministry there at the end of May.

Newbury.—On Wednesday evening, March 1, Mr. F. S. Ross and the Rev. E. Turland gave a public reading in the Waterside Chapel of the Book of Job. Mr. Ross read the introduction and conclusion and the connecting passages, while Mr. Turland read and declaimed the speeches themselves in a very striking manner, and at the conclusion spoke of the greatness of the Book of Job as literature. On the following Sunday evening Mr. Turland preached on the "Revival of Religion." Every true revival, he said, is justified by its practical fruits of sobriety, honesty, pure speech, and pure life. Still, the presence of these practical fruits is no defence for the sickly or violent emotionalism, which is a peril to human health and sanity, or for the belated dogmatism which is now outgrown and no longer believed or taught as formerly in any section of the great universal Church. The real power in the Albert Hall Mission was, in his view, the music as conducted by Mr. Alexander. Contrasting Dr. Torrey's teaching and spirit with that of our Lord as traceable in the Gospel pages, he pleaded that the essence of good in all true revivals of religion and of life is found in Christ's beautiful parable in which the penitent Prodigal "comes to himself," rises, and goes to his Father, is met and received with love, and graciously welcomed home.

Oldbury (Welcome Meeting).—On Sunday, March 5, Mr. W. G. Topping, who has recently been working at the North End Mission, Liverpool, entered on his duties as minister of the Unitarian Meeting House, in succession to the late Rev. H. McKean, and on the following Tuesday evening a welcome and recognition meeting was held in the Free Schools. About a hundred and eighty were present, and after tea the chair was taken by Mr. Josiah Baker, and Councillor Growcott moved a resolution of very cordial welcome to Mr. Topping. This was seconded by Mr. W. Morgan, and carried with great enthusiasm. Mr. Topping, in responding, said that he had hesitated before accepting that invitation to follow one who was so universally respected and honoured as the late Mr. McKean, but he hoped to be able to serve them as a faithful minister and their comrade in good works. The Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, the Rev. J. L. Haigh, of Liverpool, who spoke of Mr. Topping's work among the poor at the North End Mission, the Revs. A. Thompson, and J. Paxton, and others, joined in the welcome, and a vote of thanks to the chairman brought a very successful meeting to a close.

Reading.—The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor has concluded a series of four special Sunday evening lectures, the subjects being "Jesus and the People," "Jesus with His Friends," "Parables," and "The Elements of Religion." The course was well advertised, and a considerable number of strangers were attracted to the services. Mr. W. H. Shrubsole visited Reading on Friday week, and gave his illustrated lecture "Among the Carpathians," which was much appreciated.

Scarborough.—The experiment of a four days' mission at the Westborough Unitarian Church has been recently tried, and has proved entirely successful. Some time ago certain members of the church conceived the idea of a series of meetings for the deepening of the spiritual life, and at the same time making an endeavour to reach as many non-church goers as possible. The meetings included the usual services on Sunday, March 5, and special week-night services on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, March 6, 7, and 8; the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, of Clifton, being the preacher in each case. The mission had been well advertised by large posters, and by the distribution of about 6,000 handbills from door to door. The result was that on Sunday night the church was crowded, and at all the other services there were exceedingly good congregations, including many strangers. The aim of those who planned the mission was that it should be of an entirely non-controversial character, and in this they had the hearty sympathy and support of Dr. Warschauer, whose preaching was always on a high level of religious faith and reverence without dogma. The titles of his five addresses were:—"Spiritual Apathy," "Ibsen's 'Brand'—The Tragedy of a Loveless Will," "Heaven and We," "What are You Living For?" "Abba Father." On Wednesday night Dr. Warschauer summed up the general idea and leading principle of the mission by saying that its object was intended to be the confirming and strengthening of positive religion, of a faith which would appeal to men and women of this age, not because it is new, but because it is old, because it is essentially Christianity, and it stands for what we all believe. He continued: "My object has been to make plain to all and sundry that religion is not and never can be just one particular part of your lives which you can either include or exclude, but that it is the essence of our lives, and without it our life becomes unspeakably poorer, meaner, less worthy. Religion should fill all life, and all life should be co-terminous with religion. We cannot do without the sense of God, and in a true, deep sense, we cannot do without Christ Jesus, without the man who revealed to us the Godhead, in whom the Holy Spirit dwelt without measure." Dr. Warschauer declared that that church stood for the affirmation of the religious life, of its supreme value and place, and said it was open to all, welcoming all who would worship God or seek after God; and to affirm these principles a little more emphatically than could be done at the ordinary services week by week was the object of that mission. It is gratifying to be able to report that many orthodox friends who attended paid a high tribute to the deep spirituality of the services, some of these never before having thought that such a feeling could be found in a Unitarian place of worship. Amongst those present at the week-night services were a Congregational minister and a Primitive Methodist minister. There can be no doubt that the result of Dr. Warschauer's visit has been a stirring of the religious life, and it has also done invaluable service in giving to those previously unacquainted with Unitarianism a wider and deeper conception of its spiritual possibilities.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The Sunday-school annual musical and dramatic entertainment was given on Thursday, March 9, to a crowded audience, and was an eminent success.

Tavistock.—A conference of Devon ministers was held at the Abbey Chapel, on Monday afternoon, March 6, and in the evening a public meeting was held, at which the Rev. J. Barron, minister of the chapel, presided. Among the speakers was the Rev. J. Belcher, of Plymouth, who said that he was pleased that the Chairman in his opening address had differentiated the revival movement carried on in London by Dr. Torrey from the revival movement in Wales. The Welsh movement depended on a great emotion that had run through the minds of that ardent and emotional people, and as such, though in some of its features reprehensible, he ventured to think that it had a much deeper hold and a greater meaning than the factitious meetings that were being arranged in London. He referred to Dr. Torrey in order to remind them that it had been stated that he said the other day that Unitarians were practically, if not actually, making the Christ of Nazareth to be a fraud and a delusion. He need not tell those who were acquainted with Unitarian doctrine that that was the most absurd travesty of their position. It was passing strange that any man of intelligence, with the slightest knowledge of theological controversy, should not know that there were a dozen positions people might take other than the orthodox one and still retain the highest respect for the life and character of the Great Teacher of Nazareth. Unitarians were not casting any slur on Jesus, but by the very position which they occupied they were more likely to pay him reasonable and true homage than their friends in the orthodox churches. He spoke of the importance of trying to understand the actual Jesus of Nazareth and of realising his teaching and life. Unitarians had ventured to dissent from the ordinary opinion in this country. They had done so not truculently, but because they felt that they must be true to themselves, because they felt that the first element of religion was to pay fealty to reason and to conscience. He suggested, and enlarged upon the idea, that Unitarians might take the same stand as they did on theological questions, with regard to social and humanistic questions. He believed that if they did so they would be repaid by the interest, the attachment, and the support of a large number of their fellow-men who to-day were outside their chapels. Interesting addresses were also given by the Revs. A. E. O'Connor, of Torquay, A. Amey, of Colyton, and J. Worthington, of Collumpton.

Whitchurch: Salop.—On Monday evening March 6, the annual tea and business meeting of the congregation of the Church of the Saviour were held, the Rev. C. D. Badland presiding. The report and balance-sheet, which showed a small balance in hand, were read and adopted. Votes of thanks were accorded all who had taken an active part in the work during the past year.

Yeovil.—The fourth of a series of six Thursday evening addresses on "Religion To-day" was given last week in the Old Vicarage-street Chapel, by the Rev. Rudolf Davis, district minister, the subject being "Jesus of Nazareth." A good summary appeared in the Western Chronicle of March 10. Free thought in religion, Mr. Davis said, led to the worship, not of Jesus, but of the God whom Jesus worshipped. Christianity was not a religion about Jesus, but the religion of Jesus. "Back to Jesus" was a cry often heard, but then they must ask which Jesus? Jesus was man, not God, and it was a divine humanity they saw in him, of which all could partake. There was in him a vivid realisation of the presence of God, deep sympathy with the suffering and sinful, longing for the spread of righteousness and truth, and hot indignation against self-righteousness and hypocrisy. Speaking, in conclusion, of the death of Jesus, he contrasted the orthodox view, in which the Crucifixion had to be, as essential to the salvation of man, with the Unitarian, ranking it among the great martyrdoms of the world. The Unitarian, if Jesus had died a natural death, would be without the example of a most tragic, heroic, pathetic, and appealing martyrdom in the cause of truth and the service of God; but he would find the relation of man to God, and of man to man, unchanged. His faith in immortality would be unchanged, for nothing would have occurred to change it. Going through the sacred words of prophet, psalmist, gospel, epistle, which stood for his deepest and most sacred experiences of life, his inmost thought of God, his holiest hopes for the hereafter, he found that not a jot or tittle of the principles of religion and life would be changed, if the death on the cross had not taken place. The general thought was "Christ died for us." The greater truth was "Christ lived for us."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AMONG the items of interest which will arise at the meeting of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, to be held next Wednesday, are the arrangements for the anniversary meetings at Whitsuntide. We understand that the Essex Hall Lecture this year will be given by Prof. Henry Jones, of Glasgow, a brilliant philosophic critic, and a stimulating speaker. That Prof. Jones has been chosen to speak at Oxford on the occasion of the celebration of the Martineau Centenary will, no doubt, add to rather than diminish the interest which will attach to his lecture in London.

THE Bishop of Ripon (Dr. Boyd Carpenter) is to be among the contributors to the new issue of the Hibbert Journal, his subject being "The Education of a Minister of God." Other contributions are from the pens of Prof. Charles ("Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs"), Mr. W. H. Mallock ("The Crux of Theism"), and Prof Henry Jones, of Glasgow ("Mr. Balfour as Sophist"). The last-named article will doubtless be characteristically pungent; and it is evident that the forthcoming number of the Journal will be a most interesting and important one.

THE education problem in the Transvaal is as far from solution, apparently, as that of the government of the colony generally. Happily, things are brighter in the Orange River Colony. An agreement has been arrived at between the Government and the Dutch Reformed Church (represented by Generals de Wet and Herzog among others) which provides for the selection of teachers by local committees from a list of candidates approved by the Education Department, the right of appointing and dismissing teachers being, however, reserved by the Government. English is to be the recognised medium of instruction, but Dutch may be taught equally with English. We hope the scheme will work out well.

MOST of us, we presume, have been disturbed in mind from time to time by the Somali-land "sort of war" which has been carried on, with little glory to British arms, during the past five or six years. The good news arrives this week that, thanks chiefly to Italian negotiation, the "Mad" Mullah—who is not so mad perhaps as he was thought—has agreed to terms of peace. The reflection arises that if our soldiers had been more business-like and less intent on military promenading, this end might have been attained long ago, to the saving of precious lives and much treasure. But, any way, we are grateful to our Italian friends.

THE loss sustained by the Society of Friends in the premature death of Mr. John Wilhelm Rowntree is difficult to over-estimate. Following so closely upon that of his brother-in-law, Mr. Ernest Grace, already alluded to in these Notes, it has come upon a large circle of intimate friends with terrible suddenness. He was the son of Mr. Joseph Rowntree, of York, and the elder brother of the author of "Poverty," himself known to many readers of THE INQUIRER as the accomplished editor of Present Day Papers, a periodical which for several years did much to foster liberality of thought accompanied by earnest purpose and true social enthusiasm among the younger generation of Friends. Deeply interested in the welfare of the Society into which he was born, he devoted more and more of his extraordinarily vivid personality to its service, and at the time of his sudden death in New York, of double pneumonia, on March 9, was engaged on preparatory work for a history of Quakerism.

HE was a man of exceptional charm—very human and winning in his relations, especially with young men—a man with a rare genius for affection, and the power of imparting his deepest enthusiasms to others. Although partially deaf, and of uncertain sight, he took the keenest interest in life upon every side, and was exceptionally fearless and active. No one could tell a better story, and there was no more delightful companion than he upon a holiday. He had his faults, and was ever eager to acknowledge them. He was very far from being the conventional "saint." And yet there was in him an element of saintliness which no one who came into contact with him could question. His death, at the age of thirty-six, leaves great labours unaccomplished, but it leaves also, a a record of great labours nobly begun; and while it seems to break off many close relationships, it still carries with it many an unbreakable thread of affection from the visible into the invisible world.

IN the series of articles, "Jesus Saith," the last of which appears this week, our readers have had a foretaste of a new book by Dr. Warschauer, which Mr. H. R. Allenson is about to publish. The title will be the same: "Jesus Saith: Studies in some 'New Sayings' of Christ," but the articles as we have published them represent only about a third of each of the studies, which will be found in the complete volume much more fully elaborated. The price of the book is to be half-a-crown.

Unity, which is published at Chicago, dedicated to "Freedom, Fellowship, and Character in Religion," enters with the issue of March 2 on its fifty-fifth volume; and this, which is an enlarged number, is devoted to the memory of the late Rev. J. W. Chadwick, of Brooklyn. The cover bears an admirable portrait of Mr. Chadwick, from a photograph taken in the autumn of 1903, as he sat at his study desk. Among the many deeply interesting and often touching tributes we note especially a fine study by the Rev. W. C. Gannett—the most substantial contribution of all—of "John White Chadwick, Preacher." Mr. Gannett tells how Samuel Longfellow's sermon at the opening of his new Brooklyn church first kindled in Chadwick the desire to be a minister, and how that was the church to which he was called, and which he served so faithfully to the end.

AMONG the other contributors to this Chadwick memorial number are Dr. Joseph May, who wrote from Rome, Dr. M. J. Savage, of New York; and Revs. C. G. Ames, Theodore C. Williams, S. J. Barrows, G. Batchelor (past and present editors, these two, of the Christian Register), C. F. Dole, and J. T. Bixby. Chadwick's poetry, Mr. Williams writes, "had a broadly human outlook. He cared little for subtleties of versification: He loved the good old-fashioned forms and the plain speech of daily living. : : : Some of his hymns have a lasting place: It is to be regretted he did not write hymns more frequently: For his verse has all the qualities that make a good hymn—the lyrical impulse, in language close to prose, and lofty thought which he who runs may read: In treating public questions his ethical passion flamed sometimes to the real prophetic fire. I think his most notable eloquence was when his politics roused his conscience: Those of us who are old enough to remember the fiery tribe of abolitionists, and the transcendentalists of Emerson's generation, found in Chadwick their worthy heir."

The Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones, the Editor of Unity, opens with a warm tribute to his friend, who was for twenty-seven years a constant contributor to his paper. Chadwick he calls "the poet laureate of the liberal faith" (we should place Gannett and Hosmer by his side). "In him the elements were finely compounded; he was a philosopher with a smile, a serious-minded man with a lively sense of the humorous." And, speaking of this memorial number, Mr. Jones says: "Finer than any tribute phrased in these pages, however sincere and noble they may be, is the indirect and unconscious tribute found in the wide range of personalities here represented: From the Catholic priest, from the unpremeditated tribute of a parishioner in a private letter, from the sick room of a western woman whose name is unknown to letters, from parishioners who were in daily touch and closest communion with him, from those who had never seen him in bodily form, from college halls, from editorial rooms, from the studies of ministers conservative and radical, from east and west, from young and old, these verbal wreaths, word-flowers, come to the memory of Chadwick."

The Labour Gazette, published monthly by the Board of Trade, which always contains instructive, and often painful, reading, provides an opportunity of reminding ourselves of the vicissitudes of life under which the labouring population of the country is obliged to exist: The issue of March 16 gives particulars of relief work for the unemployed during February, which enable us to understand in more detail the bare announcement that there is a larger number out of work at the present time than a year ago. "Exceptional distress" is reported from most of the districts of London, and from no less than sixty-five provincial towns: Another method of getting at the nature of the serious and widespread distress is to glance at the enumeration of the trades principally affected: Among these are builders generally, dock labourers, boot and shoe operatives, shipbuilders, and shipyard workers, engineers, bottle workers, wool combers and sorters, iron workers, and pottery workers. Side by side with lack of employment in so many towns and so many trades we notice also a continuance of the downfall of wages for those who are at work, which is another serious symptom of the industrial dislocation:

With the same number of the Gazette is issued a coloured map of the United Kingdom, showing the average earnings, including all allowances of male adult agricultural labourers. The average earnings for Durham are given as 22s. 2d. a week: This unusually high figure is, of course, largely the result of proximity to mines and manufacturing towns. The wages in the south are much less (except in the neighbourhood of London), and in Oxfordshire are no more than 14s. 6d. But to reach the cruel minimum we must turn to Ireland, where, in county Mayo, the amount is the almost incredibly small one of 8s. 9d. a week (all allowances included): And yet a man needs as much food and clothing (we say nothing about rent) in Mayo, or in Oxfordshire, as elsewhere: Truly it were not strange if men turn tramps when the reward of labour is perpetual want: Imagination fails to tell how a man can support himself and a family on 8s. 9d. or on 14s. 6d. a week. Yet these figures are averages of all farm labourers, and if we exclude the better paid occupations on the farm there must obviously be many who have to subsist on less. We do not seem very successful in applying our Christianity to our national life:

Mistakes will occur, but there is special piquancy in the notion of a correspondent who wrote to Essex Hall for a ticket for the Torrey-Alexander Mission. No doubt there should be a supply kept there, but up to the present the missioners have omitted to furnish any. By the way, we notice that Mr. Tudor Jones, in his interesting and valuable article on "Unitarians and Revivals," which we print this week, appears to think London ministers have been reticent on the subject of the Mission at Albert Hall: Apparently, he has only such evidence as the newspaper reports afford; but we happen to know that some of our preachers have dealt faithfully with the subject: They have not rushed into print, but they have spoken the word.

An entertaining article in the Examiner is from the pen of one who, having spent several years in the ministry, has spent one in a City business house, and professes to have learnt much from the experience, among other things, that it is pleasanter to spend an evening by the fireside after a hard day's work than in attending a week-night service. From intercourse with his fellow workers he concludes that men want not so much eloquent sermons or learned sermons every Sunday, as to feel the human life and heart of their pastors throbbing side by side with their own; to feel that the minister knows their life, work, trials, temptations, and can judge with sympathy and consideration; they do not ask to have their doctrinal belief constantly settled or unsettled, but to hear the brotherly word of fellowship and guidance.

The Rev. D. Amos has been elected to fill a vacancy on the Greenwich Borough Council:

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, having been asked to furnish capital for a proposed great hotel in Pittsburg, has declined on the ground that it is proposed to sell intoxicants in the new establishment: He declares that he will not lend his name or money to anything connected with the liquor trade:

Thomas Pargeter's of Foxcote Charity.—The 38th annual meeting of the Trustees of this Charity was held on the 20th inst. at the offices of Messrs: Harding & Goode, 32, Waterloo-street, Birmingham, the Rev. A: H. Thomas in the chair; the other Trustees present being the Revs. J: Worsley Austin, Henry Eachus, J: Bellamy Higham, J. Hardinge Matthews, A. H. Shelley, Alfred Thompson, W: G. Topping, and Joseph Wood. The officers appointed for the ensuing year were as follows:—Chairman, the Rev. A: H. Thomas; treasurer, Mr. F. H: Jordan, of Lloyd's Bank, Temple-row; auditors, the Revs. J. Worsley Austin and Alfred Thompson; secretary, Mr. C. Copeley Harding. Few vacancies have occurred during the past year, these only arising on the deaths of annuitants, and such vacancies have been filled from time to time from the very great number of deserving and suitable applicants on the books of the charity. At the present time there are 105 ladies in receipt of annuities, and of these 97 are in receipt of £20 a year each and the remaining 8 (being sisters) receive £16 a year each: In order to prevent disappointment to intending applicants, the Trustees wish it to be known that owing to a diminution in the income of the charity, they have decided not to make any fresh elections for the present:

Hungary—Appeal:—Unitarianism in Hungary, we hear, is about to be spread in one of those parts of the country where, until recently, it has been but little known: Twenty-four years ago in the large country town of Hódmezö-Vásárhely, a small hall was built for Unitarian services, and now we hear about a plan for building a chapel: This seems a matter of importance for the future of Unitarianism in Hungary. The lowlands are essentially Hungarian as to the population, and the people are well known for their straightforward and thoughtful nature, as well as for being good readers and keenly interested in pressing questions of the day: The news of the contemplated place of worship comes from the Rev: Andrew Bàlázs, minister at Hódmezö-Vásárhely, who beside labouring at this city, has often preached in the principal cities of the district, many of them being highly influential centres, such as Arad or Szeged, which is the largest and finest city in Hungary after Budapest, and is likely to become the seat of the new university; and Szabadka, a great commercial, and Orosháza, an agricultural centre: Each of them would mean a considerably increased territory for the Hungarian Unitarian cause. Towards these ends (see advertisement) the subscriptions of English sympathisers are earnestly requested, and may be sent to J. György, Hungarian student at Manchester College, Oxford, who will acknowledge donations in our columns.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE has long outlived the opprobrium which so often attaches itself to those whom the Christian Churches regard as "unbelievers." He is respected and honoured for his sterling qualities of mind and character, for his eager and unselfish labours on behalf of freedom and progress, and for his broad humanitarianism. Indeed, it can hardly be said that Mr. Holyoake's name ever evoked fear and hatred among any large section of the community. This is due to the spirit of tolerance and sympathy which he displayed towards divergent forms of opinion and belief. He appears to possess that combination of strength and tenderness which enables a man to hold, and if need be proclaim, unpopular views without harshly or unjustly condemning others. He is never contemptuous of religious principles and ideas which make no appeal to his own mind and heart. The dogmatism and intolerance which not a few "unbelievers," as well as Christians, have displayed, were alien to his temper. Those who have had his personal acquaintance have often observed a kind of human saintliness in his demeanour, and the portraits which are placed as frontispieces to the two volumes of "Bygones" reveal a noble and reverent type of manhood.

Mr. Holyoake tells us in his preface that his main purpose has been to be of service to somebody. This is the principle which has guided his life "as an All-Seeing Eye, to which he who acknowledges it is amenable, since it makes plain to him the devious, time-serving byways he should avoid." His aim in life has been "to keep clear of the Sin of Pretension, which consists in declaring, or assuming to be true, that which the writer or speaker does not know to be true." To be of service in the world and to keep clear of pretension—these have been the impelling motives of George Jacob Holyoake throughout his long life. The possession and the practice of these guiding principles endeared him to many eminent men holding very diverse opinions on politics and religion.

"Bygones Worth Remembering," in two large well-printed volumes, contains many interesting reminiscences, experiences and reflections, extending over a long period. The author was born in 1817, and by the time he was fifteen years of age he had begun to observe and reflect with independence and courage. The literary quality of the volumes is unequal; the arrangement of the chapters is haphazard; and the fact that various sections appeared at intervals in the columns of a weekly newspaper may account for a certain looseness and occasional repetition of words and incidents, with slight variations. For example, in vol. i., page 192, he writes:—"In one of the last conversations I had the pleasure to hold with Mr. Gladstone, I referred to 'the three Newmans' and their divergent careers. He said he never knew there were three." In vol. ii., page 14, we read:—"Towards the end of his life I saw Mr. Gladstone twice at the Lion Mansion, in Brighton. On one occasion he said, after speaking of Cardinal Newman and his brother Francis, 'I remember Dr. Martineau telling me there was a third brother, a man also of remarkable power, but he was touched somewhere here'—putting his finger to his forehead. 'Do you know whether it was so?' I answered, 'It was true. At one time I had correspondence with Charles Newman. He would say at times, "My mind is going from me for a time. Do not expect to hear from me until my mind returns." In power of reasoning he was, when he did reason, distinguished for boldness and vigour.'"

The defects are slight compared with the interest and instruction, the consecrated common-sense, contained in these two volumes. Mr. Holyoake had opportunities of meeting and knowing a number of distinguished men and women. There are portraits and brief sketches of Cobden, Disraeli, Gladstone, Garibaldi, Mazzini, John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, Harriet Martineau, F. W. Newman, and other notable people. There is even a portrait of Dr. Joseph Parker, taken in the year 1869, though the reference to him is confined to half-a-dozen words. It would be easy to fill column after column of the INQUIRER with anecdotes and quotations well worth reading and remembering. A selection will suffice to whet the reader's appetite and send him to the "Bygones" for more.

Mr. Bradlaugh and Mr. Holyoake were often linked together in the public mind; but, while holding some opinions in common, they were very diverse in temper and character. The following sentences give an admirable and discriminating estimate of the life and work of Charles Bradlaugh:—

> The key to Mr. Bradlaugh's character, which unlocks the treasure-house of his excellencies and defects, and enables the reader to estimate him justly, is the perception that his one overriding motive and ceaseless aim was the ascendancy of the right through him. It was this passion which inspired his best efforts, and also led to certain aberration of action. But what we have to remember now, and permanently, is that it was ascendancy of the right in political and theological affairs that he mainly sought for, fought for, and vindicated. It is this which will long cause his memory to be cherished. . . .
> In later years, when he was in the society of equals, where masterfulness was less possible and less necessary, he acquired courtesy and a certain dignity—the attribute of conscious power. He was the greatest agitator within the limits of the law, who appeared in my time among the working people.
> There are some agitators who are so keen and determined in pushing their own special schemes of reform that they will sacrifice everything else. Mr. Holyoake was always ready to work and vote for men of liberal principles and aims, though they might not be in accord with the projects he personally cared for most. The welfare of the State as a whole was never lost sight of.

In the first number of the Reasoner he published a short paper on "Moral Mathematics." He says:—"There are problems in Morality the right solution of which contributes as much to mental discipline as any to be found in Euclid." The following are a few of the excellent problems for controversialists which he sets:—

(1) Given an angry man—to answer without being angry yourself.

(2) Given an opponent full of bitterness and unjust insinuations—to reply to without asperity or stooping to counter insinuations.

(3) Given your own favourite truths—to state without dogmatism, and to praise without pride, adducing with fairness the objections to them without disparaging the judgment of those who hold the objections.

(4) Given an inconsistent and abusive opponent—it is required to reply to him by argument, convincing rather than retorting. All opportunities of "thrashing" him are to be passed by, all pain to be saved him as far as possible, and no word set down whose object is not the opponent's improvement.

In his chapter "Looking Backwards" he dwells on the progress that has taken place in the condition of the working classes during his own life-time. He was born in tinder-box days:

> Seventy years ago the evenings were wasted in a million houses of the poor. After sundown the household lived in gloom. Children who could read, read, as I did, by the flickering light of the fire, which often limited for life the power of seeing. Now the pauper reads by a better light than the squire did in days when squires were county gods. Now old men see years after the period when their forefathers were blind.

When he first took an interest in public affairs, he says, "agitators among the people were as despondent as frogs who were disposed to croak because they were neglected." The note of cheerful, manly optimism never deserts him. "Whoever despairs of a cause in whose success he once exulted, should fall out of the ranks, where some ambulance waits to carry away the sick or dispirited. He has no business to utter his discouraging wail in the ears of the constant and confident, marching to the front, where the battle of progress is being fought."

Mr. Holyoake speaks in warm praise of the kindness and chivalry of the Rev. Henry Crosskey in dedicating his "Defence of Religion" to him. There is some straining of language in speaking of Dr. Crosskey as "of the priestly profession," though possessing "a secular heart." Nor does Dr. Martineau's letter quite justify the statement that "the dedication brought Mr. Crosskey into trouble." Dr. Martineau says that he could hardly dedicate a book to Holyoake himself, but, he adds, "it is a generous impulse to appear as the advocate of a man whom intolerance unjustly reviles."

In his unbounded admiration for the genius and character of Harriet Martineau, whom he regarded as one of the greatest women in Europe, Mr. Holyoake hardly does justice to her brother in relating over again the unhappy incident arising out of a review of the correspondence on "Man's Nature and Development" with Mr. H. G. Atkinson. No one who really knew the inner thought of James Martineau would think of applying to him the words, "O Theology, into what crookedness dost thou twist the straightest minds!" It is seldom that Mr. Holyoake errs in this way. He generally finds something good to say of everyone.

Of Francis W. Newman there are some interesting things told. A strong and warm friendship sprang up between the two men:—

He had classical features, a placid, clear, and confident voice, and an impressive smile which lighted up all his face. . . . . His Theism was of such intense, unquestioning devotion, of such passionate confidence, as was seen in Mazzini and Theodore Parker. . . . One day as Mr. Newman was leaving my room in Woburn-buildings, he looked round, and said: "I did not think there were rooms so large in this place"; and then descending the stairs, as though the familiarity of the remark was more than impulse, he said: "Do you think you could join with me in teaching the great truth of Theism?" Alas! I had to express my regret that my belief did not lie that way. . . . If the will could create conviction, I should also have accepted Mazzini's invitation, for Theism never seemed so enchanting in my eyes as it appeared in the lives of those two distinguished thinkers who were inspired by it.

There are not a few wise and incisive sayings to be found in these volumes:—"I never change my friendship for a colleague because he changes his opinions; but I never carry my friendship so far as to change my convictions for his." "Difference of opinion is to be respected, but it is difficult even for philosophy to endure scorn." "Vigour is a notable attribute, but, unless it stops short of rigour, it jeopardises itself." "When a person finds he cannot do all he would, he commonly does nothing." "Fanatics forget (they would not be fanatics if they remembered) that in public affairs true thoroughness is limited by the rights of others." "A committee of one will often effect more than a committee of ten; but the committee of ten will multiply the force of the one and lend to it influence and authority." "What a wonderful thing is Perfection! It must be very rare. Yet some people are always looking for it in others who never offer any example of it in themselves."

Mr. Holyoake gives a very interesting account of his experiences as a teacher in "the New Meeting Unitarian Sunday School," Birmingham (now the Church of the Messiah):—

Since anything I knew had been taught me by these generous believers, it seemed to me natural that they should invite me to assist in one of their schools, and that I should comply. My consenting was not because I shared their tenets. . . . My preference for the acquaintance of Unitarians was that there was so much more to be learned among them than among any other religious body I had known. . . . I could see that young men of my age trained in Unitarian schools were very superior to Evangelical youths, who had merely spiritual information. . . .

It was my duty on a Sunday to accompany my class into chapel during the morning service. The scholars' seats were near the gallery stairs. The other teachers sat at the end of the forms, farthest from the stairs. I always chose the end nearest the stairs When invited to sit elsewhere I never explained the reason why I did not. My reason was my belief that the wickedness of the preacher, in addressing only one Deity, would one day be resented by heaven, and that the roof would fall in upon the congregation. As I did not share their faith, I thought I ought not to partake of their fate; and I thought that being near the stairs I could escape—if I saw anything uncomfortable in the behaviour of the ceiling, which I frequently watched. . . . It seems to me only yesterday that I sat calculating my chance of escape as Mr. Kentish's sonorous and instructive sermon was proceeding.

The words of dignity and sweetness on the religious convictions of his mother, and his attitude towards her in days when he had ceased to believe as she believed, must be quoted:—

Whatever my convictions I was always the same to my mother. The wish to change her views never entered my mind. She had chosen her own. I respected her choice, and she respected mine. In after years, when I visited Birmingham, I would read the Bible to her. She liked to hear my voice again as she had heard it in earlier days. When her eyes became dim by time I would send her large type editions of the New Testament, and of religious works which dwelt upon the human tenderness of Christ. The piety of parents should be sacred in the eyes of children.

One further quotation, dealing with Mr. Holyoake's thoughts and feelings about religion in his mature old age, and the readers of the Inquirer must needs dig for themselves in "Bygones Worth Remembering":—

It will be a satisfaction to students of spiritual progress to know that the extension and legalisation of the rights of conscience brought no irreverence with it. The sense that the nature of Deity was beyond the capacity of dogmatism to define, created a feeling of profound humility in the mind; the incapacity which disabled me from asserting the infinite premises of Theism rendered denial an equal temerity. . . . I think of Deity as I think of Time, which is with us daily. Who can explain to us that mystery? Time—noiseless, impalpable, yet absolute—marshals the everlasting procession of nature. It touches us in the present with the hand of Eternity, and we know it only by finding that we were changed as it passed by us.

There are many delightful sketches of men and manners, and records of stirring episodes in our national and international history, in these two volumes. Mr. Holyoake's pages are often lit up by a mingled wisdom and humour which reveal the enlightened mind and the generous heart of a genuine man.

BOOKS, NEW AND OLD.

Readers of The Inquirer, who are beginning to look forward to the Martineau Centenary, which is to be celebrated on Good Friday, at his birthplace, may like to be reminded of another Norwich worthy. I do not mean George Borrow, but one who has a larger claim upon our affections, for this year marks his tercentenary. Sir Thomas Browne was born in London in 1605, but Norwich can claim him for her own, for it was there that he spent most of his quiet, fruitful life in the rambling abode described by John Evelyn, "his whole house and garden being a paradise and cabinet of rarities, and that of the best collections, especially medals, books, plants, and natural things." He settled in Norwich in 1637, and he died there on his birthday, October 19, 1682. To the intervening period belong the publication of the Religio Medici, and the writing of his other works, the Enquiry into Vulgar and Common Errors, Hydriotaphia, or Urn-Burial, Christian Morals, and the strange, fascinating Letter to a Friend upon the occasion of the death of his intimate friend.

Aubrey de Vere once suggested to Professor Norton the formation of a Third Order for the laity after the example of the Franciscans. One rule was to be that members should read the newspapers standing, in order to curtail the time given to them, another that one-half of their daily reading should be of books written at least two centuries ago. Those who want to conform to the second rule cannot do better than make friends with Sir Thomas Browne. It is true that he is not for all tastes. It is not everyone who has an ear for stately prose rhythm, or cares to linger over the one noble and sonorous word which lifts a whole sentence into an atmosphere of splendour. And, apart from his style, he is likely only to puzzle readers who have no love for paradox and religious mystery, who have never felt how the defect of intellectual analysis throws us back upon our primary instincts, and sharpens the edge of faith.

Sir Thomas Browne is not a theologian, but he is deeply concerned with religion, and his pages coruscate with gems of religious thought more convincing than many arguments. "The line of our days is drawn by night, and the various effects therein by a pencil that is invisible; wherein, though we confess our ignorance I am sure that we do not err if we say it is the hand of God." "We carry with us the wonders we seek without us: there is all Africa and her prodigies in us." "We do too narrowly define the power of God, re-training it to our capacities"; "I can hardly think that there was ever any ascent into heaven; they go the fairest way to heaven that would serve God without a hell; other mercenaries, that crouch unto him in fear of hell, though they term themselves the servants, are indeed, but the slaves of the Almighty." "Those who do confine the Church of God either to particular nations, churches, or families, have made it far narrower than our Saviour ever meant it."

"Nor must a few differences, more remarkable in the eyes of men than, perhaps, in the judgment of God, excommunicate from heaven one another; much less those Christians who are in a manner all martyrs, maintaining their faith in the noble way of persecution, and serving God in the fire, whereas we honour him but in the sunshine." "I cannot fall out with or condemn a man for an error, or conceive why a difference in opinion should divide our affections." "There is no man's mind of so discordant and jarring a temper to which a tuneable disposition may not strike a harmony." "There is surely a piece of Divinity in us; something that was before the elements, and owes no homage unto the sun. Nature tells me that I am the image of God as well as Scripture. He that understands not thus much hath not his int oduction or first lesson, and is yet to begin the alphabet of man."

Sentences like these are not parts of formal divinity. They are the flashes of deep religious intuition, the fruit of a spirit finely tempered to Christian charity and habits of quiet meditation. Walter Pater has some interesting remarks upon the religious attitude of Sir Thomas Browne in contrast to the "great resolution" by which Pascal won his way to faith. Browne never faced the spectres of the mind and laid them by a strong recoil from the physical to the moral world. It was his happy temperament to be able to deal playfully with the contradictions and enigmas which turn other men into sceptics. In consequence his adhesion to Christianity has no special significance in the sense in which the difficult adhesion of men like Pascal is significant. The Religio Medici is a contribution, not to faith, but to piety; a refinement and correction, such as piety often stands in need of; a help not so much to religious belief in a world of doubt, as to the maintenance of the religious mood amid the interest of a secular calling." The maintenance of the religious mood, the management of our temperament, is, however, one of the hard issues for most of us; and Sir Thomas Browne is an exhilarating tonic. Readers are to be congratulated on their good fortune if they honour this tercentenary year by making acquaintance with his richly jewelled pages, but theirs is a still happier lot who can take down some old pencilled copy from their shelves and recover a forgotten delight.

"Truth does not, as a rule, lie in compromises." This is the confession of Canon Sanday in his Outlines of the Life of Christ, published recently, and the words sound almost like an unconscious apology for the weakness of his own position. The book is a reprint of his article on Jesus Christ in Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible," and it is certainly convenient to have it in this form. It states the problems and it maps out the ground with admirable clearness. Both conjecture and imaginative insight are alike absent, and we have instead some cautious concessions to criticism, and a rather timid summing-up on the side of ecclesiastical tradition. It is not likely that the result will be satisfactory to any large body of people. To some it will appear to concede too much; to others to stop short unaccountably when the conclusion is in sight. We can never forget that Canon Sanday has the creeds behind him as he writes, and that where the evidence is weak or faulty there are other considerations which may turn the scale. This is very evident in his handling of the stories of the Nativity. He leaves us with the impression that the historical evidence for the narrative in Matthew does not satisfy him, though he never says so quite plainly; but he is prepared to accept Luke as it stands, though he concedes that before the middle of the second century there is no reason to think that the miraculous birth was generally known. It was based on private information. "It would be very fitting if the channel through which these sacred things first came to the ears of the Church was a little group of women." It is certainly a bold step to accept the ancient taunt of Celsus, and thus to turn it into an argument for historical credibility! The apologist is on safer ground when he appeals to Catholic tradition, or, in the mood of Sir Thomas Browne, allows himself to be fascinated by the mystery; but to alternate the evidence as Canon Sanday does, and then to plead that it is sufficient is likely in the end to be more productive of scepticism than faith. This is the inherent weakness of his whole presentation. He provides a pleasant via media for those who like to consider themselves open-minded, and want at the same time to shelter themselves behind a justly venerated name, perhaps a fairly numerous class among the clergy at the present time. But the rest of us he leaves in a state of unstable equilibrium, for the logic of the position requires that we should concede either far less or a great deal more to the dry light of historical evidence.

The practice of writing biographies and laudatory criticisms of living writers and public men seems to be on the increase. It serves no really good purpose, and is a sign of the growth of professionalism in the world of letters and an unhealthy appetite for publicity. Of course, it is possible that the work may be done with good taste and due reticence, but that is rare, for then it would fail to satisfy the curiosity, the instinct for pungent personal detail, which called it into being. Mr. James Douglas has provided us recently with a bulky volume on Theodore Watts-Dunton, poet, novelist, critic, which is the immediate cause of these remarks. He sets himself with all the showy gifts of the modern journalist to praise his friend in public and to surround him with an atmosphere of superlatives, which would be enough to wreck most reputations. Fortunately he has not been allowed to write without restrictions, the existence of which he deplores more than once in terms like these, "I do not sympathise with the sensitiveness of eminent men in regard to privacy"; "I am strictly prohibited by the subject of this study from giving any personal description of him. For my part I do not sympathise with the extreme sensitiveness and dislike to having one's personal characteristics described in print." Literary art, like the art of social behaviour, has its code of good manners, and there is no one who needs to observe it more religiously than the biographer.

For the rest, the book is amorphous and ill put together, though it contains many nuggets of fine gold. Mr. Douglas does right to deplore the fact that so much of Mr. Watts-Dunton's fine critical work is buried in the back numbers of the Athenæum. A selection of it made by the author himself would form a volume of unusual interest and value. The best thing that Mr. Douglas has given us is the reprint of the essay on the Bible, with its description of the Great Style as "unconscious power and unconscious grace in one," and its penetrating analysis of Biblical rhythm: "There is a metre to be sure, but it is that of the 'moving music which is life'; it is the living metre of the surging sea within the soul of him who speaks; it is the free effluence of the emotions and the passions which are passing into the words. And if this is so in other parts of the Bible, what is it in the Psalms, where 'the flaming steeds of song,' though really kept strongly in hand, seem to me reinless as 'the wild horses of the wind'?"

I must find room for one other sentence written in quite a different connection. "The power of a single writer," says Mr. Watts-Dunton, "to benefit or to injure an author is so great that none but the most deeply conscientious men ought to enter the ranks of the anonymous reviewers." And then he goes on to speak of Rossetti's violent indignation against the miscreant "who, in an anonymous journal, tells the world that a poem or picture is bad when he knows it to be good." This reminds me again of Sir Thomas Browne, and his condemnation of those offences unto charity "wherein by opprobrious epithets we miscall each other." "By a word we wound a thousand, and at one blow assassin the honour of a nation." W. H. D.

THE INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL.

DEAR SIR,—In response to your invitation for suggestions for the parties going to the International Meetings at Geneva, I beg to offer the following hints to your readers, resulting from personal experiences in the last twenty-two years.

To those who can so arrange it I very strongly recommend the meetings being taken first, and the rest of the holiday after. Switzerland is usually inconveniently full in August, and hotel and pension managers and servants with the best of intentions are frequently incapable of dealing with the numbers of visitors. The early part of September, too, is frequently blessed with good weather, and the Continental schools beginning about then have the effect of reducing the numbers of people about, and, further, a not to be despised advantage is that prices in September often decrease 15 to 25 per cent. If it must be arranged to take your holiday first, the sooner you fix your places and secure rooms, the better for you.

For an inexpensive holiday I should recommend two stays of a week each in various places. A stay of from five to seven days usually gains the advantage of pension terms, and there are many places that will take you in for five francs a day, and do you well. The rooms are mostly airy and clean, and the living plain, but wholesome and plentiful, and the drinking water in the higher places is exhilaratingly fresh and good. In August and even September you will find the towns on the Lake and in the valleys too hot, and the following list of places is composed of mountain resorts in the Geneva region where there are plenty of pleasant walks, climbs, and excursions. The figures in brackets give the height in English feet above sea level, Geneva being 1,220. At these places there are hotels and pensions that I know, but, of course, they change frequently, and visitors will make their own inquiries. Baedeker's "Switzerland" is an essential to a Swiss tour, and any visitors should check my information with Baedeker, and see the position and possibilities of the place.

North of the Lake:—

1. Ballaigues (3,050). A pine forest resort; diligence or carriage from Vallorbe station.

2. (a) Pillon (3,650).

(b) Diablerets (3,940), Under the Diablerets range. Both of these postal address, Ormont-Dessus, station Aigle in Rhone Valley, thence diligence.

3. La Comballaz (4,475). Hotel Couronne. Diligence from Aigle.

4. Leysin (4,110). Electric railway from Aigle.

5. (a) Villars (4,000),

(b) Chesières (3,970). Electric railway from Bex in Rhone Valley.

South of the Lake :—

6. (a) Morgins (4,405).

(b) Champéry (3,450). Situated under the Dent du Midi. Diligence to both from Monthey, in Rhone Valley.

7. (a) Saluan (3,035).

(b) Marecottes (3,550).

(c) Finhaut (4,060). A beautifully situated village, but very full in August. All these reached from Vernayaz, in Rhone Valley, by carriage or walking.

8. Forclaz (4,987). On the Tête Noire route from Martigny to Chamonix.

Visitors to Geneva should make a point of going to Chamonix either for two or three days, or longer. In several hotels you could stay for five days for six to eight francs per day. Good walkers coming from the Rhone Valley are strongly recommended to approach Chamonix over the Col de Balme (7,221). It is an easy bridle-path all the way, and is a comfortable day's walk from Forclaz. This view of the Mt. Blanc chain is one that few can surpass, and it bursts upon you with unexpected suddenness, making quite a dramatic effect.

As long as one is in Switzerland, posting your luggage is as easy as posting letters, and visitors to the Rhone Valley or Lake districts would do well to post their heavy luggage to Geneva, and take two or three days with a knapsack or light hand-bag, sleeping, say, a night at Forclaz or on the Col de Balme, where there is a good and not too expensive hotel, and making a short stay at Chamonix.

Of course, one can enlarge on these rough suggestions for distance and more expensive show places according to taste or purse. Nearly every railway issues circular tickets embracing many of these famous resorts, and the L.B. & S.C. Railway foreign guide may advantageously be consulted for such, which could be combined with Geneva, either going from Geneva or by making Lausanne the point of arrival or departure. At many of the places mentioned, and others, I know and can recommend good and cheap pensions, and my information is at the disposal of any of your readers who will write and enclose that useful and necessary article, a stamped addressed envelope.—Yours faithfully, HERBERT B. LAWFORD.

4, Wexford-road, Balham, S.W.,
March 21, 1905.

SIR,—I have been considering Mr. Bowie's letter, and your invitation for information as to the best way of spending the time at the disposal of the visitors. I write for those who may be taking the journey for the first time.

No one who has travelled nearly 300 miles from London to Paris, would think of continuing the journey for another 388 miles to Geneva without a rest. It will be necessary, then, to spend a night in Paris. Now the hotels in Paris are dear, but I have no doubt that nearer the time some French friend will supply Mr. Bowie with a list of hotels which have the combined advantages of being reasonable and good. It is several years since I used hotels in Paris, and hotels, like everything else, change in character, so that I have none to recommend. Let me say that for those who are not good sailors, it is better to pay the extra 9s. to go by Dover and Calais than to go by Dieppe.

With regard to your question whether it is better to take the holiday before or after the meetings, I would say after most decidedly. The Swiss valleys are hot in August, and Geneva itself is so hot that most of the visitors will have had enough of it before the meetings are over. There are also large numbers of visitors and prices are at the highest. In September the climate becomes delightful, and prices go down. It will be a pleasant change after the meetings.

ONE WEEK.—Those who go for the week only may secure much enjoyment in addition to the meetings. They may ascend, on foot or by train, the hill Saléve (2,950 feet) and have delightful views of the town, the lake, and the mountains. They may visit, in half a day by train, the Chateau and Church of Voltaire at Ferney. The chateau and gardens of the Baroness Rothschild are within walking distance on the same road. It is quite easy to take steamers to Ouchy, and then from Lausanne ascend the Signal (by train) from which charming views are obtained. This will only take part of a day. And then, in addition to these, if the weather be fine—and it mostly is fine—they will have Mont Blanc in view all the day and every day. I have no wish to encourage English visitors to neglect the meetings, but it would be excusable when German or French papers are being read and discussed, if they took the steamer down to Montreux. From there the Castle of Chillon can be visited. The funicular railway will take them in seven minutes up to Glion, from which charming views are obtained, It is an easy walk from Glion down the romantic Gorge du Chaudron to Montreux again, where steamer or train may be taken back to Geneva.

This will, perhaps, be enough for the present. Next week, if you like, I will give an outline of how I think two extra weeks may be spent to the best advantage. But let me remove one apprehension which weighs with some people. No one need be deterred from going by the want of French or German. You can get along with English almost as well as in London. W. HARRISON.

THE LATE JOHN LYDIATE.

SIR,—No doubt all persons attending the meeting of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, reported in your previous issue, likewise those who have read the account of it, would be deeply pained at the loss by death as mentioned by you, of that unfortunate victim, John Lydiate, in a coal-mine disaster. The unaffected goodness of the man won admiration from all, but the sad circumstances causing his sudden death, probably intensified it. Yet the few words you recorded of him were precise and to the point, and for a Sunday-school worker, so gentle, patient and unobtrusive, whose deeds rose into a purity of purpose as divine as any Gospel words from the lips of a preacher, denotes a consecrated service in Christian work of the noblest kind.

He is spoken of as "the chapel-keeper, teacher, a regular worshipper, with active interests both in school and chapel, and a recipient of a silver medal in recognition of his thirty years of devoted service?"; but I would like to lay another wreath upon his new-made grave, though he may not have left a single penny behind to buy a sod of earth to cover his ashes, for he struggled with circumstances, and had to act as father and mother to his children.

At different times it was my pleasure to meet him in his school life for the thirty years with which he was connected, and when he became a teacher (Park-lane, Wigan) I never found him without his prepared notes on a Scripture subject. These he would show to me in simplicity and earnestness, with a sensitive feeling that I might consider them crude and unfinished. Even if they were so betimes no blame could be attached to him, for he had done what he could. Now, let me make mention of a further incident, which happened some years ago. At the close of the day's work we had a "Teachers' Conference," and it was my duty to speak to about thirty teachers upon what had come under my observation during the day. My theme was teacher's work and its influence, and Lydiate, hearing my remarks (so sensitive he was), thought that his position as a working collier would not allow him to reach the standard set before them, and thus he would be compelled to resign his position through lack of ability and opportunity. However, a better judgment prevailed, and he endured the toil and struggle of teaching to the end, though he laboured on with an injured body, the result of a previous accident, to his dying day.

He did what he was able to do, however humble, without a murmur and without regret. We need an inspiration like his to keep up a reasonable progress in our work.

For the benefit of his orphan children, I shall be pleased to remit any contributions entrusted to me.

JOHN CHADWICK.

THE HEROINE OF THE "ELBE" DISASTER.

SIR,—May I venture to recall to the memory of your readers the story of Miss Anna Böcker, the only woman saved from the wreck of the Elbe on January 30, 1895. Although only nineteen years of age at the time of this disaster, her heroism and unselfish conduct called forth the admiration of the whole world; not only did she receive numerous letters of congratulation from all over the world, but she was also honoured by a command from our late beloved Queen to go to Osborne, where she was most graciously received both by Queen Victoria and the Empress Frederick. At this time she was living as a German governess in the family of an English solicitor at Portsmouth, and being an orphan, and having the greatest confidence in her employer, she entrusted to him for investment all her little patrimony of over £850. The whole of this sum of money has recently been lost through the bankruptcy of this solicitor, and Anna Böcker now finds herself penniless. Her health has never been good since the shock of the Elbe disaster, but still she bravely desired to earn her living as a nurse, and went some few weeks ago to be trained at the Bristol Infirmary; here her health has quite broken down, and she is deeply disappointed, as both the doctor and matron pronounce her unfit for the strain of a nurse's life. Surely there are many people who, being reminded of her story, would be willing to contribute towards a fund to be invested for the benefit of this brave German girl. John Clegg, Esq., manager of the Capital and Counties Bank, Portsmouth, has kindly consented to receive donations, and the case is well known to Chas. Matthews, Esq., J.P., Portsmouth, and to Henry Blessley, Esq., Mile End, Portsmouth.—I am, sir, yours truly,

ELIZABETH I. SPENCER.

Portswood, Southampton.

THE WILD SWANS.*

HERE is a sermon-fairy-story taken from Hans Christian Andersen's tale of "The Wild Swans." The part about the chivalrous brothers is for boys. The whole story may remind both girls and boys that the unhappiness at home and school caused by ill-will, bad-temper, and selfishness, is removed by patience, courage, self-control, and self-forgetfulness, and that we may feel God very near us, helping us to avoid what is wrong and hateful, and to overcome evil with good, if we keep our hearts pure, and open to His love.

Once there lived a king who had eleven sons and one daughter. The brothers went to school with stars on their breasts, and swords at their sides, and wrote with diamond pencils on gold slates, while their sister Elise sat upon a plate-glass stool, and had a picture-book worth half a kingdom.

But their father married a wicked queen, who sent Elise away to some peasants, and turned the princes into eleven beautiful swans, who flew off to a far country. Elise's home was now a hut, and she had neither books nor toys, but she played with the flowers and sunbeams, and her poor foster-mother taught her to be happy in simple, loving ways.

The king sent for her after some time. Then her step-mother disliked her more than ever, for she was very beautiful, and as good as she was lovely. One day when Elise was going to her morning bath, the queen took three toads, and kissing them, said, "Jump on Elise, when she enters the bath, so that she may become dumb, and ugly, and wicked like you." But when the toads touched her, they turned to red poppies, and floated away, for purity of heart gives a maiden power against evil.

She could not, however, overcome the queen's hate, and stole away into the great forest, longing for her brothers, and making up her mind to seek and find them. At night she lay on soft moss, and was not afraid of the darkness and solitude, for God seemed to look down upon her with kindness, and little angels peeped from behind Him.

Next morning she met an old woman. Elise asked if she had seen the eleven princes.

"No," replied the dame, "but yesterday I saw eleven swans with gold crowns swimming in the river close by."

Then Elise followed the stream, till it flowed out to the great open shore and glorious sea. Numberless pebbles lay polished by the washing of the waves. "The water is softer than my hand, and yet it rolls on unwearyingly, and makes hard things smooth. I will be just as persevering," said the brave girl, and she continued her search. At sunset what should she see flying towards the land but eleven wild swans with crowns on their heads, and just as the sun sank into the sea, the swans' feathers disappeared and there stood eleven beautiful princes. Between sunset and sunrise they might return to human shape. Oh! what a happy meeting there was!

"We may visit our home," said the eldest, "once a year for eleven days. In two days we return to the distant land." And the next morning they flew away over the forest to have a last look at their father's castle, and their dear mother's grave. But the youngest stayed with Elise, and laid his head in her lap, while she lovingly stroked his wings.

Then they made a net of willow-bark and reeds, and carried their sister in it across the sea, and the youngest swan-brother fed her with berries, and shaded her with his wings from the sun. When they reached the shore, they left Elise to sleep in a cave. She lay down full of thoughts of how she could rescue her dear brothers, and prayed God to help her, and falling asleep, she dreamt that the old woman, whom she had met before, came to her. "Your brothers can be released," said her visitor, "but have you courage and perseverance? Your fingers will feel pain, your heart will suffer torment. You must gather the nettles that grow round this cave, and on the graves in the churchyard. No other kind will do. Tread them under foot, and you will get flax with which to weave eleven shirts of mail with long sleeves. Throw these over the eleven swans, and the charm will be broken. Remember also that if you speak before your task is ended, you will kill your brothers." Saying this she woke Elise with the touch of a nettle, and the devoted sister, after thanking God for the dream, began at once to pluck, and tread, and weave the hateful nettles. Ah! the blisters they raised! And oh! how hard to keep silent, especially when the brothers returned at night and understood what she was doing for their sake. But the youngest wept, and whenever his tears fell on a blister it vanished.

Alas! on the following day she was interrupted, for a king out a-hunting rode past the cave, fell in love with her, and took her away to be his queen. None of the gaiety of her beautiful new home pleased her. She moved about the palace dumb, and the picture of grief. So the king, who really longed to make his bride happy, and was sorely puzzled at her misery, had a small room fitted out almost exactly like the cave, and the flax and one coat of mail which she had made were put there by a huntsman, who had picked them up as curiosities. Now every night she crept secretly into the little room, and wove, and wove, until the seventh coat was done, and she had no more flax. How was she to get nettles? Cautiously she stole out to the churchyard. Witches were revelling among the tombs, and cast wicked looks upon her, but she never faltered, reaped her horrible harvest, and returned to the palace. Again courage and goodness had brought her safe through danger and evil.

All these seemingly uncanny doings were found out by the king, and he could not but think she was a witch, so she was condemned to be burnt, and was put in a damp cell, and given her bundle of nettles and hard, stinging shirts of mail to lie upon. Only the thought of God and her brothers enabled her to go on with her task. At night there came the rustling of wings against her prison grating: It was the youngest swan-brother, and his devotion made her poor fingers speed the faster. Then Elise was dressed in sackcloth, and dragged in a cart to the stake. The shirts and nettles were thrown into the cart in mockery, and still she wove, and had almost done the eleventh coat. "See her hideous sorcery," jeered the crowd. "Tear it in pieces," and they would have beset her, had not at that moment eleven wild swans come flying up beating their great wings to protect her. Just as the executioner seized her, she threw the eleven shirts of mail over the swans. Immediately eleven beautiful princes stood there, but the youngest had a swan's wing instead of an arm, for she had been unable to finish one sleeve of the last coat.

"Now I may speak," said she. "I am innocent," and she fainted away now that suspense, anguish, and pain were over.

Then the eldest brother told all the story of her self-sacrifice. Whilst he spoke, a scent of roses spread through the air, for the wood piled round the stake had become a hedge of rose-trees, and on the top was a flower of dazzling whiteness. This the king plucked, and placed on Elise's bosom, whereupon she awoke with peace and happiness in her soul. Love and purity of heart had overcome misunderstanding, hate and wickedness.

REVIVALISM AND THE REVIVALIST.

WHATEVER may be said as to the value of "revivals" in religion, there can be little doubt as to the dangers of revivalism to the revivalist. When a man speaking out of the fulness of passionate sympathy flings himself into the struggle for souls, and, under the pressure of irrepressible feeling adopts methods of appeal different from those in ordinary use, there is room, indeed, for discriminating judgment, but not for the criticism of the scorner. But if ever it may be allowable to let loose the forces of satirical indignation, it must be when extravagances, pardonable only to ardent emotion, are expressly stimulated if not simulated, and when the natural colours of prophetic zeal are put on to order. It is this aspect of the present "revivals" that most shocks the attentive mind. There are other aspects that invite criticism, some few that may fairly challenge approbation; but here is that which not only excuses, but demands very clear speech.

The various comments that have been made in our columns in regard to this whole subject betray, if we may say so, a somewhat puzzled mind, but this is not surprising. We are told that important moral reforms have followed in the wake of the revival services, and the evidence, which is not very obvious, we fear, in the large cities that have been visited by the American revivalists, is sufficient in regard to extensive districts in Wales. Now the good results thus attained might, or might not be, attained in some other way; but that they have been attained in any way is a comfort to all right-loving people. As to the spiritual storms which have swept over meetings here and there, we find ourselves less ready to speak approvingly, or at all. On the one hand we are but too well aware that mob emotion is a dangerous reality, a fiery element that needs the most careful handling, lest it should lead to deplorable results. On the other hand, it is impossible for the observant and discriminating mind to miss the tokens here and there of the deepest and sincerest personal experiences, and while we cannot help suspecting that some who undergo the convulsions of fear and hope, contrition, and joy, that attend the more conspicuous forms of "conversion" are but too little established, and soon fall away, we are assured that to some, at least, the revival services mark a spiritual area pregnant with good. Amid such considerations one is reluctant to introduce even the semblance of antipathy and harshness of judgment. The flowers of tender pity are not so numerous that a lover of man will willingly chill the opening buds, wherever found, and even if they have been forced. On the contrary, as our correspondence has shown, the question that inevitably arises is whether Unitarians and other religious rationalists ought not to be more earnest than hitherto in search of methods by which the happier and healthier results of the "revivals" may be reached: and to that question there can be but one answer.

But the more earnest we become in the pursuit of a purer social life and deeper personal consecration, the more needful it is to beware of the peculiar snares of revivalism. To our thinking, the more serious of these dangers are those that confront not the unstable "converted," but the revivalists themselves. Perilous, indeed, are the strained exaltations that come spontaneously and unbidden to sensitive minds. The alternations of action and reaction are very real, and sometimes terrible. It would seem that even if we set aside some indications that almost bespeak insanity, Mr. EVAN ROBERTS is certainly no exception to a rule which has found illustration far and wide and long, that the higher the spirit soars in unwonted ecstasy, the lower it may fall in depression and humiliation. But far more harmful than the ecstacies of genuine emotion are those excitements which are consciously induced by artificial means. The average hearer at the revival service is doubtless too ignorant to observe narrowly the process by which his feelings are stirred. Far from him is the cool attitude of reflection; he submits, after what period of reluctance may be natural to his normally unspiritual condition, to the swaying influence of hymn and prayer and fervent appeal. But his protecting ignorance is not shared by the revivalist, who knows very well the effect he wishes to produce, and has studied the means hitherto found serviceable. "Louder, louder," we are told, was the ejaculation of General BOOTH, as he paced through the ranks of his "Army" last year at the London gatherings. "Louder," he said; for it would appear that even his soldiers, trained as they are in the tactics of sensationalism, have in part developed an instinct in favour of the more moderate usages. It is inevitable that revivalism, as an art, we do not say as an artifice, should find itself continually in need of new emphasis; and it is precisely as inevitable that those who are committed to it must lose the delicacy of natural emotion, and harden, in spite of themselves into a habit which can only be saved from mere histrionic display by recourse to violent self-galvanism. The actor's art, it is said, tends to injure sensitive minds. How much more the profession of a revivalist, constantly involved in the heightened emotions consequent on an attempt to snatch souls from destruction and transport them into the bliss of salvation! Few men, apparently, are able to undergo the strain: rather, we should say, most religious teachers recoil from the instinctively apprehended deterioration besetting such activities. It is, of course, open to the critic to say that all religious teachers who profess the same view as the Revivalists of the nature of the spiritual life, all who regard men sharply as either "lost" or "saved," and to whom these fleeting years of time are but as a moment of decision which settles an eternity either of joy or woe, should be equally zealous, equally emotional. The contention is reasonable enough, but the fact that not all who subscribe nominally to the orthodox view are wrought into an intensity of fervour akin to the Revivalists' is "significant of much." Some will think that it tells of inertness and self-indulgent sloth; to us it speaks in quite another way. It reveals the secret that, orthodox or not, most sane men believe in a more reasonable process of life. Crises of decision do come, moments fraught with profound results; nevertheless, the life of the soul is regarded by intelligent men—and we think most wisely—as a growth not unlike that of the plant. Its culture is not to be summed up into one or two fortunate hours of sunshine and rain, but continues day by day, and only results in the fairest blossom and richest fruit after a full course of discipline. Most religious teachers, in short, are teachers. Now and again they may feel it their duty, and may be blessed with the power, to address themselves in direct appeal or remonstrance, but their usual task is that of diffusing light and hope and courage to the often dark and doubting minds of men. In such a task they, as well as their pupils, have room to grow, time to think, opportunity to enjoy a serene communion with the supreme Wisdom and Goodness. But what must be the state of that man's inner life, who feels, or tries to feel, new frenzies day by day, over an all-but-damned world, who has no chance and little inclination to learn anything, but who makes up for his ignorance by denouncing knowledge? Men may talk about self-sacrifice, but we cannot think that with such sacrifice as this GOD is well-pleased. The wish that religion may truly reviv in ourselves and in our churches all will earnestly share; to think it can do so in any other ways than those dictated by simple love for the truth and for the spiritually beautiful would be a mistake which few of us, we hope, are inclined to make, however much we feel prompted to attempt great things for the greatest of all causes.

UNITARIANS AND REVIVALS.

THE present moment is an opportune one for us as Unitarians to consider our position, and to ask as many questions as possible concerning the situation of our churches. We shall all certainly agree that things are not what they ought to be, and even what they could have been by to-day, had we exercised a little more energy and devotion to our churches in the past. But suppose for a moment that a spirit of energy and devotion came over us--a Revival—what form should it take, and in what fields should it operate? The object of such a revival would be the gathering of men and women and children into the kingdom of truth and goodness and love—the kingdom of God. In order to accomplish this object we can never hope and never wish to copy orthodox methods. Why not? Because the Evangelical churches treat men in the mass, and the truths of the doctrines presented are not so important as the good results which follow. These aspects of the doctrines are not to be questioned; it is taught that the things of religion have but the slightest connection with the ideas of the present. Past modes of thought, mediæval conceptions of God, man, and the universe, are presented in evangelical revivals, in so far as theology is presented, as if they were the only true theology to-day. This is exactly what has taken place in connection with the present revival in Wales. People point to the good that has been accomplished, and that good has been magnified a hundredfold. We should like these people to open their eyes to the evils that have accrued, and will continue to accrue. Evangelical orthodoxy has failed to affect the people without the dogmas of the past. But many people say: What does it matter if the people are lifted up, what their theology is? Let that statement become universal, and we shall pretty soon find that it does matter, for it would mean nothing less than the universal revival of the dogmas of past centuries as the only theology in which the religion of the present could be clothed. Of course we are all glad to see people lifted up from their sin and degradation, but the only difference between what this revival has done and what all conscientious ministers are doing is that the work of the former is blazed abroad in the largest letters, while the work of the latter is unknown except to the individuals concerned. To link religion with all this commotion and excitement, and to give this kind of work a higher valuation than the steady, difficult work of the Christian ministry amongst us is a piece of downright injustice to every honest minister. The way this work has been exaggerated and magnified in South Wales is enough to make anyone acquainted with the real facts doubt that a sense of increased veracity has been the result of all this commotion.

But the question I wish to ask is, Cannot the theology of the present be made the clothing of religion? Men demand some kind of theory of life, and it is through this that a large number of men are often led to religion. Many of us, doubtless, believe that the true religion of Jesus Christ can be presented to people in the garb of the thoughts of the present day. My experience is that presented in this manner religion appeals to a large class of men. Such a class, for example, are our working men.

These men are keen in mind. They are accustomed from day to day to handle tangible things, and many of them read popular books on Theology and Science. We have to appeal to such men. These men are to-day to be found in two places. On the one hand there are large numbers who have drifted away from the churches, and are in a state of mind which claims our sympathy and help. Have we a mission for them? If we have, and if that mission is to prove efficacious, our preaching must show the weakness of the materialistic theories which they hold on the one hand, and on the other hand it must show them that we have something to offer which they could not get in evangelical orthodoxy. It is useless to present vague sentiments and words to such men, nor can we benefit them by taking for granted such truths as the existence of God, the need of religion, and many other things. A great part of our mission consists in showing the rational grounds of God and religion as far as these can be shown. There are many people yet in the world who give to feeling or emotion a ground or source which is quite other than that of reason. Such people seem to think that because a thing is rational, i.e., because a thing has come from the kingdom of cloudland to that of clearness that it cannot have value as a religious thing. Blind instincts, incoherent feelings—things which pertain more to the body than to the mind or spirit—are thus made the basis of religion. Such appeals have their force only in people of certain neurotic temperaments, and in people who have plenty of time on their hands. But to the class of intelligent working men who can read English, and who do read it, these appeals are in vain. There is next to nothing for them in Welsh to read except traditional theology with its ignorance of every movement that has taken place since Calvin's day. Such Welshmen are bound to clothe their religion either in the theology of the past or in the ecstasy so natural to our Celtic mind. Far be it for me to doubt that decisions can be made in moments of excitement and ecstasy; in such moments a man may change the structure of certain aspects of his physical organism, and so rise to a higher level, but experience has convinced us that unless there is reason coupled with the emotion as its basis there is soon a lapse to a lower level.

We can never hope to produce in the class of men I have mentioned those ecstasies, and yet, I believe, we can make them religious in a more real sense than those who have been "saved" half a dozen times over. Which of the two men would you trust to row your boat across a dangerous ferry? On which of the two could you depend to get justice in difficult circumstances? The answer is known to all. We must then understand the fact that if we can influence such men to attach themselves to our churches, to continue to inquire, to love their work, we are producing the best type of Christian which the twentieth century will be able to show.

And in this connection we have also to bear in mind the fact that a man's religion must not be measured by the intensity of his feelings. There may be, and often is, far more real religion in a restraint of the feelings than in their exhibition. We therefore give up the craving for physical commotions and excitements as the tests of religion, and turn to the deepest meaning of religion which will be found in its sanity, its search after truth, and its tran formation of truth into goodness. I consider that we are doing this as ministers to-day according to our several abilities, and the work is of no less value because it is done in the dark and is not advertised with flags and drums.

It is evident that to such men our appeals must be largely argumentative. And this cannot be done without the special emphasis on the Unitarian theology which we hold. If we can present Unitarian Christianity to this class of men (and women too) in a way that will appear to them rational, we shall gain them to our mode of theology and then we shall carry them from this to our religion.

We have a message also to the other section of men and women who have ceased or are ceasing to have satisfaction in evangelical orthodoxy. I wish to live peaceably by the side of orthodoxy, but not by the side of its theology. Several of us have had to waste several years of our life in doing nothing but clearing the rubbish which was put in our way to be at peace with it. I feel personally that we are not half bold enough in this respect. Witness the London Unitarian ministers (with the exception of Mr. Hopps and Mr. Bowie) silent in the daily papers when Dr. Torrey was parading his mediæval theology and science in their city! If we could get a crusade against the worn-out theologies found so prevalent in this land of ours we could open the eyes of thousands of men to higher and nobler ideas of man and God. But we pull down in order to build up. I have had many members to belong to my congregation through the work which was accomplished by Professor Estlin Carpenter in this town in this direction. The difficulties of most men in the first instance appear to be doctrinal difficulties. These have to be answered, and these cannot be answered without constantly showing the futility of dogmas like the Trinity, the verbal inspiration of the Bible, &c.

But we do not finish with theology. And here, again, I believe that we have an important mission. We proclaim the spiritual nature of man; but we cannot any longer present the pure anthropomorphic conception of God. Many men can never be convinced by arguments of design or of ultimate cause. That there is a degree of validity in these arguments no philosopher to-day doubts, but they are ceasing to be the basal arguments for the existence of God. The deepest argument is our own nature and its perpetual capacity of becoming through effort other than it is, by holding before itself ideals of holiness, goodness, perfection, and love. I believe that if we were to teach people that God is within more than without, that there is something infinite and eternal in our nature which can unfold and grow without an end, the objective existence of God would follow. In such a work as this we can only hope to bring to our side a minority of people, but I believe that such appeals can be made effective to rich and poor, learned and unlearned, and even the ignorant, the saint, and the sinner. It is certainly a vast field, but a field full of treasures. And we may be assured of the fact that if we co-operate it will be a revival of a very real kind; it will turn out men and women whose lives will be noble and whose work will be useful. We cannot, as in the present Welsh revival, offer cheap tickets of salvation to any one, but we can offer hope and peace and joy to all who will accept our gospel. Let us hope that religion will come to mean more and more the best in the spirit and reason of men, and that in connection with the present revival in Wales, to quote the words I have just received from one of the most eminent of European philosophers (Prof. Eucken of Jena): "Let us sincerely hope that the Religion of the Spirit and of Reason will gain the overweight in this movement in Wales."

W. Tudor Jones.

According to the Daily News the Rev. Dr. Pierson, who was once thought of as a successor to the late Mr. Spurgeon, and who did in fact serve at the Metropolitan Tabernacle for a twelvemonth after the death of the great preacher, has again been heard in London this week. We regret to hear he met with an accident on the liner as he came. His intention is to expound the Epistle of James during his two months' duty at Christ Church, Westminster; and his first discourse appears to have attached much more importance to that Epistle than Luther would have given. One wonders whether the great reformer would be found opposed to the modern evangelical in regard to another point. The report says Dr. Pierson made an "onslaught on the modern theory of evolution," and condemned "Darwin, Huxley, and Co." We should like to hear what Huxley would have to say in reply. Meanwhile it remains to be seen whether Dr. Pierson will endorse St. James's methods of restoration of the sick.

"JESUS SAITH."

IX.—THE HEAVENLY JERUSALEM.

"Jesus saith: : : : Ye shall know that ye are in the city of God, and ye are the city."

In one respect this is the hardest of all the "new sayings" which we have been trying to interpret, its peculiar difficulty arising from the fact that, as it stands, it represents only the most probable emendation of the mutilated and defective manuscript. All we can say is that the reading given was adopted by the discoverers of the papyrus after the most scrupulous weighing of every consideration that could be adduced, and that so far as the best-equipped scholarship can help us, its conclusion points to the complete saying having in all likelihood read as is now suggested.

Jesus must certainly have been familiar enough with the phrase "the city of God," as applied to Jerusalem. But from being proudly associated by a noisy patriotism with the national capital, the words could not fail to take on in course of time a more ideal signification; the earthly city, scene of so much strife and violence, jealousy and intrigue, could at best but symbolise in most imperfect manner the true and holy Zion, the eternal archetype laid up in heaven. Men, unsatisfied with the actual, could not but rise in their aspirations to a fairer vision, desiring a better country, free from blemish.

Where is that ideal city? Imagination places it beyond the clouds and paints it in gorgeous colours; yet after awhile the jewel-blazing, jasper-walled, pearl-portalled Jerusalem of the Apocalypse is felt to be inadequate, and the soul applies itself anew to the restless search for its true abiding-place. "Where is the city of God?" asks humanity; with a sublime intuition Jesus replies and proclaims the mystery, saying, "Ye are the city."

In one sense we feel, immediately and instinctively, that this is true; unless we carry it within our own breast, no passionate pilgrimage over rocky ground or through trackless deserts, no boldest navigator's feat in ferrying the deep will see us, with beating hearts, standing at that city's gateway. But in another sense the words fill us with marvel and doubt, as the glory of the promise shames the meanness of the actual; and we ask ourselves with deep misgiving and the humility which is born of self-examination, whether the human soul as we know it is indeed a Holy City, and not rather a city built ill, with crooked streets, swarming with every variety of unholy thoughts for inhabitants. Yet Jesus knew all this, and did not despair of humanity: he wept over man's sins; he blushed at man's grossness; he mourned man's levity; but he believed in man's greatness, and in that belief ventures on this colossally bold pronouncement, "Ye are the city of God." He sees all the narrow lanes and tumble-down dwellings, the roadway littered with garbage, old-time mansions untenanted or sunk into dinginess and disreputably peopled; but with his mind's eye he also sees the old waste places rebuilt, the foundations of many generations raised up, breaches repaired and paths to dwell in restored at length. Shall we despair, where Jesus hoped?

If we would have his prophecy—for prophecy it is—come true in us, we must first of all diligently prepare the site on which our city is to be built, by clearing away all rubbish and tangled growth of briars and brambles; this is the hardest part of the task by far, and unless it has been carried out with ruthless fidelity—unless the foundations have been laid aright—all subsequent labour will be in vain, and all elaboration of design and magnificence of structure will only prepare a more utter and calamitous overthrow. Then, after this preliminary work, the planning and actual construction. We are building the city of God, no petty township or temporary settling-place for a shifting population: let there be no huddled mazes of mean streets, no crowded quarters built hurriedly, with regard for neither beauty nor health; but let the whole bear witness to a noble design, rich in broad avenues swept by the vivifying breath of God and for the unimpeded traffic of all worthy thoughts; let there be wide open spaces where the finest emotions may have freest play, the entire plan converging to a central shrine approachable from all sides, faultlessly proportioned, dominating all the rest, fit tabernacle for the thought of God to find continual utterance, for the Reality of God to receive perpetual adoration.

Is this an impossible ideal? Not as an ideal, surely, to aim at and progressively to realise; the new Jerusalem no more than the old Rome is intended to be built in a day—its completion is the task, not of a life-time, but of eternity. Errors and mishaps in details there will be, inevitably; designs that promised well when traced on paper will wofully disappoint when carried out; stone that presented a fair surface will be found to crumble and have to be replaced by more durable material. But if we have one master-thought in laying out our territory, and are true to that, if we desire to make it worthy of its name and object, we may build our city in all hopefulness, and having built, fortify and defend it, in loyalty and love to him who pointed and led the way thither, who is himself the way, whose command we would all acknowledge, to whose voice, whether lifted up in admonition or reproof, in gentle solace or onward call, we all would listen.

Jesus saith, "Soul of man, wistful, questful, erring, unsatisfied, why these wild flutterings, these distracted beatings of ineffectual wings? What is it whereof thou art so pathetically in search, circling high and low, with ceaseless moan, now bruising thyself, in blind flight, against jutting rocks, now almost overwhelmed by the grey, tumbling waves, now preyed upon by some stronger habitant of the air? Is it not God thou seekest, and an abiding-place, and peace? Lo, I say, all of these are within thee, must there be seen and discovered first, ere they can be found without. Be comforted—be guided to thyself, Thou hast sought for the living among the dead—thou hast sought for the eternal among things temporal, for the abiding among these things of change; but in thy heart, O man, hath God set eternity, in thy soul is His Kingdom, His City, His temple, His holy Presence: there make thy search, there shalt thou meet with Him, and having found Him, thou shalt rest."

J. Warschauer.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of the above Association was held on Saturday, March 18. In the afternoon there was a service in Cross-street Chapel, when an eloquent sermon was preached by the Rev. E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS, of Bury, from the text "We worship God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus."

Tea was provided in the Lower Mosley-street schools, after which a public meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, when the chair was occupied by the President, the Rev. Dendy Agate. There was an unusually large and representative gathering.

In their report the Governing Body stated that they were not altogether satisfied with the state of the work in the district; yet the record of activities was extremely interesting and, on the whole, encouraging. True, opportunities were offered for extended work, but it had to be let pass owing, in the main, to lack of funds. To consolidate the work already undertaken had been an object steadily kept in view. To judge by the reports of attendances at public worship, as sent in from the majority of the churches, none were thronged, and until they were, by eager learners and devout worshippers, they could not be regarded as such centres of good influence upon the vast populations in the midst of which they were placed as they well might be. Something had been attempted, however, which fully proved that there were crowds of people anxious to hear what the Unitarians had to say upon problems of the spiritual life not commonly treated by other Christians. The Lay Preachers' Union was already doing excellent work. Within less than twelve months 23 churches have availed themselves of its aid, and 74 services have been conducted by 11 of its members. The members are willing to undertake mission work in hitherto untried districts; but thus far no call has been made upon them. A Social Questions Committee has been appointed, with Mr. Richard Robinson as chairman, and when it gets into working order it is expected to render useful service. The report contained appreciative notices of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience"; of the Jubilee of the Unitarian Home Missionary College; and of the work of the Postal Mission. The resignations were reported of the Rev. W. Reynolds at the Oldham-road Church, and the Rev. Priestley Prime at Heaton Moor. The finances of the Association showed a deficit on the year of £167. With a view to secure a permanent additional income the Governing Body had resolved to raise a capital sum of £5,000, the interest of which shall be applied to maintain and extend the work of the Association.

The PRESIDENT in his address gave warm and affectionate testimony to the instructive and enthusiastic work done by the officers, and expressed his personal appreciation of the work done by the ladies of the Postal Mission. He urged the need for the continued nurture of their assisted and forward-movement churches. During the next two or three years, he said, there was no doubt that the Governing Body of that Association had before them, if they were only willing to undertake it, a great amount of most useful and uplifting work. They had a certain ebb and flow in the affairs of that Association, such as was found in many others of the concerns of men. What he desired they should recognise very earnestly was that the principles for which their congregations had stood, in some cases for six or seven generations, their message to the time, to its doubt, to its unrest, and to its cry for social reform—to say nothing of their sense of the value of personal religion and the consecration of the individual heart to the service of God and man—should inspire them and send them constantly forward with the feeling that the work entrusted to them should not be slackly or negligently done. The world had not yet all been brought to an understanding of the things of the spirit—of those things which gave truth, beauty, and value to life. The Rev. Dr. John Watson had recently said that the message of the next revival would be social righteousness, and its effect the redemption of the national life. Surely their churches could do something to quicken its pace and to encourage the hearts and strengthen the hands of the workers. They must take no narrow or half view either of the work of the churches or of the demands which the world at large made upon them.

Unfortunately, owing to the depression in national concerns, they lost money in realising their Bazaar investments for the continuance of their Forward Movement work, and their exchequer was now nearly depleted; but he hoped and believed the members of their churches would not fail, as a period of prosperity returned, to respond to the demands made upon them, to give adequate financial support to a work which he believed God would prosper in their hands.

The Rev. W. L. SCHROEDER proposed the adoption of the report. The Association, he said, had been marking time during the year, and the report contained nothing very encouraging. Some of the churches reported upon were progressing, and others were doing what they could, but that did not seem to be much. The lesson, if there was one, was that until the churches themselves realised the problem of their own existence, the Association would never be successful. The real cause of failure lay not in their organisation, but rather in the men and women who composed the churches, and in the ministers, who were largely responsible for the kind of life that was in the churches. The testimony of Unitarians to the power of real religion was not what it might be. They could not disguise from themselves that they were not the force in the country that they wanted to be, and hoped to be. They had enough of organisation. What they wanted was to spiritualise that which they had. Until that lesson was driven home, until people learned that "tea parties and that kind of rubbish" did not constitute religion, and until the churches learned that they were only marking time, and very miserable, uneven time at that, there was matter for them to think about in many ways.

Mr. J. T. TAYLOR, of Oldham, seconded, and in doing so criticised the general position of the assisted churches. The average attendances had decreased, while the expenditure had increased. This was not a healthy state of things, and indicated retrogression rather than development and progress. From a business standpoint the expenditure on these particular churches was out of all proportion to the results. There was need for more energy and determination in their church work. He was happy to think there was more toleration in the world to-day than ever before, and believed that more progress would be possible in the near future.

The Treasurer's statement was adopted on the motion of Mr. J. HILL, seconded by Mr. W. LORD.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU (who with Mr. G. H. Leigh attended as a deputation from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association) thought there was a great deal in the report of a highly satisfactory character. The question was how best to get over their temporary difficulties. The same difficulties existed in London. Some of the new churches, started with a flourish of trumpets, did not become strong and self-supporting as soon as was expected. When they looked at the work that had been done by that Association and compared their present position with that which obtained ten years ago, it would be seen that a great advance had taken place. What was needed was a general and united effort. It was incumbent upon the churches that were successful not to desert those that appeared to be a little lagging. For the last two or three years all charitable and philanthropic work had been going through a crisis, and no doubt the whole country had suffered very heavily from the enormous cost of the South African war and the extravagance of the Government in later years. It was not surprising, therefore, that they were passing through a period of financial difficulty.

Mr. E. BASIL LUPTON spoke as representing the Yorkshire Unitarian Association.

Mrs. J. E. MANNING addressed the meeting on the subject of Women's Work in our Churches. One of the reasons why our churches were languishing was that women had shown extraordinary apathy and neglect in their own particular field of mission work. Their field was the home. She referred to the diary kept by the wife of the first minister of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, in which she expressed her anxiety for her child to grow up in the love and knowledge of God, and hoped that as years went on she would attach herself to some religious communion in which the rule of life which God gives was most regarded. If mothers had the desire to give their children that nurture which the old primitive mother wished to give hers, our churches would not be languishing to-day. There is not enough talk about religion in the home, and family worship is dying out. The attendance at Sunday service is irregular. Did they hear the church and minister always spoken of with reverence? Was there no idle criticism on the service or sermon? Ministers make almost heroic efforts to gather the young into the churches through the agencies of guilds, clubs, entertainments, and even dances. Sometimes they succeed, but more often they do not. What a help it would be to the vigorous and healthy life of our churches if the young could be got into real touch with them, to join in their religious life, and engage in some much needed work for others! The main thing they lacked was that strong religious feeling which should enter into the very fibre of their being. They had heard recently a good deal about religious revivals. They also needed revival, but not of the type of "frantic folly" that was being witnessed in Wales. Let them pray that they might never have a revival of that kind. They did not wish to see sobbing, hysterical crowds of young people gathered together in their churches. She had known in old times of revival in Wales how young people —young girls, innocent of any crime— had been taken away to asylums, broken down in mind by the feeling of the awful depression of sin upon them. They did not wish to see a revival of that kind in their churches. What they did wish was that parents and ministers should join in producing a real revival of that strong, earnest inner religion which would revivify their churches and make them homes of living truth.

Mr. G. H. LEIGH spoke of the difficulties of establishing new causes, and took the hopeful view that in a little time things might be in a more flourishing condition.

The Rev. AMBROSE BENNETT said they must examine what it was that made them think that the spiritual life amongst them must be deepened. Decreasing membership in church and school was evidence of necessity, but not the only or the safest evidence. Some seem to think of the spiritual life as of some external energy that had to be produced. But the evidence had to be found much nearer. When each one who does go to church looks into himself and feels hungry and thirsty for new life, feels dissatisfied with his own spiritual condition, then true evidence is found of the need of religious revival. It is said that there is a great deal of interest taken to-day in religious questions, but there is more than one kind of interest. Athens in Paul's day, for instance, was interested in such questions, and yet no Christian Church was established there They were often told that religion should apply to every department of life, but what a resource of spiritual energy this involved! Every increase of outside activities will necessitate still further stimulus at the centre of our spiritual life. The prime necessity is to live constantly in the spirit of prayer and in waiting upon God.

Musical items, vocal and instrumental, were rendered during the evening. After the usual votes of thanks the meeting ended.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of the Liverpool District Missionary Association was held at Ullet-road Church Hall on Saturday, March 18, 1905, Mr. A. S. Thew, the president, taking the chair.

In moving the resolution that the report of the Committee and the statement of accounts be adopted, printed and circulated, the PRESIDENT spoke of the great loss the Association had sustained by the death of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who had been its moving spirit for so many years, but said the members should rejoice for having had his help and inspiration so long, and strive to do more in the future than in the past years. The work at Hamilton-road was going forward in the most promising way, and the North End Mission Committee and their Minister, Rev. J. L. Haigh, were to be heartily congratulated; while at Crewe the change was also most encouraging. The closing of the chapel was a grief to this Association, but it was the right course to take, and that now the East Cheshire Christian Union and their missionary, Rev. H. Fisher Short, were reaping the reward. At Bootle the leeway from last year's removals had been made up by determination and zeal, and the enthusiasm of the Rev. J. Morley Mills and his congregation wins the warmest praise. The year at Liscard had been signalised by a most commendable departure. The congregation had determined to become independent of outside financial aid, and with this notable and praiseworthy end in view they were working for a bazaar which is to be held in November, 1905. The committee had already given the warmest approbation to the scheme, and commend this self-supporting enterprise to the large constituency in Liverpool and district, which is ready to help causes which approve themselves to their principles.

The consummation of this laudable ambition will serve as a completion of the first happy stage in the work of the Rev. A. E. Parry and his congregation. They would thank their Missionary, the Rev. R. P. Farley, B.A., on his pertinacious and devoted efforts in a work which in its very nature is very taxing, and which to be carried through as it should be can only be done by an ever-present feeling of its urgent and imperative necessity. The key to the work was the resolution of the Council that Mr. Farley should give himself mainly to the work at St. Helen's. A goodly little band of earnest workers—without which no cause can prosper or be permanent—has gathered round him, and there is a spirit of purpose manifested which must bear fruit.

At Garston the position is unchanged with regard to strength and numbers. The sphere of work is small, but the work is of good quality.

The Council regret that they have had to close Widnes, but it is better to admit failure and try other-where, and therefore the iron building will be moved or sold. They regretted the deficiency in the statement of accounts, but that had been partly made up since by a donation of £100 to the St. Helen's Building Fund, leaving £75 only owing for that and £180 on the general account, being an increase in the debt of nearly £40 on the work of the year.

The Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS seconded, and warmly commended the work to the support of the congregations.

Mr. C. W. JONES moved, the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS seconded, and it was carried unanimously:—

"That in receiving the reports of the "Rev. J. Morley Mills, the Rev. R. P. "Farley, and Liscard Congregation, the "members of this Association record their "sense of the great importance of the "work for the support of which they are "largely responsible, and their earnest "sympathy with those who are practically "engaged in these efforts to extend the "influence of a liberal religious faith and "life, and are pleased to note the work "accomplished at Hamilton-road and "Crewe."

The Revs. J. MORLEY MILLS, J. FISHER SHORT, and R. P. FARLEY replied.

The Rev. C. HARVEY COOK, of Warrington, and the Rev. A. E. PARRY, of Liscard, moved and seconded the appointment of the Committee for the ensuing year, and a most successful meeting closed with votes of thanks to the President, and to the minister and congregation of Ullet-road for the use of the Church Hall.

LEWIN'S MEAD DOMESTIC MISSION, BRISTOL.

MR. PHILIP JOHN WORSLEY presided at the annual meeting of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission, held on Monday, March 20, in the Mission Hall, Lower Montagu-street, St. James's, Bristol.

Mr. J. B. ROBINSON, the missionary, reported that the existence of the Mission was justified by the number of people who turned to it in time of need for material assistance, and who attended the religious services for their spiritual enlightenment. The missionary had endeavoured to be a friend to the friendless, and it had been the object of the Mission to purify, uplift, and cheer the lives of those for whom it was maintained. The want of employment had been most keenly felt by unskilled labourers in the district. The receipts of the penny bank during the year, representing 390 depositors, amounted to £249 14s. 4d. This showed a decrease, which was due to the state of the labour market. The men's club and many other organisations connected with the Mission were reported by Mr. Robinson to be doing good work. More teachers were needed for the Sunday-school. The services in the chapel had steadily improved, and the building was often full at the ordinary Sunday evening service. Owing to ill-health, the missionary announced that he had placed his resignation in the hands of the committee.

Professor E. SIBREE, M.A., presented the report of the committee, and dwelt on the great work such missions were doing in the alleviation of distress and the inculcation of higher ideals. An adverse balance of £60 was due to the falling off in subscriptions, many friends having left Bristol. The thanks of the committee were accorded to Mr. and Mrs. Robinson for their loyal services to the Mission during the past year.

Mr. KENRICK CHAMPION (hon. treasurer) mentioned that the year was started with an adverse balance of £32 16s. 10d., which had increased to £65 17s. 9d., though the expenditure had been less than usual. The balance-sheets of the poor's fund and of the country visiting fund were also submitted. The latter fund enabled them to send some of the ailing poor into the country for a week.

The CHAIRMAN moved the adoption of the report, and expressed regret at the cause which had led the missionary to resign. Mr. Robinson's high principle had made its work difficult, and a more conscientious missionary they had never had. It was sad to know that the number of subscribers had diminished, through death and removal from Bristol.

Mr. CHANNING WATKINS seconded the motion, and paid a tribute to the missionary's faithful services. Not only money, but more personal service was needed from the members of the congregations.

The resolution was adopted.

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD submitted a motion of cordial thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Robinson for their loyal services to the Mission. Mr. and Mrs. Robinson were deserving, too, of their deep sympathy in remembrance of their services amid the forces for ill which surged round about the Mission.

The Rev. Dr. WARSCHAUER, who seconded the motion, remarked that Mr. Robinson's work had been of a high quality, as he had set before himself a really exalted conception of the function and office of the Christian missionary.

The motion was heartily carried. Other business included the election of the committee and auditors.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Boiton.—The District Sunday School Uuion held a conference on Saturday at Hindley. The Rev. S. Thompson presided, and there was a good attendance. Mr. Isaac Barrow, secretary, read a paper on "Some Difficulties of Sunday-school Work," as observed in his visits to the schools. Among the points mentioned were the necessity of imparting a rational view of recreation; greater earnestness and organisation in the work of the schools, more sympathy, insight and adaptability. In the discussion that followed the Revs. J. Moore and R. C. Moore, Messrs. A. Baxendale (Hindley), W. Taylor (Bolton), J. L. Davies (Chowbent), and R. Ridyard (Leigh) took part.

Bury District Sunday School Union.—In connection with the above Union a lantern lecture was given in Chesham School by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale, on Saturday last, his subject being "The Unitarian Church in Transylvania."

Chatham.—Excellent congregations have attended a course of sermons, delivered on Sunday evenings by our minister, on "Types of Great Men." Last Monday, under the auspices of the Educational Committee of the Co-operative Society, the Rev. J. Tyssul-Davis, B.A., gave a lecture at the Public Hall, New Brompton, on "Equality." During the present term he gave another lecture on "Obstacles to Social Progress." On a recent occasion he also lectured at the Congregational Church Institute on "Overcrowding and the Land Question." The fact that the Unitarian cause has been in existence since the year 1655 has largely modified the vigours of orthodoxy in many ways, and compared with other towns the theological attitude is tolerant.

Evesham.—The annual meeting of the congregation of the Oat-street Chapel, Evesham, was held in the schoolroom, on Wednesday evening, March 15, when Mr. A. H. Martin presided over a fair attendance. The accounts, as presented by the treasurer (Mr. W. Gill Smith), were of a very satisfactory nature. There was a balance in hand on the ministerial fund of £21 6s. 7d., and on the incidental fund an adverse balance of £14 18s. 11d. had been converted into a credit balance of £16 0s. 11d., thanks to the garden fête organised by Mrs. Geoffrey New, the proceeds of which amounted to £40 odd. There was a small balance in hand on the Sunday-school account instead of a small balance due to the treasurer. The report of the secretary (Mr. A. W. Odgers), and of the Sunday-school superintendent (Miss Piper) were also of a satisfactory nature. Mr. A. H. Martin was re-elected chairman of the congregation, and in returning thanks said they had passed through a very eventful year; they had lost the minister who had been with them for a number of years, and they had found a new minister who would, he was sure, prove a very worthy successor of the one they had lost.

King's Lynn.—The Rev. J. B. Morton Barnes, B.A., who has been giving a course of sermons at this church since the beginning of the year, has accepted an invitation to become the minister. Mr. Barnes was formerly assistant minister to the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong at Liverpool.

Manchester: Unitarian Home Missionary College.—A Jubilee meeting was held at Burnley on Saturday last. Mr. J. S. Mackie presided and the meeting was addressed by Principal Gordon, Revs. C. Peach, E. Allen, and J. Morgan Whiteman. A further meeting was held on Tuesday last at Heywood. The chair was taken by Mr. David Healey and addresses were delivered by Colonel Pilcher, Rev. C. Peach, Alderman Firth, J.P., Conner W. Healey, J.P., and Mr. J. Standring. At both meetings the Jubilee proposals were heartily approved and commended to the congregations for support.

Middlesbrough.—The Guild has just concluded its third year, which has been prosperous. Meetings have been held weekly except in the summer; lectures and discussions, "at homes," free breakfasts for poor children, and visitation of the sick have been among the Guild's activities. It is not exclusively confined to young people, but all are invited to join.

Newport, Isle of Wight.—On Wednesday evening, March 15, the members of the congregation held a successful social gathering to take leave of their minister the Rev. Clement E. Pike, who resigns his pastorate at the end of this month. During the evening Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke expressed the regret that all would feel that Mr. Pike was leaving them, and most cordially acknowledged the faithful and valuable services rendered by him during the six and a half years as their minister. Mr. J. G. Pinnock, Mr. F. Pinnock and others also paid a warm tribute to Mr. Pike's work for the church and town, making special mention of the services so cheerfully and willingly rendered by Miss Pike in connection with the choir, the class for elder girls, and the women's sewing meeting. A very cordial wish was expressed for their future happiness. The Rev. Clement E. Pike, after acknowledging the receipt of a testimonial to himself from the members of the congregation, and also a present from the choir to Miss Pike, feelingly referred to the several events during his ministry, and to the good feeling which had been so happily maintained between himself and the congregation, whose interests and prosperity he should always have at heart. A very general feeling of regret has been expressed throughout the town by many outside the congregation that Mr. Pike is leaving Newport, as he has so thoroughly interested himself in many useful movements of a general character.

Northampton.—On Sunday evening a visit, permitted by the Church Committee, was paid after service by members of the Salvation Army on behalf of "self-denial week." The Rev. A. Harvie presided, and the utmost good feeling prevailed. A lantern lecture on "Jesus as Hofmann sees him," took the place of the evening service on March 5.

Horwich.—The Rev. H. V. Mills has just concluded a successful second course of lantern lectures on "Evolution of Religion," given in the school on four consecutive evenings. The weather was never very favourable, but throughout the attendance was good, the average being 157. A large proportion of those present on each occasion were men.

Park Lane, near Wigan.—The Rev. J. E. Stead, having accepted an invitation to the Christian Church, Mossley, has tendered his resignation of the pastorate of the above chapel. At a congregational meeting held on Sunday week, the resignation was accepted, with the best wishes of the congregation for his success in his new sphere of labour.

Pillars of the Temple

BY

MINOT J. SAVAGE, D.D.

PREFACE BY ROBERT COLLYER.

CONTENTS.

I. THE GOD WE WORSHIP.
II. THE CHRIST WE LOVE.
III. THE HEAVEN WE HOPE FOR.
IV. THE HELL WE FEAR.
V. THE BIBLE WE ACCEPT.
VI. THE DIVINE INSPIRATION.
VII. THE SALVATION WE BELIEVE IN.
VIII. THE CHURCH WE BELONG TO.

DR. SAVAGE is acknowledged to be one of the foremost preachers of liberal religion in America, and his books have a wide circulation among many different classes of people. In this last volume each chapter deals with cardinal points of religious belief from the author's Unitarian point of view. The pillars upon which this temple is reared are sturdy columns of rational religious conceptions which concern the development of the higher life. The Rev. Robert Collyer writes a brief introduction, telling of the circumstances under which he became in a way sponsor for the material now published as "Pillars of the Temple."

A Theist's Apology.

A Reply to Agnosticism.

BY

WALTER LLOYD.

CONTENTS.

I. AGNOSTICISM.
II. RELIGIOUS AGNOSTICISM.
III. EVIL.
IV. THE KNOWLEDGE OF GOD.
V. FAITH.
VI. THE ETHICAL STRUGGLE.
VII. BENEFICENCE.
VIII. GOD AND THE WORLD.
IX. RELIGION.

"AGNOSTICISM," writes Mr. Lloyd, "has received the stamp of approval from men of very high intellectual standing and of unquestioned moral worth, and Agnostic books are often distinguished by a very lofty spirit as well as literary excellence." The author devotes a series of brief chapters to the consideration of the arguments and theories of Agnostics and sets against them the views held by a Theist who accepts reason, conscience, and experience as his guides. He shows there is ample evidence to prove that religion makes men wiser, happier, better; and he holds that while the Agnostic may not share the convictions of the Theist, he has no right "to assert that the Theist's faith and hope do not rest upon logically satisfying evidence."

"Mr. Lloyd's small volume is a reply to Agnosticism. He contends for all that is to be said on the other side, that our faith is a reasonable thing, that only where Agnosticism ends does Religion begin, and that a sense of the Divine Presence is the fountain of all that is best in man."—The Bookman.

Anchors of the Soul.

SERMONS

BY THE REV.

BROOKE HERFORD, D.D.,

Minister of Arlington Street Church, Boston, U.S.A., and Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead.

WITH A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

BY THE REV.

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A.

CONTENTS:

BROOKE HERFORD: A Biographical Sketch—Anchors of the Soul—The Gate Beautiful—Man's Part in Evolution—Goodness Possible in Unlikely Places—Christ's Council about the Morrow—On Supplying Others' Lack of Service—Patient Continuance in Well-doing—The Kingdoms of God that are at Hand—Gaining Life by Losing it—The Service of Patience—Day unto Day Having the Courage to be Defeated—Religion Away from Home—The Exclusiveness of Truth—How About Growing Old—Righteousness a Direction—Everything Beautiful in its Season—How to Regain a Lost Faith—On Running a Losing Race—On Making the Best Use of Sundays—Standing Up and Looking Up.

"THIS Biographical Sketch makes us regret that we did not know Brooke Herford; and is there anything better that a biography can do than that? The sermons bear out the biography. Brooke Herford's characteristics were courage and common sense, characteristics that are not always yoked together, but they are found in the sermons as well as in the man."—The Expository Times.

DR. HORTON says:—"The Sermons are very remarkable; they are practical and forceful. A breeze seems to blow through them; and they are worthy of the author of 'Religion in England.' They throb with life, they put out hands and lay hold of heart and conscience."

Supremacy of Jesus.

BY

JOSEPH H. CROOKER, D.D.

CONTENTS.

I. THE HISTORIC POSITION OF JESUS.
II. JESUS AND GOSPEL CRITICISM.
III. A NEW APPRECIATION OF JESUS.
IV. THE MASTER OF INNER LIFE.
V. THE AUTHORITY OF JESUS.

RELIGIOUS literature has many treatises, large and small, on the life and teachings of Jesus. Something new has been remarkably well said, with a fresh form of treatment and from an original point of view, in this volume. It is a reverent, sympathetic clear-sighted exposition, in the light of the frankly accepted higher criticism, of the essential and permanent elements in the life and teaching of Jesus of Nazareth. There is nothing negative, uncertain, or evasive in the treatment of the subject here given. Written from the vantage ground of the best modern thought, this book fills an important place in liberal religious literature.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE issue this week the first two of a series of articles in connection with the celebration of Dr. Martineau's centenary. It is true that only a brief interval has elapsed between the death of the great man and his hundredth anniversary. Yet, while this fact will undoubtedly affect the methods of celebrating the occasion, it cannot be other than good for us to drink in while we may fresh inspiration from the fount long hallowed for us. Norwich, as is right, claims a special part in the event, and our sketches of its earlier days will be read with interest, in view of the Good Friday meeting and service. Professor Upton gives us this week the first of two articles, and in ensuing issues we shall present contributions by other well-known writers.

THE passing of Jules Verne at the time when we are recalling the birth of Hans Christian Andersen gives food for thought. The immense success of the French writer marks a distinct change in the literature, and doubtless in the mental life, of youth. Of course, there have long been purveyors of science to young minds, and it is pleasant to recall those "Dialogues" by the Rev. Jeremiah Joyce, once of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, which not only delighted our grandfathers (or some of them) but our not very venerable selves. But Jules Verne was an artist of quite another kind. He was not the first to use technical knowledge as a basis of romance; Edmond About, for one, led the way successfully. But Verne became, and will apparently remain, as decidedly the great teller of the fairy tales of science as Andersen is the prince of romancers of the older sort.

——

OUR friend, Mr. Hodgson Pratt, writes strongly endorsing the advice given by several correspondents that intending visitors to the International Council of Unitarians at Geneva should make their holidaying after the meeting, not before. Mr. Pratt adds :—"May I also, as one who knows that many 'Liberal Religious Thinkers' are also servants of the cause of Peace, inform them that it is virtually settled that the Fourteenth Annual Peace Congress will be held this year on Sept. 19 and five following days at Lucerne. It may also interest them to know that there will, on this occasion, be a very large attendance of American friends, an intimation to that effect having been received by the Peace Bureau at Berne. The unsurpassed charms of the 'Lake of the Four Cantons,' an important programme for the Peace-makers, the Bloch Museum, and the presence of our cousins from across the Atlantic, will surely induce many readers of THE INQUIRER to wend their way to Lucerne." We cordially support Mr. Pratt's suggestion, for all who can extend their holiday thus far.

——

THE Rev. W. J. Dawson, of London, writing to the Christian World, describes the remarkable way in which all denominations, Unitarian included, have helped his special mission to the masses in Boston, U.S.A, Meanwhile, here in England is the American Dr. Torrey missing no opportunity of warning his hearers against Unitarians. The Christian Register (Boston) while trusting that each effort will benefit religion, points out that the intellectual methods of the two missioners "are as different as those of Edwards and Channing. The Englishman thinks that modern knowledge can be made fluent and quickened throughout with the religious spirit. Dr. Torrey reverses the method of statement. According to him, whoever is filled with the Holy Ghost will accept Calvinism in its crudest form, beginning with the substitutionary atonement of Christ, and ending with the eternal torment of all who reject him as their Saviour.' Now, which is likely to help the world most ?

THE spring exhibition of pictures at the Whitechapel Art Gallery is eagerly looked forward to by many thousands of people whose lives are drab and monotonous in the extreme, and during the quarter of a century of this experiment in bringing our treasures of art within reach of the poor of East London there has been no more delightful collection than that which was declared open by Sir William Richmond on Tuesday week. The growing keenness of interest with which the exhibition is regarded, and the pleasure it affords, is shown by the increasing numbers of visitors, which have grown from 10,000 to 125,000. This total includes numerous parties of children from the elementary schools, who are taken round the gallery by volunteer guides, and who gain in this way a slight vision of what education really means. The catalogue, which contains many interesting and suggestive notes, is largely purchased, and, as Canon Barnett tells us, is studied and re-studied, and affords a subject of thought and conversation in the homes.

——

ONE fact mentioned at the opening ceremony gives peculiar satisfaction. The London County Council has been approached with a view to their taking over the expense of maintaining the gallery, and it is hoped that in a not very distant future this change will be effected. The municipal responsibility for the artistic development of the citizens was more thoroughly recognised among the city states of the fifteenth century than amongst us, although many of our great provincial towns have set the metropolis a worthy example in this respect. There is evidence of this on the walls where are hung numerous pictures lent by the corporations of more than one city. Any sign of this sort is to be welcomed. The L.C.C. and other Councils begin to show an increasing regard to the economic condition of the people. The recent Education Acts have thrown on them a large responsibility for instructing the public. This is for the most part education in the means of livelihood. It is of supreme importance to remember the good Toynbee motto and provide the "means of life." and among these there are few more powerful than the winning, penetrating influence of beautiful pictures.

As to the pictures here brought together for a short six weeks it would be easy to write columns about those which are new to us or those which have become a household sight throughout the land. We have here a representative collection illustrating British art fifty years ago—during the period from about 1840 to 1870. The character is given to the exhibition by the early work of the pre-

Raphaelites and the less well-known work of the group of artists known as the Liverpool school. We cannot re-write the larger part of the catalogue. But mention may be made of the two little pictures of William Dyce—"The Madonna and Child," and "The Gethsemane." There are few things more tender and dignified in feeling, more beautiful in execution, than these. Arthur Hughes, Maddox Brown, Holman Hunt, D. G. Rossetti, and others reveal the force and purity of passion gathered up in pre-Raphaelitism. For the many other famous artists whose pictures are here set before us the name of Turner must suffice. We are indeed grateful to the directors of the gallery, rejoice with them in the success of their labours, rejoice that for a season these beautiful fair things are in Whitechapel, and would even hope for the time when Whitechapel itself shall be a beautiful place to live in.

Changes are coming fast over the Methodist world of thought. The Rev. J. E. Rattenbury, of Nottingham, whose physical energy is apparently as great as his evangelical zeal, confesses that the theory of a personal devil is one that he cannot hold. There are plenty of devilish things about, however, and with these he would have men fight. As he is looked upon as a "coming man," the successor, indeed, to the late Hugh Price Hughes—we may usefully note this aspect of his thinking. In this connection we may mention a report sent us by Mr. Borrow, of Darlington, respecting a meeting of Primitive Methodists in the north. Here are some of the expressions used: "Very few of our members now believe in eternal punishment, literal hell-fire, or in penitent form conversion as needful for salvation"; "the doctrine of original sin is very far from the truth"; "very few believe now that every word in the Bible is God's word. This has been found untenable, and cannot be made a foundation for belief." There is some leaven at work, evidently.

The Early Christian Conception of Christ: Its Significance and Value in the History of Religion, by Otto Pfleiderer, Professor of Theology in the University of Berlin, is an English translation in Messrs. Williams & Norgate's Crown Library, of the address from which Professor Pfleiderer read the opening and concluding passages at the International meeting at Amsterdam in 1903. On the title-page of this translation it is said to be "expanded from a lecture delivered," &c., but the whole address was written, and, indeed, published, in Berlin before its partial delivery at Amsterdam. In noticing the original publication last year, we referred to the value of the study, as showing, with striking illustrations gathered from the comparative study of religions, what various influences had helped to mould the conception of "the Christ" in the minds of the early disciples. The English version of the title hardly brings this out—viz., that the Christusbild is regarded "in religionsgeschichtlicher Beleuchtung." The history of religion is used to illustrate the formation of the primitive conception of the Christ.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. ARTHUR HARVIE.

Early on Wednesday morning, without premonitory illness, the Rev. Arthur Harvie, of Northampton, passed away in his sleep. He had held a Bible class in the evening, and lay down to rest in his usual bright humour, looking forward to the duties of the morrow.

The young and ardent spirit who has thus suddenly been taken from us leaves no unworthy record behind. Born in London, June 30, 1868, he had already done a strenuous day's labour when rest came. From boyhood he was subject to severe illness, which affected his heart so seriously that on seeking admission to the Unitarian Home Missionary College the medical verdict was against him. This was in 1890. Undeterred in his courage and devotion to the call to serve God and man as a minister, he availed himself of what means of culture he could, and soon gave evidence of no ordinary gifts of mind and speech. In consequence he was entrusted with the "forlorn hope" of re-opening the church at Devonport in 1891, and in spite of all difficulties he succeeded remarkably in reviving the life of the congregation. In 1894 he became minister at Oldham-road, Manchester, and characteristically took the opportunity of attending classes as a visitor at the Unitarian Home Missionary College for some terms. In 1897 he was appointed Missionary Minister in the Northumberland and Durham district, and one abiding result of his work there is the congregation and church at Gateshead, which grew up under his missionary preaching, and of which he became first pastor in 1898. Two years ago Mr. Harvie was appointed minister to the Kettering-road Church at Northampton, and here he seemed marked out for a long and fruitful ministry. Indefatigable in all the duties that fell to him as a minister, he extended his labours in many ways, not shrinking from political activity, but especially giving himself to the service of those personal and social reforms which lie more closely at the root of national well-being than many more prominent schemes. He was absolutely fearless, and his sincerity not seldom involved him in conflict, but it was his sufficient defence; and he will live in the memory of many as a singularly intelligent, pure-hearted, and unselfish man. The loss to our ministry of one whose gifts, now emerging from the inevitable difficulties of his youth, seemed to be enriched year by year, is a serious one. His like for enthusiasm and diligence will not easily be found.

Mr. Harvie was the only son of Mr. Jas. Harvie, of Clapham, one of the earliest members of the Wandsworth congregation, and known in many Unitarian families from his connection (as gymnastic instructor) with Roedean School, Brighton, and other educational institutions. Deep sorrow will be felt for him and his family, for the Northampton congregation, and especially for Mr. Harvie's young widow, who is left with two girls aged ten and eight respectively.

W. G. T.

MR. J. W. CROMPTON, J.P.

On March 23 J. W. Crompton, Esq., of Rivington Hall, Rivington, passed peacefully away, at his residence, in his 71st year.

By Mr. Crompton's death Rivington Chapel loses one of its most loyal and devoted members, and chief supporter. Born in Liverpool, he was brought up in the principles of Unitarianism, and in early life took part in Sunday-school and civic work under the direction and friendship of Dr. Martineau. As a boy he spent many of his holidays at the Hall with his uncles, Robert and John Andrews. His love of country life, and of Rivington, grew stronger year by year, and his knowledge of the wild flowers and the insect life of the locality became wide and accurate. He was passionately fond of trees, and some of his plantations attest his skill in choosing suitable situations. Agriculture also had its attractions for him. He experimented, and sent the results to the Journal of Agriculture, many of them being full of interest. In politics he was a Liberal, and he laboured for the welfare of the public, both on the platform and in the press. In religion he was a staunch Unitarian, well read, cultured, enthusiastic. In many ways he was ever trying to influence young men to think for themselves, and grudged neither trouble nor expense in furnishing them with appropriate literature. Until failing health prevented him, he was a regular attendant at the chapel, both morning and afternoon, and for many years he taught in the Sunday-school, the New Testament being invariably his favourite text-book.

He took a prominent part in the work of the township of Rivington, and especially in regard to education. It may be noted that he was chairman of the meeting at which the present incumbent of the Church of England was nominated for the office, and his influence did much to effect the election of the Rev. Wm. Ritson, M.A. Mr. Crompton was chairman for many years of the Shaw Charities (eleemosynary and educational), and by his sympathetic and far-seeing grasp of their workings proved himself a real friend and helper. Throughout his life he was anxious to do good and help forward any object. He was always a generous giver, his sympathies were broad, and wide as humanity.

By nature he was kind, genial, and optimistic. A lover of Nature, he found ample scope for study and enjoyment in his own beautiful woods and fields; a lover, too, of children, he delighted to walk with them, and they were as delighted to walk with him and learn to see and admire the beauty that lay all around, for he had a particular influence over the young. Averse to outside show and display of any kind, he was an example of plain living and high thinking; a country gentleman, kind, courteous, and considerate.

Lister, Mr. David Martineau, Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, Rev. H. Woods Perris, Mr. J. G. Pinnock, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Rev. Lawrence Scott, Mr. Hugh Stannus, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Mr. S. S. Tayler, Rev. Ephraim Turland, Rev. W. Wooding, Mr. T. P. Young, and the Secretary.

The minutes of the meeting, held October 26, 1904, having been read and confirmed, the Secretary read the Report of the Executive Committee (see next page).

The President said the Report, otherwise full of life and promise, ended on a note of mournfulness in recording the death of so many valued members. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong had not been known to him personally, but all in our body knew the important position he held, and the active service he rendered, not only in the pulpit and on the platform, but with the pen. He nobly illustrated in these ways the purity and vitality of his faith; up to the very last he was in harness, dying, as he had lived, in the service of the religion he professed. In Mr. Chas Harding he had lost a personal friend, and on behalf of friends and relatives he wished to acknowledge gratefully the tribute to his memory contained in the Report. A man of generous impulses and the kindliest nature, he was endeared to all. It was his good fortune to feel warm attachment to the faith which he had inherited, and he showed that attachment by practical interest. In the position filled so well by the late Mr. Cogan Conway at Ringwood, the President saw an example that might be advantageously followed in country congregations. It might not be inappropriate to refer to Sir Roger de Coverley's opinion, that often it would be better that a man should be secured with a good voice and a good delivery, who, instead of attempting to compose original discourses, would read those containing "sound doctrine," which could readily be found. Mr. Conway had rendered most valuable service in his ministrations as a lay preacher.

Mr. W. Blake Odgers asked to be allowed to refer to two old personal friends whose names had been mentioned. The first of these was the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who was one of four students to whom he was deeply indebted for true guidance and friendship, when, as a lad of sixteen, he came up to London in 1865. The other three were Ambrose Nichols Blatchford, Joseph Estlin Carpenter, and Philip Henry Wicksteed, and better friends, more helpful and inspiring, no youth could have had. Richard Armstrong was one of the brightest and cheeriest students at University Hall, whence he went to his successive ministries at Banbridge, Nottingham, and Liverpool—in all of them rendering most fruitful service. He was not always the bright and cheery spirit he had been; doubts came, and severe trials; but he faced his doubts and bore his trials manfully, and the most precious thing in his writings, such as "God and the Soul," was that he showed there the clear affirmation of a strong faith in God and the ultimate salvation of man. Thus his work was truly constructive. Lecturing as he was for that Association till close before his death, he reminded one of Kingsley's words of another—"He died in harness, going about his work, and that's the best way a man can die." Mr. Odgers said his intimacy with Mr. Cogan Conway was equally long-standing. In him there was exactly the realisation of the ideal sketched by the President; with a "good voice" and "good delivery," he had read sermons written by others, and this with such good effect that the members of the congregation now felt that, if only in justice to his memory, the chapel must at all costs be kept open for worship. There was nothing clerical about him; a good actor and reciter, secretary of the local cricket club, and a public worker in many ways, he was known to all his townsmen and respected by all. Owing to what he saw of the struggles of the ministry, especially in country places, his determination had arisen to secure, if possible, a retiring fund for aged ministers; and they all knew how he had worked for the establishment of the Ministers' Pension Fund, which would be in itself a standing tribute to his memory.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant specially emphasised the loss to Unitarians on both sides of the Atlantic in the death of that able writer and manly man, the Rev. J. W. Chadwick. He would like to assure their American brethren that in this country there was a sincere appreciation of the power and character of Mr. Chadwick, over whose departure they mourned in common.

Mr. H. Stannus, referring to the report, asked particulars respecting the refusal of books at a Scottish library.

The Secretary explained that the action had been that of an official, and that the Committee had reversed his decision and had accepted the books ultimately.

Mr. Ion Pritchard drew attention to the successful tour recently made in Australasia by the Rev. C. Hargrove. Letters from correspondents continually asked "When will he come again?" The prospects of extended work in New Zealand, under the leadership of the Rev. W. Jellie, were especially good. Of their deceased friends he would like to say a wood. In Mr. Armstrong they had lost one who was pre-eminent as a teacher of teachers and a source of inspiration to the whole Sunday-school movement, which the speaker might be allowed particularly to represent at that meeting. Our Indian friends might well rejoice in the character and career of the saintly Devendra Nath Tagore, over whose grave all sections of Hindoo religious life met in one common feeling of reverent gratitude. Mr. Chadwick he had met five years ago, and could not forget the impression made upon his mind by one who was so deservedly honoured and esteemed. In Mr. J. Cogan Conway they had lost one who not seldom found himself in a minority, who always spoke out fearlessly, but without hurting the feelings of others.

The Rev. E. Turland expressed the hope that the arrangement by which a representative of the Brahmo Samaj acted temporarily as agent for the Association in dealing with the Unitarian Christians in the Khasi Hills did not imply a diversion of their regard from simple Unitarian Christianity. He was glad to note the signs of progress in Norway and Denmark.

Miss Emily Sharpe desired to commend all possible care of old and apparently decaying congregations which might, by judicious help, be revived.

The Secretary assured Mr. Turland that the views of the Committee regarding the Khasi Hills Mission were in accord with his own. As regards old congregations, the policy commended by Miss Sharpe was steadily pursued: and he gave instances of successful revival of some of them. There were others, however, where at present no good work appeared possible; and they could not properly waste the subscribers' money upon such cases.

The President, in moving the adoption of the report, said their literary activities were chiefly, he was glad to observe, on the side of building up the religious life. It was, doubtless, a little unfortunate that the label "Unitarian" had come to mean controversy to many people outside our body, who on that account judged us unfairly. It must, however, be admitted that too many Unitarians showed a regretable disregard of public worship. No doubt they were devoted to public work, but both that and themselves would be bettered, he thought, if they gave more attention to worship. He commended the plan now before the Midland Christian Union, due to the Rev. Joseph Wood, for devoting a large fund of £5,000 to the more generous support of churches in the immediate present, but with reduction as years went on. They must spare no effort to secure an effective ministry, and he believed the Association was doing most valuable work in this direction.

Mr. W. Blake Odgers seconded the motion, which was carried.

The Secretary then made a statement respecting the nominations for the new Council and Committee. Among those invited to join the former were:—Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, L.C.C.; Mr. H. P. Greg; Mr. W. Byng Kenrick; Mr. Macky (Auckland, New Zealand); his Excellency Sir Arthur Nicolson (British Ambassador at Madrid); and Colonel A. Wallace (Punjaub).

At the Whit-week meetings Professor Henry Jones would deliver the Essex Hall Lecture, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers would be the preacher; Dr. S. H. Mellone would read a paper on Dr. Martineau and F. W. Newman, the centenaries of both occurring this year. He also stated that at the Geneva "International" meeting papers would be read by the following English representatives:—Rev. J. E. Carpenter, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and himself.

A vote of thanks to the President concluded the proceedings.

REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE B. & F. U. A.

SINCE the meeting of the Council in October last, the Executive Committee have held five monthly meetings, and there have been twenty-eight meetings of sub-committees. There are generally upwards of one hundred different items on the monthly agenda paper; and were it not that the bulk of these items are carefully considered beforehand by the sub-committees, it would not be possible adequately to transact the business of the Association at the ordinary meetings of the Executive Committee.

FINANCE.

The Treasurer's statement of accounts for the year ending Dec. 31, 1904, shows the following results:—Income for the year, £8,211 13s. 8d., made up from subscriptions, £4,694 10s. 6d.; donations, £29 14s.; collections, £594 0s. 4d.; dividends and interest, £1,172 11s. 7d.; book department, £1,657 16s. 5d.; special income, £63 0s. 10d. Expenditure for the year, £8,203 14s. 2d., made up as follows:—Missionary grants for home work, £3,449 15s. 2d.; foreign work, £1,228 16s. 2d.; grants of books and tracts—home, £412 6s. 4d.; foreign, £318 2s. 5d.; deputation expenses, £42 8s. 6d.; book department, £1,548 18s. 2d.; salaries and wages, office and book-room, £915 4s. 4d.; maintenance and office expenses, £216 6s. 7d.; annual report and anniversary, £71 16s. 6d.

It will be seen, therefore, that the whole annual income was expended during the year, less £7 19s. 6d. This statement has reference only to the general funds of the Association. The McQuaker Trust and other special funds are not here taken into account.

During 1904 two hundred and twenty-seven congregations had collections, and the amount received from this source was £560 3s. 6d., an increase of nine congregations, and of £38 10s. 3d. on the previous year.

The subscription list for 1904 shows only the very slight decrease of £8 14s. on 1903. Greater difficulties confront the treasurer during the present year, for there have been several recent losses by death which will largely reduce the list for 1905, unless new subscribers come forward to take their place. Already thirty-four new subscribers have joined the Association, several of whom were induced to do so by the Chairman of the Finance Committee personally speaking to members of the congregation at Wandsworth, to which he belongs—an example which might well be copied up and down the country.

Legacies have been received since the last meeting of the Council as follows:—Mrs. Cooke, of Guildford, £495 (being £550 less duty); Miss Rea, of Belfast, £100; and Mrs. Jenkin Davies, a former member of the Committee, £500.

PUBLICATIONS.

There has been great activity of late in the printing and publishing department of the Association's work. First in importance there is a new book of 600 pages, by the Rev J. Estlin Carpenter, entitled "James Martineau, Theologian and Teacher: A Study of His Life and Thought," which the Committee hope to have ready by the centenary on April 21. The volume is divided into eleven chapters, beginning with the early years of Dr. Martineau's life, and ending with an analysis of his philosophy of religion. His college years, his ministry in Dublin, Liverpool, and London, the philosophical and theological changes through which he passed, his work as tutor and principal of Manchester New College, his attitude towards Unitarianism, his contributions to religious literature, with much new correspondence, make up a most interesting and instructive book. There will also be issued shortly a volume containing the course of six lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism in the Nineteenth Century," delivered by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong at Northampton and Nottingham immediately before his death, which he had prepared with a view to publication. Mr. P. H. Wicksteed and others who have read the MSS. are of opinion that the book will prove to be one of great value, equal in literary treatment and intellectual power to Mr. Armstrong's best work.

The sixpenny reprints of "The First Three Gospels," by Mr. Carpenter, and of "God and the Soul," by Mr. Armstrong, have been sold in large numbers through ordinary trade channels: it is a matter of surprise that only a few congregations appear to have done anything in the way of circulating these books among their members. The sixpenny edition of "The Soul: Its Sorrows and Aspirations," by F. W. Newman, with a brief memoir and an introduction by the Rev. C. B. Upton, has just been published—in good time for the centenary, which is on June 27. The sixpenny edition of "The Passing and the Permanent in Religion," by the Rev. M. J. Savage, will be issued in a few weeks. These sixpenny editions are published as a missionary enterprise; they have involved a considerable outlay, rendered possible only by the increased resources placed at the disposal of the Committee under the scheme for new and enlarged work.

A new series of sermons by Unitarian ministers is now in the press. The sermons will be of a practical and devotional type, not controversial. There are also a number of new tracts in course of preparation, including one dealing with the Miracles in the New Testament, which Dr. Drummond, the Principal of Manchester College, has promised to prepare, and one giving a translation of "The Teachings of the Twelve Apostles," with an introduction by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers.

"Anchors of the Soul," a volume of sermons by the late Dr. Brooke Hereford, with a biographical sketch by Mr. P. H. Wicksteed, reported upon at the last meeting of the Council, has been published; also, on the suggestion of members of his family and other friends, "Eutychus," a series of quaint old-world pew and pulpit papers which form very pleasant present-day reading. Mr. Walter Lloyd's "A Theist's Apology" has been warmly welcomed as a helpful aid to perplexed and doubting minds. Editions of new books by Dr. Crooker, "The Supremacy of Jesus," and by Dr. Savage, "Pillars of the Temple," have been purchased from the American Unitarian Association, and may now be had at Essex Hall. The "remainder" of the two-volume edition of the "Life and Letters of Dr. Martineau," by Dr. Drummond and Mr. Upton, has been purchased by the Committee, and this important standard work may now be procured at the Essex Hall Book Room for 12s. 6d.

During the four months, November 1, 1904, to February 28, 1905, grants of 1,690 books and 32,121 tracts have been made to ministers, congregations, and postal missions in England, to the value of £194 7s. 6d.; and 1,371 books, 1,772 tracts, to the value of £95 16s. 7d., to religious inquirers in foreign countries. Perhaps if Dr. Torrey knew that every fresh attack he makes upon Unitarians only increases the demand for Unitarian literature, he might be disposed to reconsider this particular plan of campaign! The demand for the Rev. A. N. Blatchford's little tract, in answer to Dr. Torrey's aspersions, has been so great that a second large edition was called for within a few weeks.

HOME MISSION WORK.

During the last five months grants of money for various purposes, amounting in all to £579, generally with special conditions attached in respect to local contributions, have been made to the following places:—Aberdare, Bulverhythe, Capel-y-fadfa, Chatham, Cheltenham, Cribyn, Darlington, Guildford, Ipswich, Killinchy, Lancaster. London: Kilburn, Lewisham, Plumstead, Stratford. Manchester: Pendlebury, Nelson, Padiham, Panteg, Pepperhill, Rushall, Scarborough, S.E. Wales Society, Wick. Postal Missions: Provincial Assembly, Eastern Union.

Grants towards the salaries of ministers, usually paid through the Committees of District Associations, who are expected to find, if possible, an equal amount from their own funds, have been voted at the following rates for the year 1905:—Ashton, £70; Bedfield, £30; Balsall Heath, Birmingham, £20; Small Heath, Birmingham, £50; Boston, £20; Bournemouth, £25; Bridgend, £50; Burnley, £50; Canterbury and Deal, £20; Cardiff, £30; Carlisle, £50; Clydach Vale, £15; Colyton, £10; Congleton, £20; Crewe, £40; Crewkerne, £25; Denton, £35; Devonport and Plymouth, £35; Framlingham, £15; Gateshead, £50; Hastings, £35; Huddersfield, £35; Ilkeston and Loughborough, £60. Leicester: Narboro'-road, £20; Llwynrhydowen, £5. London:—Acton, £60; Bermondsey, £20; Forest Gate, £40; Kentish Town, £60; Lewisham, £50; Mansford-street, £15; Peckham, £60; Plumstead, £50; Stepney, £15; Walthamstow, £10; Lydgate, £10; Malton, £10. Manchester:—Bradford, £40; Chorlton, £30; Pendleton, £30; Urmston, £35. Middlesbrough, £30; Mottram, £35; Newark, £15; Newbury, £15, Newton Abbott, £10; Nottage, £15. Nottingham: Christ Church, £25. Penrhiw, £5; Pentre, £15; Pontypridd, £40; Poole, £30; Reading, £20; Southampton, £50; Stockton, £10; Sychbant, £5; Torquay, £30; Whitchurch, £15; Wick, £5; Wolverhampton, £70; Yarmouth, £20. District Ministers: Liverpool Association, £100; London and S.E. Counties Provincial Assembly, £100; Western Union £75;

(Bridgwater endowment contributes £100) Yorkshire Union, £100.

The grants are suspended whenever the pulpits become vacant, and are not renewed until the approval of the Committee is obtained to any new arrangements that are made.

The lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism," by Mr. Armstrong at Northampton and Nottingham, attracted large and interested audiences. He had looked forward to delivering the same course of lectures in London and Manchester, but death came and called him away before the dates arranged for their delivery. Mr. Carpenter delivered his course of six lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" at Hull and Norwich, and two lectures on "How to Read the Gospels" at Chesterfield, St. Helens, and Stourbridge. The attendance in several instances reached 400; deep interest was shown, and warm appreciation expressed. The Secretary of the congregation at Hull writes:—"The church committee recognise the benefit likely to ensue, not only to the church and to the cause, but to the general advancement of thought in the religious life of the town. The attendance was maintained at between 350 and 400 at each of the six lectures. The sustained interest evinced was remarkable in view of the admittedly somewhat severe demand on the intelligence and attention of the audience. The lectures, as you know, were no mere effort at entertainment, but rather an honest scholarly attempt through the recital of the result of his own earnest studies after the truth, to convey to his hearers an understanding of the position at which he (Mr. Carpenter) had arrived." The Committee are so thoroughly persuaded of the importance and value of this work that they are urging Mr. Carpenter to allow them to make arrangements for a further series of lectures next autumn.

In co-operation with the London District Unitarian Society, and under the superintendence of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, services for the people will be held in the Town Hall, Stratford, conducted by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, J. Page Hopps, and James C. Street, beginning next Sunday evening, April 2. In response to applications from a number of congregations, special services have been held, when sermons have been preached recently by the Revs. Dendy Agate, V. D. Davis, L. Jenkins Jones, J. E. Manning, J. E. Odgers, Charles Roper, W. G. Tarrant, Frank Walters, and the Secretary. This work will now be suspended until the autumn; and it may not be possible for the Committee to continue it to the same extent or on quite the same lines as heretofore.

For a fourth term the services at Cambridge for undergraduates and others have been held, and arrangements have been made for a further series of religious services next term. The preachers last term were the Revs. J. Worsley Austin, J. E. Carpenter, E. I. Fripp, Henry Gow, Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, L. P. Jacks, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, J. Edwin Odgers, and J. C. Street. The visits of these ministers have been highly appreciated, and the Committee believe they are justified in incurring the necessary expenditure in carrying on the services at Cambridge.

Hardly a day passes but letters are received at Essex Hall from congregations seeking ministers, and from ministers seeking congregations. It often proves a difficult task to give honest, helpful advice in response to these inquiries. There are at the present time (March, 1905) 14 congregations without ministers. Of these it may be said that 10 are not in a position to pay £50 a year towards the salary of a minister; 20 are not in a position to pay £100, and of the remaining 10 only five seem to be in a position to pay £150 and upwards.

There are at the present time 30 ministers free to accept appointments. Perhaps 10 of these have some private means of their own, but the remaining 20 are probably dependent on the ministry for obtaining a living. For every vacant pulpit where a salary of £150 a year or upwards is available there are at least half-a-dozen ministers always ready and willing to accept such an appointment.

Congregations have their own standards by which they judge of the suitability of ministers. It not infrequently happens that they prefer a man who has had no special training for the ministry to one who has spent three or four years at the Unitarian College, Manchester, or six years as an undergraduate and theological student at Oxford. These facts suggest some searching investigation and serious reflection on the part of congregations, ministers, students for the ministry, and the committees of associations, sustentation funds, and colleges.

Some of the smaller congregations realise that it is hopeless for them to think of securing an educated and capable minister all to themselves. A few of these congregations get along exceedingly well with lay preachers, and an occasional visit from a neighbouring and neighbourly minister, or a service by a preacher from a distance. It should be remembered that there is an ample and varied selection of sermons and devotional literature suitable for use at religious services conducted by the people themselves where it is practically impossible to obtain the services of a paid minister.

Foreign Mission Work.

The largely attended welcome-home meeting to the Rev. Charles Hargrove and Mrs. Hargrove on their return from Australasia, held at Essex Hall on January 31, when Mr. Hargrove gave a vivid and interesting description of his journey and experiences as the representative of the Association, is still fresh in the memory of many members of the Council. The congregations at Adelaide, Melbourne, Sydney, and Auckland were greatly cheered and encouraged by the presence and speech of Mr. Hargrove. At Hobart, Tasmania, and at Wellington, New Zealand, there is every hope of founding a Unitarian Church. The Committee have promised to pay one half of the minister's salary for a period of two or three years, if the people themselves can see their way to find the other half, just as the congregation at Auckland did.

In a letter received a few days ago from the Rev. W. Jellie he tells of a recent visit to Wellington, when he held a religious service at which between fifty and sixty people were present, representing from thirty to forty families. This was in the middle of the New Zealand summer, when there is a large exodus, and as there was little done in the way of advertisement, Mr. Jellie says this may be put as the minimum number of people interested in Unitarian services at Wellington. He made many visits privately during his few days' stay, he was everywhere well received, and his impression was confirmed that the time is fully ripe for an able, energetic man from the old country to come out and settle at Wellington, where the prospects are such as to tempt the most ambitious of our younger ministers, who is anxious to make a career for himself in a noble and helpful ministry of liberal religion in New Zealand.

Important work is carried on in India, chiefly by means of the circulation of books and tracts under the superintendence of Professor Chatterjee, of Allahabad, Mr. H. C. Sarkar of Calcutta, Mr. V. R. Shinde, of Bombay, and Mr. V. Govinden, of Madras. In regard to the Khasi Hills mission stations, a grant of £75, for another year, has been placed at the disposal of the Rev. Nilmani Chakrabarti, to enable him to pay the salaries of Mr. David Edwards and other accredited workers, with the view of discovering the real strength and permanency of the work, and the aptitude the people themselves show for self-government and self-help.

The work of circulating Unitarian literature in Denmark is under the care of Mr. Berg, Mr. Birkedal, and Miss Westenholz. During the year 1904 1,300 applications were received from all parts of the country. A widespread interest has been awakened in Denmark in respect to the principles and faith of the Unitarians.

Of the foreign students at Manchester College, Oxford, aided by grants by the Association, the Committee regret to report that ill-health compelled Mr. T. Yoshimoto to return home to Japan in November last. Dr. J. Gyorgy, the Hungarian student, will complete his studies in June, and he will be succeeded by another student from Transylvania in October. Mr. V. A. Subktankar, the Indian student, on completing his course at Oxford, will proceed to Germany for a year in order to study philosophy and comparative religion before returning to India. The Hibbert Trustees have made him a grant for this purpose. Mr. F. Sinclaire, the New Zealand student, will complete his first year at Manchester College in June.

The members of the Council will be interested to learn that Miss Emily Sharpe has very generously handed over to Trustees appointed by the Association upwards of £2,000 to form an endowment fund for the provision of a scholarship for a Hungarian student at the Channing House School for Girls.

Concerning the new Unitarian Church at Christiania, towards which a grant of £50 a year is made, the Rev. Hermann Haugerud reports:—

"Since I entered upon my duties as pastor of 'Unitarisk Samfund,' Kristiania, at the beginning of last year, religious services have been held every Sunday and Church holiday, except during a brief vacation in the summer. Our place of meeting is a fine and centrally located hall, called Studentersamfundet, which we hire at a rent of £3 a month. The congregations have averaged 150 persons a Sunday, and the small entrance fee of 10 ore, about one penny, for each has proved sufficient to cover the hall rent. A class of children assemble at the close of the morning service and receive instruction in the belief of the Unitarian Church.

"During the last six months, meetings have been held fortnightly on Monday evenings for lectures and discussions on ethical and theological themes, and these gatherings have been well attended. A woman's alliance of 25 members is doing a good work in behalf of the Church. The Church membership is not as yet very large, but is constantly increasing, and it may be regarded as a favourable sign of the growth of our movement that 47 persons have joined our society since January last year. The numbers are not representative of the wealth and university education of the country, but they are people of intelligence and character, who are sincerely devoted to the cause of Unitarianism. The Norwegians are a progressive people and will, as time goes by, in steadily increasing numbers, identify themselves with that religious organisation which represents the liberal faith."

McQuaker Trust.

After a long period of anxiety and waiting, the congregation at Aberdeen have sold the site and church building in George-street for £2,000. The site for the new church is in the most central part of the city, where many imposing churches and public buildings have already been erected. It is essential that the Unitarian movement in a city like Aberdeen should be worthily represented by its church building, and of the £1,000 still required to complete the work the McQuaker Trustees have promised the last £250. It is hoped that every Unitarian in Scotland will take a pride in giving something to the building fund, and that sympathisers in England, Ireland, and Wales will help to find whatever balance may be required. The congregation themselves are doing, and will doubtless continue to do, their utmost to raise all the money they can.

Grants, with certain conditions attached as to the salaries ministers are to receive, have been voted as follows:—Aberdeen, £95; Dundee, £85; Glasgow (S. St. Mungo-street), £90; Kilmarnock, £100; along with an additional pro rata grant conditional on the amount raised by the congregation, or given by the committee of the Scottish Association. The temporary engagement of the Rev. Felix Taylor, B.A., at Kirkcaldy came to an end in December last. Neither the congregation nor the committee of the Scottish Association have yet succeeded in discovering a suitable minister to recommend for appointment; the McQuaker Trustees are in the same difficulty. It is to be hoped that the McQuaker student, who will shortly complete his studies as a Hibbert scholar, will find, sooner or later, an opening as a Unitarian minister in Scotland.

The Rev. E. T. Russell, at the expense of the McQuaker Trust, delivered four lectures expository of Unitarian Christianity at Govan during November, 1904, when the attendance averaged sixty. A further series of four lectures at Govan and four at Shettleston have recently been delivered, with an average attendance respectively of sixty-six and thirty-one. A grant of £10 has also been made towards the expenses of special services at Kilmarnock by the Rev. Dr. Warschauer.

The tract by Dr. Mellone, and the three tracts by Mr. Webster, dealing with certain aspects of the ecclesiastical and theological crisis in Scotland, have been widely circulated, and the editions are now exhausted. In regard to his Postal Mission work, Mr. Webster reports that it began in February, 1904, in connection with the refusal of the Librarian at Tain to accept books by Unitarian writers. Fifty-two requests came from readers, residing chiefly in the North of Scotland, and 240 of the "rejected" books were circulated. Several readers sent interesting letters expressing thanks for the enlightenment they had received. Mr. Webster has the names and addresses of ninety-six inquirers, as a result of his first year's work as secretary of the Scottish Postal Mission. The reactionary theological forces are settling in the north, and it is necessary to keep up the warfare on behalf of truth and freedom.

A number of copies of the cheap edition of Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul," and of Mr. Carpenter's "First Three Gospels," have been circulated among Presbyterian ministers in Scotland. In response to a single advertisement in the Glasgow Herald on Monday, March 27, with the heading "Unitarian Christianity," offering certain books to ministers, students, and teachers making application to the McQuaker Trustees at Essex Hall, 80 letters were received by next day's post. As the advertisement has still to appear in other Scotch newspapers during the present week, there seems every prospect that the limit of expenditure authorised by the Trustees for this special branch of their work will soon be reached.

Deceased Members.

The Association has lost in the death the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, a former president, one of its ablest, most devoted, and distinguished members. The Committee have already, by a resolution which has been made public, expressed their feeling of deep sorrow when the news of his death reached them, and their high appreciation of the great and varied services rendered by him to the Association during his strenuous life. Members of the Council will wish to join in this expression of tender regard for Mr. Armstrong's memory, and of sincere gratitude for the good all have received from his life and work.

In the death of Mr. Charles Harding, of Birmingham, the Council has been deprived of the services of one of the brightest, most active and generous Unitarians in the Midlands. There are many who will recall his presence at meetings of the Association; and no one could have cared more earnestly than he for the welfare of our churches and the progress of a free and enlightened religious faith. Mr. J. Cogan Conway, of Ringwood, was seldom absent from the meetings at Essex Hall, and the Association had no more earnest and faithful adherent. In connection with the Southern Association he rendered invaluable service, and his unselfish labours on behalf of the Pension and Insurance Fund will be cherished gratefully by many ministers and their families.

Mr. R. W. Wright, of Croydon, who died in December last, was a member of the Council, and Local Treasurer of the Association, and at one time served on the Committee. He was deeply attached to the principles of faith and freedom to which our churches and societies are pledged.

Death has removed from the list of members of the Association many generous and valued supporters, among whom mention may be made of Mr. J. Arlosh, of Carlisle; Mrs. Best, and Mr. Thomas Gladstone, of Birmingham; Mr. H. W. Hill, of London; Miss M. Lambert, of Newcastle-on-Tyne; Mrs. Orlando Oldham, of Gee Cross; and Mrs. James Worthington of Sale. To the relatives and friends of the deceased the Committee would tender through the Council their respectful sympathy in the loss which they have sustained.

The Council will also desire to pay its tribute of respect to the memory of the Rev. John White Chadwick, for many years the distinguished Unitarian minister at Brooklyn, New York—a man of keen intellect, great candour and courage, and noble simplicity of life and thought, whose poems, sermons, and literary work possess a fascinating strength and grace, and whose biographies of Channing and Parker are treasured by the Unitarians of England no less than of America.

Nor will the Council wish to pass over in silence the loss sustained by the Theists of India in the death of Maharshi Debendra Nath Tagore, the saintly patriarchal sage of the Brahmo Samaj movement. His name was less known in England than that of Rajah Rammohan Roy, who died in 1833, or of Keshub Chunder Sen, who died in 1884, but in his own land he was for many years the greatest personality in the liberal religious life of India. The beautiful story of his long and saintly career is one that deserves to be told for the benefit of Western readers.

If our meekness and forgiveness of injuries lead our adversaries to be sorry for what they have done to us, and engage their good will, we shall have nothing more to fear from them, and were the habits of friendship and kind offices, begun on our side, to become universal, this world would be a kind of paradise. For nothing is wanting to make it so, for such beings as we are, but the good dispositions and good behaviour of those who inhabit it.—Joseph Priestley.

SHORT NOTICES.

Spring Blossoms and Summer Fruit. Sunday morning talks to the children, by John Byles, author of "The Legend of St. Mark's" and "The Boy and the Angel," Many of our readers will remember the great gift Mr. Byles had of interesting children, and, knowing his other delightful books, will be glad to have this new edition of a volume first published in 1888. (Alston Rivers, 13, Arundel-street, W.C., 1s. 6d. net.)

Evesham, written and illustrated by Edmund H. New, is an addition to the new "Temple Topographies," in which the artist, who has illustrated other volumes in the series (Mr. Payne's "Knutsford," for one), turns author as well, and writes con amore and with full knowledge of his native town. Lovers of Evesham will delight in this little book, and strangers will be charmed by the pictures, and find the history worthly recounted. (Dent, 1s. 6d. net.)

Religion: a Criticism and a Forecast, by G. Lowes Dickinson, is a welcome reprint of the four articles on Ecclesiasticism, Revelation, Religion, and Faith, which appeared in the Independent Review, October, 1903, and May, June, and November, 1904, and which we noticed at the time for their great interest and suggestiveness. (Brimley Johnson, 1s. net.)

Outlines of the Life of Christ, by W. Sanday, D.D., LL.D., Litt.D., is a welcome reprint in book form of the masterly article on "Jesus Christ," contributed by Professor Sanday in 1899 to the second volume of Dr. Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible." The article is left substantially as it was written six years ago, and is to be taken as representing the author's position at that time; but we are glad to see from the prefatory note that he is engaged on a larger work on the same subject, though it is not likely to appear for some years. (T. & T. Clark, 5s. net.)

Dante's Divina Commedia, translated into English prose, by the Rev. H. F. Tozer, M.A., author of "An English Commentary on Dante's Divina Commedia," &c., a volume of 447 pages, in very readable type, is uniform in size and price with the most welcome edition of the four Socratic dialogues of Plato, in Jowett's translation, with a preface by Dr. Caird, the Master of Balliol. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d. net.)

"Books New and Old."—"W. H. D.," our reviewer under this heading last week, writes as follows from Belfast: — I am not so rash as to challenge the wrath of ardent Borrovians by saying that Sir Thomas Browne has a "larger" claim upon our affections. I only indulged in the safe historical reflection that his claim is a "longer" one. In one of the quotations that I made from him, "ascent into heaven," should be "scared into heaven." Further on the omission of quotation marks seems to give me the credit of a sentence by Walter Pater, and in my remarks about Canon Sanday's book, "alternate the evidence" should read "attenuate the evidence," which has the advantage on the side of sense. These are the sorrows of a writer who lives too far away to see a proof. Perhaps they redound little to the credit of his orthography, or of his slender reputation for rationality. But it is not fair that Sir Thomas Browne should share with him the reproach of writing nonsense.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN.

Born April 2, 1805. Died Aug. 4, 1875.

I wonder how many of you know Hans Christian Andersen's stories. Nowadays, there are so many delightful children's books, that even such a once world-wide favourite as dear old Hans Christian Andersen is apt to be overlooked. If you do not know "The Steadfast Tin Soldier," "The Little Mermaid," and "The Snow Queen," you have a treat in store. It would be a nice way of keeping Andersen's "Centenary" for someone to put a copy of his stories into your school library, or your own little one, if there is not a copy there already.

Exactly a hundred years ago, on April 2, in the year of Nelson's death at Trafalgar, Hans Christian Andersen was born at Odensee, in the green island of Funen in Denmark. His home was a small room, almost filled with his father's shoemaker's bench, and the scanty furniture. But a hard-working mother kept the few household things bright and spotless, the walls were covered with pictures, and the cupboard was full of books, for his father, though untaught, was fond of poetry. A ladder led to the roof, where the storks built on the chimney-stacks, and Hans's mother grew vegetables in a great chest filled with soil. Every Sunday father and son walked in the woods, and in May the mother went too in her holiday gown, and gathered beech-boughs with which to decorate the room. At night his father read aloud Danish plays, and "The Arabian Nights," and made him all sorts of fascinating toys. For hours together Hans acted plays on a little home-made stage, dressing the dolls to suit the scenes, which were sometimes of his own making, and sometimes from Shakespeare, of whom he heard at the house of a lady, who was kind to the poor cobbler and his clever child.

His father's early death was a great loss. His mother was kind, but did not understand his love of poetry and acting. The neighbours thought him a ne'er-do-weel, who ought to learn a trade, and carry the basket of washing, by which his mother earned a living. It certainly was selfish to go singing and dreaming in the woods, and performing his little plays all day. He did not even learn his lessons steadily. Surely at home and in school there is a certain amount of work and drudgery, from which no one ought to escape! Then the visit of a theatre company set him longing to go on the stage, and his mother let him go to seek his fortune in Copenhapen. What excitement to ride in a coach and take ship to Zealand! Yet how lonely he felt! As soon as he landed, he stepped behind a shed on the shore, and on his knees besought God to help and guide him aright. On September 5, 1819, he entered the capital like Dick Whittington, with a bundle under his arm and a few coins in his pocket. Some friendly actors collected money for him. He learnt singing, dancing, and reciting, and wrote verses, living for four years half-starved and in the poorest lodgings. Though he prayed to God every night, it seemed as if it would never succeed. His peasant speech was a hindrance, whilst no one would print his badly written, badly spelled verses. And now really wise help came. Privy Councillor Collin, who proved a second father to him nearly all his life, obtained him a pension from Frederick VI. for a grammar school. At eighteen he had to learn in the lowest class with little boys. There was no shirking this time, and in spite of teasing school-fellows, and an unkind Headmaster, up the school he moved, making up for lost time with extra patience and industry, and in spare moments writing far better verses then he had ever made before. Then came a self-denying student life at the University, and just ten years after his arrival in Copenhagen he took his degree with distinction, and brought out his first collection of poems.

Little by little he won an honoured place among his countrymen as a writer of poems, plays, and novels. But it is for his stories for children that he is most famous. They first appeared in 1835, and soon no Danish Christmas-tree could exist without them, and when they were translated, Andersen became a fireside friend in many lands. Andersen travelled a great deal, and was welcomed by, and often recited his tales to, the cleverest and most distinguished people of Europe: His story of "The Ugly Duckling" is a parable of his own poet-life among ignorant neighbours, misunderstanding teachers, and jealous fellow-authors. The ugly bird is bitten, pushed and made fun of by the ducks and geese, but at last it meets the swans who know it for one of their own race, and it is recognised for the beautiful bird it is. It matters little whether one has been born in a duck-yard, so long as one has been hatched from a swan's egg, and has bravely and wisely grown ready for long swan-flights.

One of the "swans" was the noble Danish sculptor, Thorwaldsen. Many of Andersen's stories were written alongside Thorwaldsen in his studio. Often in the family gathering at twilight the old sculptor would come softly behind Andersen and clapping him on the shoulder, would ask, "Shall we little ones hear any tales to-night?" and would enjoy the same old stories over again.

Another beautiful friendship was that with Jenny Lind, "The Swedish Nightingale," whose lovely voice, and goodness, and loving-kindness cast a spell over Europe. "From her," said Andersen, "I learnt to feel what was holy in art, and that all talent comes from God to be used in His service."

On his seventieth birthday all good Danes, from the King downwards, joined to do him honour, and when he died they put a statue of him in Copenhagen.

Looking back over his life, he once wrote: "There is a loving God, who directs all things for the best. . . . It is a joy to live and believe in God and Man. To God and men my thanks, my love." And now on his hundredth birthday we give thanks to God, and to himself, and all who made it possible for him to give us so much innocent pleasure, and enrich our lives with his fun and fancies, his brave, manly thoughts, and pure, child-like spirit.

"ANDERSEN, FATHER OF ALL CHILDREN."

So ran the title by which HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN, the solitary bachelor, was not infrequently hailed in his life-time. It still holds good. True, the children have hosts of new "fathers," "uncles," "aunts," and other engaging relatives, and to some people it might seem that his old fairy tales are quite obsolete. These are the people who think DICKENS out of date. Anyone who doubts the continuance of ANDERSEN'S popularity can easily be reassured. Let him ask the children in the nearest elementary school, not whether they know HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN himself, but his tales. Let him begin to tell one, and see how soon he will be put right if he tells it wrong. There is much new literature for little ones that is good, but still—according to popular verdict—"the old is better."

The immortal Dane's centenary rises in the midst of our busy and strenuous life with a truly refreshing influence. It is as if one heard a skylark singing over the Mansion House, or found a daisy growing in Fleet-street. The effect is not due to the remembrance of his work alone, but of what he was himself. A German contemporary said of him :—"First of all one must learn to regard him as a child, notwithstanding his height, then to pardon him for being one ; and, finally, to love him because he is a child." The world has so many who are fully grown up—at least so far as being blasé is concerned, not to say cynical—that it could well afford to keep this man a youngster all his seventy years. A child in fancy, he was child-like all round. His optimism is as complete as that of any little one "that lightly draws its breath." You would think he never knew sorrow or discovered the seamy side of things. Listen :—"The story of my life, up to the present moment, lies unrolled before me—so rich and beautiful, I did not invent it. I feel I am the child of good fortune ; almost all meet me candid and full of love ; seldom has my confidence in mankind been deceived. From the prince down to the poorest peasant I have felt the noble heart of man. It is a delight to live, to believe in God and man." Happy creature! Yet this was the man whose boyhood was lonely and beset with the pains that pierce deep into a sensitive young soul. He was jeered at, scolded, cold and hungry. A lank, tow-headed youth, a stranger in an unpitying crowd, he ate his poor morsel of dry bread in the public garden at Copenhagen, where now his statue is placed. Of course he found the flavour of success sweet, but the bud had a very bitter taste. Even when his genius began to show itself in numberless poems and plays and stories, produced with an industry that must have impoverished a mind less rich in native resources, there did not fail detractors, and sarcastic "friends." Yet here is the Dane almost repeating the verdict of that antique Roman—the noblest of them all—who, according to the poet dear to ANDERSEN'S heart, declared at the last—

"My heart doth joy that yet in all my life,
I found no man but he was true to me."

To get anywhere near to this is a grace denied to many, but why ?

The reflective mind may take advantage of the day's celebration to ponder this familiar paradox that he who humbles himself as a little child shall be exalted. In ANDERSEN'S case, indeed, there seems to have been little need for self-humiliation. He delighted to dwell on the lowly plane, and he had no doubts. "The story of my life," he said, "will tell the world what it has told me—that there is a loving GOD, who orders all things for the best." Born in an age of struggle, both physical and philosophical, living on while dynasties tottered and creeds crumbled, he appears as little moved by the storm as if he were a cuckoo-flower in a meadow. In childhood he played little dramas with his puppets, in manhood the child-players of his mind and the scenes, weird or beautiful, amid which they moved, occupied him wholly. He delighted in travel. The quaint, the sublime, the simple ordinary, all delighted him. All lands pleased him—his own garden-land of Denmark most, no doubt, but that was because it was home. It was the "swan's-nest" for him, and its swans, ŒHLENSCHLÆGER, THORWALDSEN, ŒRSTED, were his pride and joy. Others would come, by and by, he sang. Aldrig er Ungdomstiden forbi, was his song in the last year of his life—"never is the youth-time o'er." People smiled at his naïveté ; they were welcome. He had the best of the matter still, enjoying himself in the nobler sense of the phrase. "I made a pretty little poem," says he, for all the world as simply as if it were some other poet's piece. Such unadulterated pleasure in his own performance would have been vanity in another. It was a child's sincerity in him. People liked to get him to tell his stories ; he evidently liked just as well to tell them. Not that he was wanting in commonsense either. There was a twinkle in his eye, an innocent rogueishness, they say, which bespoke clear sanity. Many a subtle touch in his tales reveals his power to reckon-up shrewdly the types of character that came before him. Shall we say there was a considerable Shakesperian element in him ? Let him who questions the propriety of such a verdict turn to those well-stored volumes again, and note the frequent analysis of motive, the sure touch of definition, the healthful balance of judgment while imagination takes its fullest fling.

One critic's opinion we should specially like to have, were it possible. "The writing and reading of fairy tales, in prose or verse, if I do not mistake," says FRANCIS WILLIAM NEWMAN (whose own centenary is close at hand) "exerts whatever influence it has in the direction of deadening the religious sense." But let us hasten to add that NEWMAN explains at once in a footnote that he is speaking "solely of such inventions as cannot be forced into contact with the conscience." If some ingenious writer would give us an "Imaginary Conversation" between ANDERSEN and the sweet-natured teacher whom we here quote, there would be little difficulty, we believe, in bringing off the story-teller free from censure. For, while there are plenty of his tales that chiefly exhibit the play of fancy, the drift of all is toward right thought, good feeling, kind and just behaviour. Anxious parents need fear no harm while their infants are listening to this singer with the magic pipe that draws the little feet after him. Follow him they will, and we had better pay in full our debt of grateful acknowledgment to his genius and his goodness, lest, like BROWNING'S "Piper," he should lead them from us into a world behind the hill where we in our foolish wisdom may not enter.

THE reasoning that would help morals and yet eliminate God, goes the wrong way to work, and undermines its own foundations. He was there at first. We do not outgrow Him in evolution ; we rather grow in acquaintanceship with His ways. Thought does not burst the bubble of divinity, as Comte pretends, and leave us alone with humanity. Its progress is more like the astronomical penetration into the boundless extension of space. It is the detection of divine life where earlier there seemed to be only emptiness and death. The savage foretells Jesus Christ.—William Binns.

THE MARTINEAU CENTENARY.

Dr. Martineau's Relation to Idealist Theories of Ethics and Religion.

I.

The centenary of Dr. Martineau's birth naturally suggests the question how far his philosophical work is likely to exert an influence on the religious thought of the present century. Mr. R. H. Hutton, after he had, under Maurice's guidance, become an "orthodox" Christian, still maintained that "Dr. Martineau's teaching as a whole is by far the ablest vindication of the philosophy implicitly assumed in Christianity." But while Dr Martineau was preaching and thinking out his philosophical system, a very different system, that of Absolute Idealism, had been imported from Germany, and was being expounded with great skill and with much moral enthusiasm by T. H. Green at Oxford. As in Germany, so in England, this theory of the universe was for a time popular in the pulpits, and it is still very influential in some of our chief universities. By those who accept this idealist view of the nature of the universe, Dr. Martineau's philosophy, with its realistic belief in metaphysical causes and its ascription to the human will, as the highest of metaphysical causes, of a power to freely choose between ethical alternatives, is naturally regarded as representing a stage in human thought which present intelligence has passed beyond. It is, however, very striking and interesting to notice how highly even the adherents of absolute idealism estimate the results of Martineau's teaching. Dr. Forsyth, for instance, whose philosophy of religion appears to be a blending of Hegelianism with the curious dogma of a "threefold society" in the Godhead, while he asserts that present thought, with its conception of society as a corporate unity, is far in advance of Martineau's standpoint, yet thus candidly and eloquent testifies to the grand and lasting results of Martineau's philosophical work:—"It was he, together with "Green of Oxford, who gave the death-"blow to the somewhat hard, narrow, "timid, and material quality of English "philosophy. He took the low roof off "it, and exposed it to the sky. He gave "it the fresh-air treatment. He en-"larged its world. He stood for the "value of the soul's intentions as against "the mere arithmetic of utilitarian results. "He insisted on the moral value of "motives as distinct from effects: The "motive was more for the man than the "net upshot of his action. It was the "quality of the soul that guaranteed "the future of the soul. And it was God, "the soul of all, that guaranteed the "quality of the soul. He stood for "God, a living God, freedom, and immor-"tality, in the face of a science which, "if not material, would have made the "mass of its believers little else. . . . He "has greatly affected the colour of Eng-"lish thinking on the greatest things. "He broke the self-sufficiency of the mere "physicist, and the tyranny of the agnos-"tic, while, on the other side, he exposed "the hollowness of the amateur and "literary idealists, like Matthew Arnold, "and pricked, with the sharpest and "deftest sword among us, the fine phrases "in which they offered ideal substitutes "for God. And the fine severity of his "ethic has had a cleansing and corrective "effect on debased forms of Evangelical "belief. He has done much to force on a "society too prone to lose religion in feel-"ing and in thought its vital centre in "the will. It was our free-will, he said, "where alone we were real causes, that "gave us the true sense of God as the "cause and ground of the world. Our "mind might report an outward cause, "but it was the conscience alone that "realised a perfect cause and a supreme "authority." This quotation shows that although Dr. Forsyth calls himself a follower of the "new universalism," and says, after Hegelian fashion, that "it is "the whole self that acts in each choice, "and the whole self is a great tangle of "mixed motives which cannot be ex-"posed and valued apart," he nevertheless holds views on the basal questions of causation and volition which pertain rather to Martineau's philosophy than to that of absolute idealism. He would assuredly find it no easy task to explain how "a tangle of mixed motives" can be intelligibly said to exercise "free-will," or indeed any kind of true causality at all. This irresistible tendency in Dr. Forsyth and in other preachers and theologians of the same school to slip into modes of expression which are not intelligible save in connection with Martineau's view of the self, of its moral freedom, and its relation to the indwelling God, seems to us to render it exceedingly probable that, while the future philosophy of religion will drop out of Dr. Martineau's philosophy those unessential features in it which were derived not from his own deep and rich moral and spiritual experience, but from the intellectual surroundings amid which he grew up, and will appropriate some inspiring ideas from the schools of German idealism, it will nevertheless retain those vital and essential principles of Martineau's thought which by Dr. Forsyth's admission, have exercised such a regenerative and elevating effect upon the religious and ethical ideas of the past century, and which, in our view, are destined to be equally effective for good in the century now before us.

Dr. Forsyth very justly couples together the names of Martineau and T. H. Green, and Martineau would no doubt be gratified in being thus associated with the eminent Oxford teacher and social reformer. He felt warm affection for Green, and visited him at Balliol. A little reminiscence of Martineau's account of this visit may be worth recording. One Sunday the friends went to hear some eminent divine at the University church. The sermon—if memory rightly serves it was by Professor Mozley—was, curiously enough, a very elaborate exposition of the shortcomings of Unitarianism. On the way back to Balliol Professor Green said, "I do not know, Dr. Martineau, what impression the sermon has made on you, but for myself I am persuaded that I could have refuted every argument in it." Where Martineau and Green were entirely at one was in the conviction that the eternal Thinker of whose thought the universe is the expression progressively reveals Himself and His character in the individual soul, or, as Green expresses it, "reproduces Himself" in the individual when in the course of biological evolution the human stage is reached. Of the self-revelation of the Infinite in the finite, of the Divine in the human, Martineau was fully assured, and in one of his sermons he says: "No merely finite being could believe the Infinite." The question then at issue between these two brother thinkers was, what is the relation of the individual soul to that Higher Self whose presence we find within us, and which Jesus called the Father within us? Does the former possess a certain degree of delegated independence of the latter, or are they related simply as two modes or aspects of one ultimate and absolute unity? The two philosophers give different answers to this question, but the difference between them is not so great as on the surface it seems to be. Martineau in his "Types of Ethical Theory" says: "The moral authority of the conscience is imposed upon the soul by a being higher than itself." Green, in his "Prolegomena to Ethics," says: "It is the very essence of moral duty to be imposed by a man upon himself." These statements seem fundamentally at variance, but as Martineau points out in his reply to a criticism by Henry Sidgwick, the difference between them is greatly lessened when we read Green's further explanation, for Green goes on to say that a man is a law unto himself not by autonomy of the individual, but by the self-communication of the Infinite Spirit to the finite soul; and the law itself, "the idea of an absolute should be, is authoritative with the conscience because it is the deliverance of the eternal perfection to a mind that has to grow, and is imposed therefore by the Infinite Spirit upon the finite." But although Martineau and Green agree that the real source of the categorical imperative of the conscience is the Infinite or Absolute Spirit which is "reproduced" or incarnated in the individual mind, the question still remain whether the finite spirit is in any degree separated from, or independent of, the Infinite Spirit which is reproduced in connection with it. Green, as a Hegelian, cannot admit that man has delegated to him any possible independent activity or causality. Martineau, Tennyson, and Browning, on the other hand, evidently believe that the Eternal has conferred on His rational creatures some measure of originative activity and the last of these emphatically says:—

> "God, whose pleasure brought
> Man into being, stands away,
> As it were, a hand-breadth off, to give
> Room for the newly made to live,
> And look at Him from a place apart
> And use his gifts of brain and heart."

Martineau admits the difficulty or impossibility of drawing any precise line between the human and the Divine personalities which blend to a large extent undistinguishably in man's higher life, but, like Browning, he insists that there is certainly one region of our inner life where the origination of the activity is evidently with the dependent individual, and not with the immanent God. "I pretend not," he says, "to draw the "untraceable line that separates His "being from ours. The decisions of the "Will doubtless are our own, and constitute "the proper sphere of our personal agency. "But in a region higher than the Will "—the realm of spontaneous thought "and emotion—there is scope enough "for His 'abode with us.' Whatever is "most deep within us is the reflection of "Himself. All our better love and "higher aspirations are the answering "movements of our nature in harmonious "obedience to His Spirit."

This partial independence of the will of the individual, which the Hegelian philosopher of religion will not allow to be a fact, is, in the view of Martineau, of supreme importance. Apart from it he holds that we can give no intelligible explanation or justification of such marked religious experiences as the feeling of estrangement from God and of reconciliation with Him. Unless the finite and dependent spirit has this small sphere of free activity, the consciousness of personal sin must be regarded as illusory; the sentiment of repentance ceases to have any rational ground; and the consciousness of communion with the indwelling Father would appear to correspond with no spiritual reality. Martineau's intercourse with Green produced in him a firm persuasion that Green, though he never explicitly admitted the justice of the distinction which the poet draws when he says—

"Our wills are ours, we know not how,
Our wills are ours to make them Thine,"

was not fully satisfied that the Hegelian account of the matter could be entirely harmonised with the facts of man's ethical and religious consciousness. He found some confirmation of this belief in the circumstance that Green in his writings sometimes speaks of the spirit of man as a "free cause"; for this expression appears to be unintelligible unless the individual is supposed to possess some distinct metaphysical reality and activity. In conversation, too, Green, so Dr. Martineau was accustomed to say, used language which indicated that at heart he was far more Kantian than he was Hegelian; and Martineau had a strong impression that Green in his later years sympathised more and more with Lotze's Weltanschauung (which in essential matters is closely akin to Martineau's), and he believed that had Green lived a little longer he would have openly declared his general agreement with that eminent philosopher. That Martineau was not wholly mistaken here is rendered probable by the fact that towards the close of Green's life he showed much interest in the writings of Lotze; for he both suggested the execution of the existing translations of Lotze's treatises on logic and metaphysics, and took part himself in the latter work. In writing to a friend at the time of Green's death, Martineau expressed his conviction that Green at the last had firm faith in personal immortality, but he adds the significant remark that "this faith was not due to his acceptance of the Hegelian metaphysics, but rather to his emergence out of it."

Green's experience, accordingly, if Martineau rightly interpreted it, concurs, we think, with the striking fact that the Hegelian philosophy of religion has no longer any representation in the pulpits of Germany, in creating a well-grounded expectation that, however long Hegelian idealism may maintain its position in the lecture-rooms of the universities, the religious thought of the country will never cease to turn in preference to philosophical systems which, like those of Lotze and Martineau, furnish a rational basis for the belief in personal responsibility and in the existence of direct inter-personal relations between the individual soul and that immanent and self-revealing God who is at once the "Soul of all Souls" and the "Cause of all Causes."

NORWICH MEMORIES.—I.

Early Nonconformist History.

Norwich has been called the "City of Gardens"; it may well be called the "City of Sacred Places." Not only do consecrated buildings meet us at every turn, but away, out of sight, where now stand thickly populated tenements, busy factories, and thriving shops, once stood other churches, chapels, and religious houses long since demolished, and of which in most cases not one stone is left upon another to indicate where our forefathers worshipped and were buried.

The Presbyterian Meeting House, now and better known as the Octagon Chapel, occupies such a site, and chapel and site alike have a history worth the telling.

The year 1226 saw the coming of the Friars of St. Dominic, commonly called the Black Friars, to Norwich. At that time there stood almost upon the site now occupied by the Octagon Chapel a church dedicated to St. John the Baptist. Here the Friars established themselves, and when in 1250 the church was given to them, they had already built their monastery, and by degrees a site bounded on the north by Golden Dog-lane, on the south by Colegate-street, on the east by Magdalen-street, and west by Calvert-street, or Snailgate, as it was called, had come into their possession, except a house at the south-east corner, which belonged to the monastery of St. Faith, and some grounds to the north belonging to the church of St. Mary Unbrent. Later they also obtained possession of land next the river, and had a staithe there reached by what was known as Friars'-lane. Meanwhile the brethren of another order, the Sack Friars, or Friars de Penitentia, had been granted a messuage in St. Andrew's parish just across the river, and had settled there. But for certain reasons these brethren did not meet with royal favour, and in 1307 Edward II. dispossessed them, and granted to the Dominicans "all that place to inhabit and dwell in for ever" which had formerly been used by the Prior and Friars de Penitentia. So the Black Friars passed over the water, and, piece by piece, acquired land and houses, until in 1345 or thereabouts they possessed all the land from the south bank of the river Wensum, now covered by the fine Technical Institute buildings, the building and grounds of King Edward VI. Middle School (formerly the cloisters and refectory, &c., of the Dominicans), and the magnificent buildings known as St. Andrew's Hall and Blackfriars Hall, which originally formed one building as the church of the convent, together with the open ground on the south side of the church, which was used as a preaching yard.

In the year 1413 a fire broke out, which so considerably damaged the convent that the Friars were obliged to return to their old quarters on the north side of the river. Later they rebuilt their church, assisted by the munificence of the de Erpinghams, Felbrigges, and Pastons, whose coats of arms were, as a memorial, displayed on the exterior of various parts of the church. Then came the dissolution of the monasteries in 1538. Norwich was exceedingly fortunate at this time in having a most active and public-spirited man in Augustine Steward, who had served the office of Mayor, and was now an alderman. He, by his strenuous exertions, and with the support of some other influential citizens, succeeded in approaching King Henry VIII. with a humble petition that the house of the Black Friars, instead of being demolished, should be granted to the citizens for use as a hall for civic purposes. This the King graciously agreed to upon payment of the sum of £81 lawful money of the realm. He gave them by charter dated 1540 the church and all the messuages, houses, edifices, barns, stables, orchards, gardens, pools, ponds, &c., on each side of the water lately belonging to the Friars Preachers, but upon a further condition that they paid him the sum of £152 for the old lead.

The buildings were, and have been, put to many uses far away from their original purposes. The nave of the church was used as a cloth hall and a hall for civic feasts. The choir was used for many years by the Dutch congregation for purposes of worship. The other buildings, including the rooms over the cloisters, were used as granaries and for other purposes.

We must now allow something over a century to pass, and we come to the time when, as representatives of a religious community, our actual association with the old monastery of the Preaching Friars commences. On September 24, 1645, the Mayor and aldermen of Norwich received a letter from the Speaker of the House of Commons informing them that Parliament had resolved "to settle a Presbyterial Government in the kingdom," and bidding them "consider how the county of the city of Norwich may be most conveniently divided into classical Presbyteries."

What steps, if any, Mr. Mayor and his aldermen took with regard to this "Bull of Lenthall" we cannot say. The attempt failed throughout the country. Ten years later a Board of Triers was appointed to inquire into the fitness of ministers appointed to livings, the rights of patronage remaining untouched. Thus Presbyterian and Independent ministers were presented to livings at the will of their patrons, and no doubt felt it better for many reasons to draw together and find points of agreement rather than of difference.

Cromwell died September 3, 1658, and Charles II. entered London May 29, 1660. He promised the Presbyterian party "a liberty to tender consciences" with assurances that no one should be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion not found to disturb the peace of the kingdom. To a few bishoprics were offered, but only one accepted, Dr. Edward Reynolds, Dean of Christ Church, who was consecrated to the bishopric of Norwich in 1661, an office he held until his death, July 28, 1676. He lies buried in the chapel connected with the palace. Of him it has been said :—

"The King bestowed on him the bishoprick of Norwich, which see, he willingly taking without a nolo, was (after he had taken the covenant, and often preached against Episcopacy, and the ceremonies of the Church of England) consecrated thereunto in St. Peter's Church, within the City of Westminster, on the 6th January, anno 1661, by virtue of which bishoprick he became an Abbott (a strange preferment, methinks, for a Presbyterian). I mean Abbott of St. Bennet-in-the-Holme, which he kept (with great regret to his quondam brethren, whom he left to shift for themselves) to his dying day. Wood's Athenæ Oxoniensis.)

The Savoy Conference was held in March, 1662, and the Rev. John Collings, D.D., of Emmanuel College, Cambs., was one of the commissioners for attempting a comprehension of the Presbyterians in the Established Church, and of him we shall hear later. Then followed the Act of Uniformity, compelling all ministers to declare that the revised Prayer Book was believed by them to be the orthodox standard of faith, and that they, believing its contents to be in harmony with the Scriptures, agreed to use it, the penalty for non-compliance before St. Bartholomew's Day, August 24, 1662, being deprivation of their livings. The result is well known in the story of the two thousand clergy who for liberty of conscience became Nonconformists. But further troubles were in store, for in May, 1664, the "Conventicle Act" came into force, whereby all religious meetings in which were assembled more than five persons beside the members of the family, were declared to be seditious; punishment, for the first conviction, five pounds fine or three months' imprisonment; for the second, ten pounds or six months; for the third, £100 or transportation for seven years.

A year was permitted to elapse, and again the Nonconformist ministers and their flocks were further harassed by the passing, in October, 1665, of the Five Mile Act, which prohibited ejected ministers from being seen within five miles of any city, corporate town, or borough, sending members to Parliament. For seven weary years Nonconformists suffered these cruel oppressions. Of what our Presbyterian forefathers endured here in Norwich no record remains. It is probable that the presence of Dr. Reynolds as Bishop of the diocese tended to mitigate the severity of these penal laws. In the year 1671, September 28, King Charles and his Queen visited Norwich, and on the following day visited the cathedral, and attended a special service there. Afterwards they were sumptuously entertained at the Bishop's palace by Dr. Reynolds. The next year came a proclamation of Indulgence, by which licences were granted to preachers and places used for preaching. They were of two kinds, particular (for one place), and general (for any licensed place), and were in the following form :—

Indulgence.

Charles R.

Charles, by the grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith. To all Mayors, Bayliffs, Constables, and other our officers and ministers, civil and military, whom it may concern, greeting. In pursuance of our Declaration of March the 15th, 1672, we do hereby permit and licence "Benjamin Snowden, of the Presbyterian persuasion," to be a teacher of the congregation allowed by us in "a Roome or Roomes in the house of John Barnham, in the parish of St. Andrew, in Norwich," for the use of such as do not conform to the Church of England, who are of the persuasion commonly called "Presbyterial," with further license and permission to him, the said "Benjamin Snowden," to teach in any place licensed and allowed by us according to our said Declaration.

Given at our Court at Whitehall, the 29th day of June, in the 24th year of our reign, 1672. (Signed) ARLINGTON.

Snowden—a Teacher.

This Benjamin Snowden was an M.A. of Emanuel College, Cambs. He was born in Norwich, ordained by Bishop Hall, and appointed the living of St. Clements, in Norwich, and ejected.

In a register of licences kept by the Privy Council in 1672 occur the following :—

License to John Collinges, to be a Presbyterial Teacher in Jonathan Wilson's house, in the Parish of St. Stephen's, Norwich, 30 Apl.

The house of Jonathan Wilson, in the Parish of St. Stephen's, Norwich, licensed to be a Pr. meeting-place.—30 Apl., 1672.

Dr. John Collings came to Norwich about the year 1646, having been born at Boxtead in Essex about 1613. At the time of his coming to Norwich he was appointed "preacher of God's Word in St. Saviour's parish." In September, 1646, he tells us that he was "invited by Sir John Hobart to take my chamber in his house whilst I discharged my ministerial office, and take some oversight of his family in the things of God." Sir John died the following year, but Dr. Collings continued his office of chaplain to Lady Hobart. From 1653 he was minister at St. Stephen's Church, from which vicarage he was ejected. He remained with Lady Hobart until her death, and afterwards became a tutor to young men at the house of Mr. Jonathan Wilson.

Among the licences granted to houses we find the names of John and George Mumford, John Mozely, John Demsley, and William Newman, who lived in various Norwich parishes. Also the name of Nathaniel Mitchell, who, being ejected from his living at North Walsham, in Norfolk, was licensed to preach in his own house in St. Peter Hungate, Norwich, as a Presbyterian. He was related to Dr. John Collings by marriage.

G. A. KING.

RELIGION is after all beyond the range of mere tuition. It is not a didactic thing that words can give, and silence can withhold. It is a spirit; a life; an aspiration; a contagious glory from soul to soul; a spontaneous union with God. Our inward unfaithfulness is sure to extinguish it; our outward policy cannot produce it. To love and to do the Holy Will is the ultimate way, not only to know the truth, but to lead others to know it too.—James Martineau.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE GENEVA MEETINGS.

SIR,—I have been interested in the letters published in your last issue telling those who intend to be present at the International Meetings in August next what may be seen and done in an extra week or fortnight in Switzerland. There is, however, one point in the Rev. W. Harrison's letter which may lead to a possible misunderstanding, namely, the necessity of breaking the journey at Paris. This may be necessary in exceptional cases, but it is far better and less fatiguing on the whole to make the whole journey off at once. Leaving London on Friday morning, viâ Newhaven, Geneva is reached the next morning, or leaving on Friday night, viâ Dover, we arrive on Saturday night. It must also be borne in mind that with the cheap tickets to be issued there is the condition that the party on the outward journey must travel together.

ION PRITCHARD.

DEAR SIR,—It would be wiser to take a Swiss holiday in the "first half of September" than in the "latter half of August." The heat of summer has then somewhat abated; the inns and pensions are less crowded; and prices have been lowered.

The trip you suggest from Geneva to Geneva, via Lucerne, the Furca Pass, and the Rhone Valley, is practicable; and one can scarcely go amiss in Switzerland. But there are others more to be commended. For those who would be carried to their skies on flowery beds of railway cars, either Chamonix or Zermatt suggest themselves. A week at Chamonix gives so much of variety and of grandeur that anyone may fix upon that; but steamer up the Lake of Geneva, and train from Villeneuve, or Bouveret, to Zermatt, though longer and costlier somewhat, combines more attractions. Nowhere is one in the midst of more grandeur than at Zermatt. The Matterhorn and the amphitheatre of snow-clad monarchs, as seen from the Gorner Grat, more than rival the majesty of Mont Blanc, and its attendant aiguilles.

To those who would have a pedestrian tour, I would venture to suggest two of the grandest. From Geneva to Champery in the Val d'Illiez, one day; on second day, from Champery over the Col de Coux and Col de la Golèse to Sixt; then for third day, from Sixt over Col d'Anterne and Col du Brevent to Chamonix. The other is to Chamonix direct by train. First day walk from Chamonix over the Col de Vosa to Contamines; second day, from Contamines to Mottets over Col du Bonhomme; third day, from Mottets to Courmayeur; fourth day, from Courmayeur to Chatillon in the Aosta Valley, and up the Val Tournanche to Breuil; fifth day, over the Théodule glacier to Zermatt. Nothing in Switzerland, unless it be the Stelvio, is better worth doing for the pedestrian than this Tour de Mont Blanc. It may be taken deliberately, and with due regard to good weather. There ought to be a company of young liberals from England who would profit by this tramp over the hills of God.

Rome, March 22.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Belper.—Our minister, the Rev. J. Kertain Smith, having finally decided to retire from active ministerial work, will terminate his duties here on the last Sunday in April.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford Street Chapel.—Monday evening last concluded a series of twenty-two "Popular Concerts," which have been held weekly during the winter. The building was crowded with an enthusiastic audience. Mr. Councillor Welch presided. The hon. secretary, Mr. George Ling, had secured a goodly array of musical helpers. In the interval the Rev. Wm. Lyddon Tucker, M.A. (minister of the chapel), remarked that the season had been a most successful one, and thanked all who had assisted in the arrangements.

Blackpool: South Shore.—On Saturday evening, March 18, a recital in aid of the Church funds was given by Mr. Fred Duxbury, of Manchester. The whole of the recital was excellently given, and was much enjoyed. Miss Marion Bailey was the vocalist, and her selections were admirably rendered. There was a good attendance. On Sunday Mr. Duxbury preached morning and evening.

Carlisle (appointment).—Mr. Albert Thornhill, B.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, has accepted the unanimous call of the congregation worshipping at the Viaduct Church, Carlisle, to become their minister, and hopes to enter upon his duties there during the coming summer.

Chichester.—On Thursday, March 23, the Sunday scholars, and parents and friends, spent a very pleasant evening, with an attractive musical, elocutionary, and varied entertainment, and which it was arranged should be repeated before the old people at the Workhouse on the following Thursday. On Sunday, March 26, the anniversary services were held, the Rev. A. J. Marchant as preacher for the day. The results were satisfactory throughout.

Cullompton. — A pipe-organ, erected by Messrs. Vinnicombe, of Exeter, was opened with fitting ceremonial on Thursday week. Mr. E. W. Vinnicombe presided at the organ during the dedication service, and afterwards gave an effective recital. Addresses were delivered at the service by the Revs. J. M. Connell and Jeffery Worthington; and solos, from Gounod's "Ruth" and Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," were sung by Miss Stewart (Exeter), and Mr. G. H. Vinnicombe (Exmouth) During the proceedings Mr. Worthington stated that a bazaar intended to provide funds for structural and other improvements and for a new organ was held in 1903, but the cost of the former left a balance too small to allow of the purchase of a fresh instrument. An appeal was made this year for further aid, and thanks to the generous help of one London friend the organ had been bought and erected, leaving a small balance for further improvements in other directions. Mr. Worthington added that a strong desire prevailed to include in the improvements the conversion of the adjoining premises into a dwelling-house, thus adding to the permanent income of the trust. This, however, would be a costly proceeding; and it would entail considerable effort, probably for some time to come. The opening services were continued on Sunday last, Miss Hilda Galpin presiding at the organ. The collections at all the services were devoted to the special fund, and a few additional subscriptions have been received. Further help will be most welcome.

Hinckley.—On March 20, 21, 22, 23 and 25, concerts were held at the Great Meeting School-room, the adult choir performing the operetta "Ali Ba Ba," and the juvenile choir "Flags of Nations." Great praise is due to all who took part. The concerts were well patronised, and a good sum was realised.

London: College Chapel, Stepney Green.—On Thursday, March 23, Mr. and Mrs. Ginever entertained to tea about fifty of the adults connected with the chapel. After tea followed music and games. Later on Mr. Evans made a short speech, in which he spoke of the work of the past two and half years, and expressed, on behalf of all, the regret they felt at the termination of Mr. Ginever's ministry. He was followed by Mr. Boult, Mr. Seely, and Miss Read, who spoke in similar terms of appreciation and regret. Mr. Ginever replied, thanking the many friends for their kind words, and for the hearty co-operation which he had received from many of the members, and expressing his regret that circumstances compelled him to leave them. All present were so very cordial and full of good-will that the evening, though having its sad features, was felt by all to be one of the most pleasant they had spent at the chapel. On Sunday evening, March 26, Mr. and Mrs. Ginever bade adieu to College Chapel amid many signs of regret.

London: Kilburn.—The Rev. J. E. Stronge preached his farewell sermons at Quex-road, Kilburn, on Sunday, March 26, when the small Congregational Hall was well filled, morning and evening. On Monday evening there was a social gathering to bid farewell to Mr. and Mrs. Stronge on their departure from London to Kidderminster. There was a large attendance of members of the congregation and other friends. Mr. C. Fleetwood Pritchard presided over a brief meeting, when Mr. E. H. S. Barnes, on behalf of the congregation, presented Mr. and Mrs Stronge with a handsome album, containing an appreciative address and the signatures of the members, along with a cheque for £35. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie spoke a few words in recognition of the services rendered to the Unitarian body during Mr. Stronge's eleven years' residence in London. In an earnest speech Mr. Stronge acknowledged the unfailing courtesy and kindness he had received from the congregation, and urged that one and all should relax no effort in the task of building up a vigorous centre of Unitarian worship and work in Kilburn and West Hampstead.

London: Plumstead.—Attention is directed to the bazaar in aid of funds for the new chapel, particulars of which will be found in our advertising columns. The support of all friends is earnestly desired.

London: Stratford.—A series of special services will be held at the Town Hall, Stratford, commencing on Sunday next. A vigorous effort is being made to reach the masses in East London, who have hitherto been to a large extent untouched by Unitarian teaching. No special propagandist work has been attempted in this district of late, and at the suggestion of the members of the Stratford Church, the London District Unitarian Society and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have made grants for the carrying out of the scheme. The Churches at Forest Gate, Stepney, Walthamstow, Limehouse, and Mansford-street are co-operating. The whole district is being visited by canvassers. The various hoardings and railway stations are exhibiting large posters. Boardmen are parading the streets with special announcements for the coming Sunday, and the help of the local paper has been enlisted. The service on Sunday next will be conducted by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, subject: "What does following Jesus mean to us to-day?" On the two following Sundays the Revs. J. C. Street and John Page Hopps will give the addresses. There will be an organ recital at 6.30 p.m., and religious service at seven o'clock.

London Sunday School Society.—Attention is directed to the Choral Competition arranged to be held on Saturday, April 8, at Essex Hall. Former meetings of the kind have been very interesting, and there is every reason to expect similar interest this year.

London: Wandsworth.—On Sunday evening the Rev. W. G. Tarrant concluded his course of lectures (based largely on the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's syllabus) on "Agnosticism and Theism." Throughout there have been very large and attentive congregations, and the literature supplied has been taken freely. On the 23rd ult. the annual Church meeting was held, Mr. A. W. Biggs presiding. The reports, presented by Mr. H. B. Lawford (secretary), and Mr. H. James (treasurer) were satisfactory, and a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the minister and Mrs. Tarrant. There was a good attendance.

Manchester District Association.—At the first meeting of the newly constituted governing body held at Memorial Hall on Tuesday, March 21, the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., was re-elected president, and Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson lay secretary. The Rev. N. Anderton, B.A., was elected clerical secretary in place of Rev. J. A. Pearson, who had resigned after four years' service. Communications for the clerical secretary should be addressed in future to 35, Alresford-road, Irlams-o'-th'-Height, Manchester.

Mottram.—The Rev. A. Cobden Smith attended as special speaker from the Temperance Section Manchester District Sunday School Association at our Mottram Band of Hope on Wednesday evening, March 15, and delivered an interesting address to the largest Band of Hope meeting we have had this winter, there being over sixty persons present. There was a good programme of songs and recitations, mainly bearing on temperance. A vote of thanks to the speaker and the Association was carried with hearty acclamation, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith presiding. On Saturday, March 18, the work of our Public Discussion Society for this season concluded with a most successful social gathering at which Mr. J. W. Wild, as secretary, read his annual report and the statement of accounts. The report included brief mention of lectures and discussions of an interesting and instructive character, the lecturers being the Revs. A. C. Fox, B.A.; H. J. Rossington, M.A.; J. Williams (Congregationalist); Messrs. J. McCutcheon; J. H. Reed (Anti-Vivisectionist); and the Rev. H. Bodell Smith (President). Music, dramatic recitals, and recreation made a very enjoyable evening for the numerous company in attendance.

Newport, Isle of Wight.—The Rev. Clement E. Pike has now removed to London, where his address is 100, King Henry's-road, Hampstead, N.W.

North and East Lancashire.—The Rev. H. D. Roberts wishes to disavow any intention of "sarcasm" in the remarks with which he was credited in our recent report of this Unitarian Mission Society's meeting. He simply wished to guard against (1) the danger of dogmatism, by way of reaction against dogmatism, and (2) the danger of any "comprehension" that possessed breadth only, without depth enough to generate enthusiasm.

North-East Lancs. Sunday School Union.—The second annual musical festival was held in the Todmorden Church on Saturday last, March 25. The body of the church was well filled with a congregation of 600 or 700, whilst the united choirs numbered about 100. The programme, which was rather a lengthy one, consisted of five special hymns, solos by Miss E. Wadsworth (Todmorden), Miss E. A. Harrison (Padiham), Mr. F. Sutcliffe (Todmorden), and Mr. J. A. Ormerod (Newchurch), and several anthems. An appropriate address upon "Music as an aid to worship" was delivered by the Rev. E. C. Jones, M.A., of Bradford. The Rev. Arthur W. Fox, M.A., of Todmorden, led the devotions. Tea was afterwards served in the school.

Pepperhill.—The chapel in this upland district was re-opened by special services, after complete renovation at a cost of about £500, on March 12 and 19. During the alterations services were held in the upper room of a cottage. Great enthusiasm prevailed on the return to the renovated building. On March 12 the preacher was Rev. John Ellis, district minister of the Y. U. U., and special music was rendered by the choir of Northgate End Chapel, Halifax. On March 19, Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A., conducted the service in the afternoon, and Rev. W. R. Shanks took the evening service. The Bradford (Chapel-lane Chapel) choir assisted on that occasion. The chapel was crowded at each service. On Saturday last, March 25, a tea and meeting was held. Rev. J. Ellis presided, and addresses were given by Rev. C. Hargrave, Mr. E. Basil Lupton, Mr. F. Clayton, Councillor Swain, Dr. Maclachlan, Rev. P. E. Richards, Mr. E. B. Stott, and Mr. S. Jagger. Numerous friends were present from Halifax and Bradford, and the meeting was in every way a great success.

Rochdale.—A series of Sunday evening services on "The Fellowship of Churches" has attracted large congregations to Blackwater-street Church, and occasioned favourable comment in the local press. The services were conducted by Rochdale ministers, who spoke upon the contribution of their respective Churches to the religious life of England. An invitation to representatives of the Established Church was declined. Other Churches were represented as follows:—Congregational, Rev. J. H. Hollowell; Baptist, Rev. D. O. Davies; Primitive Methodist, Rev. W. W. Witham; United Methodist, Rev. C. Hunt; Wesleyan, Rev. H. Field; Unitarian, Rev. T. P. Spedding. Intimations were received that ministers of other denominations would have been glad to take part, and the hope was expressed that a further series might be arranged. On Easter Sunday a memorial to

Dr. Martineau will be unveiled in the Church. The tablet, which is the gift of Mr. Richard Heape, bears a medallion portrait, upon which Messrs. Harry Hems & Co., of Exeter, have been engaged for many months. Principal Gordon will preach. The Sunday-school has just been repaired and decorated throughout, and the fine Chapel room, formerly the gallery in the old Clover-street Chapel, which has been added to the school, is to be used as a club by the new Church and School Guild. The room is open every week night for reading and games. The object of the Guild is to form a bond between Church and school, and it will find new workers; its principle being that no position must be held by any person who already holds office. Six scholars have this year gained gold medals for seven years' unbroken attendance.

Sunderland.—A series of special services are being held here on Sunday evenings, the District Association having made a grant in aid. The series began on March 5, when the Rev. W. Harris, M.A., of Bolton, preached on "What did Jesus do to be saved?" On the following Sunday Rev. H. Cross, of Stockton, preached on "The Gospel of God's Fatherhood." On March 19 there was a special musical service, when the choir was reinforced by several persons from other congregations, and Rev. F. Wood preached on "The Truth of the Bible." Last Sunday Miss Mellone, of Warrenpoint, was the preacher, and dealt with "The Consolation of the Unitarian Faith." The services so far have been well attended, and much interest has been shown. It is hoped that the result will be to strengthen the position of our cause in this large and populous town.

MR. W. H. SHRUBSOLE, F.G.S., has been engaged by the Regent-street Polytechnic to conduct a party of tourists to Hungary this year. This visit will be the first of the kind arranged by this institution.

C. & B.'s "Art Metal" 1/- Box of Butter-Scotch may now be obtained. Address of nearest agent on receipt of post-card Manufactory, London, W.C.

"He wrote from intimate experience of congregations, the most respectable, and of the humblest in Lancashire and Cheshire, and there are some good stories from those days so long ago. . . . III. THE HEAVEN WE HOPE FOR.
IV. THE HELL WE FEAR.
V. THE BIBLE WE ACCEPT.
VI. THE DIVINE INSPIRATION.
VII. THE SALVATION WE BELIEVE IN.
VIII. THE CHURCH WE BELONG TO.

Dr. Savage is acknowledged to be one of the foremost preachers of liberal religion in America, and his books have a wide circulation among many different classes of people. In this last volume each chapter deals with cardinal points of religious belief from the author's Unitarian point of view. The pillars upon which this temple is reared are sturdy columns of rational religious conceptions which concern the development of the higher life. The Rev. Robert Collyer writes a brief introduction, telling of the circumstances under which he became in a way sponsor for the material now published as "Pillars of the Temple."

VI. THE ETHICAL STRUGGLE.
VII. BENEFICENCE.
VIII. GOD AND THE WORLD.
IX. RELIGION.

"Agnosticism," writes Mr. Lloyd, "has received the stamp of approval from men of very high intellectual standing and of unquestioned moral worth, and Agnostic books are often distinguished by a very lofty spirit as well as literary excellence." The author devotes a series of brief chapters to the consideration of the arguments and theories of Agnostics and sets against them the views held by a Theist who accepts reason, conscience, and experience as his guides. He shows there is ample evidence to prove that religion makes men wiser, happier, better; and he holds that while the Agnostic may not share the convictions of the Theist, he has no right "to assert that the Theist's faith and hope do not rest upon logically satisfying evidence."

"Mr. Lloyd's small volume is a reply to Agnosticism. He contends for all that is to be said on the other side, that our faith is a reasonable thing, that only where Agnosticism ends does Religion begin, and that a sense of the Divine Presence is the fountain of all that is best in man."—The Bookman.

III. A NEW APPRECIATION OF JESUS.
IV. THE MASTER OF INNER LIFE.
V. THE AUTHORITY OF JESUS.

Religious literature has many treatises, large and small, on the life and teachings of Jesus. Something new has been remarkably well said, with a fresh form of treatment and from an original point of view, in this volume. It is a reverent, sympathetic clear-sighted exposition, in the light of the frankly accepted higher criticism, of the essential and permanent elements in the life and teaching of Jesus of Nazareth. There is nothing negative, uncertain, or evasive in the treatment of the subject here given. Written from the vantage ground of the best modern thought, this book fills an important place in liberal religious literature.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE arrangements for the celebration of Dr. Martineau's centenary at Norwich and Oxford are as follows. At Norwich, his birthplace, the celebration will begin on Good Friday, that being the exact date of his birth a hundred years ago. Following Communion service there will be a service at the Octagon Chapel, conducted by the Revs. A. Hall and J. Estlin Carpenter, and Dr. James Drummond will preach. A luncheon will follow, with speeches, and in the evening Mr. W. Blake Odgers will preside over a meeting in the chapel, when Prof. Upton, the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter, and W. Copeland Bowie and others will speak. On Saturday (as also on Friday afternoon) visits will be paid to places of interest in and about the city. On Easter Sunday morning service will be conducted by the Rev. V. D. Davis, the preacher being the Rev. P. M. Higginson, and in the evening the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed will preach.

AT Oxford, owing to the interposition of the vacation, the celebration will be deferred till Monday and Tuesday, May 1 and 2. On the evening of Monday, service will be conducted in Manchester College Chapel, by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, the Rev. Dr. Drummond being the preacher. On Tuesday a luncheon will take place at the Randolph Hotel, when we may presume addresses will be given, as on the occasion of the opening of the College at Oxford, when Dr. Martineau's own address at the luncheon was a truly remarkable utterance. In the evening a reception will be given at the College, to be followed by an address by Professor Henry Jones on "Martineau's Philosophy in relation to the Idealism of the present day," a subject which is of great importance, as Professor Upton's articles in our columns to-day and last week abundantly show.

THAT there is much dissatisfaction among our orthodox brethren with regard to Dr. Torrey's dogmas, if not with his methods, is illustrated in a letter by the Rev. Tom Sykes (Congregationalist) to the Hull Daily Mail. Mr. Sykes quotes the Rev. D. Dickie, of Glasgow, as saying :—"Except in downright offensiveness it is hard to see where their [the revivalists'] power comes in. So far as Dr. Torrey is concerned, his influence in Glasgow was simply nil. In no way did he touch the city." The majority of his converts "too often surrender to his tactics, and not to a better life." Apparently, Dr. Torrey has declined to visit Hull, as there is no hall large enough for him there. Mr. Sykes, remarking on the policy of abandoning the inhabitants of Hull to their fate for such a reason, says :—"Well, be of good cheer, my fellow-citizens. All Unitarians are down below, according to Dr. Torrey's teaching. Dr. Martineau, Emerson, Channing, &c., won't be bad company. We prefer it to Torreyism above."

THE position of the Government is a bad one, and reflects ill upon public life as a whole. Mr. Balfour's tactics of despair, by virtue of which he holds on to office while allowing judgment to go against his fiscal policy by default, have not been unmixed with a finesse, not to say downright deception, unworthy of the head of a great nation. Supporters of the Unionist programme have surely a difficult task to keep loyal under the circumstances; while as to the general public, the Brighton election expresses its opinion in a way that bodes ill for those who have become mere hangers-on to office.

ONCE more the profits on cocoa are being used in a generous scheme for the practical solution of the housing problem. Mr. Joseph Rowntree, of York, has vested in trustees 120 acres of land at Earswick in Yorkshire, together with 43 cottages already erected and a sum of invested capital, for a purpose similar to that of the Bournville Trust established by Mr. Cadbury, near Birmingham. Income from houses already built and interest from capital will be used each year to build fresh cottages, twenty to thirty each year it is expected At least one-tenth of the property, exclusive of roads, must be laid out as parks and open spaces, and each house is to occupy not more than one-fourth of the site apportioned to it. Water, gas, and a bath are provided for each, and three bedrooms with fireplaces. Cottage houses are to let at 4s. 6d. a week, exclusive of rates. The trustees are all members of the Rowntree family. There is room for many more trusts of this kind. Why do not the large landowners who have the readiest means of solving the housing problem at command, do their share in forming such beneficent and truly profitable trusts ?

THE following interesting note from Unity (Chicago) will be read with interest, especially in view of the forthcoming Genevan gathering. A contributor to our contemporary says :—"The last annual report of the Historical Museum of the Reformation at Geneva states that the Servetus monument committee has deposited its carefully classified archives in that museum. The correspondence incident to the erection of the monument, and the collection of newspaper clippings in regard to it, are curious and interesting. The committee also presented to the museum a copy of the German translation of Servetus' famous work, the Restitutio Christianismi. There is also quite a collection of pamphlets on Servetus, his ideas and his punishment, some called out by the erection of the monument and others of earlier date. This Museum of the Reformation is doubtless one of the places that will be visited with great interest by delegates to the biennial gathering of the International Council of Unitarians and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers in Geneva next September."

DR. C. A. BRIGGS, the celebrated American scholar, contributes an article on "Loisy and his Critics in the Roman Catholic Church" to the April issue of The Expositor. As would be expected, he sympathises with the Frenchman's historical methods, though he does not always share his conclusions. It will be remembered that Loisy, after being allowed free scope in applying critical investigation to the Old Testament, was silenced when he applied it to the new and particularly to the Fourth Gospel. The reader would do well to study the article in its entirety. We quote here a few significant passages.

"MY studies of the Gospels," says Dr. Briggs, "convince me that Jesus did in fact teach his disciples that he was divine, and that the apostolic doctrine of the divinity of Christ is based on the teachings of the Master himself. At the same time, I must admit that this teaching is limited to a few statements towards the close of his life; that it is implicit rather than explicit, and that it is not so evident that truth-seeking scholars may not question or even deny it." Again: "My studies of the Gospels convince me of the reality of the resurrection of the body of Jesus, yet I cannot say that the evidence is historically so strong that it is temerity to question it, or that it is of essential importance that the evidence should be historically unimpeachable, or that it is necessary to ground the doctrine on the Gospels alone." "However much we may regret the situation, we must make the best of it. If the doctrine of the Resurrection of Jesus must rest upon the accuracy of the observation of the act of physical resurrection, it has slight historical support." Dr. Briggs laments the silencing of Loisy, the more since it is he who (as Dr. Briggs thinks) has most powerfully met the dangerous views advanced by Harnack in his lectures on the "Essence of Christianity."

The second quarterly number of the Liberal Churchman (March, 1905) contains an article by Professor Paul Lobstein of Strassburg, on "Poetry and Truth in our Religion." Many of the loftiest religious conceptions, he says, first became known under the veil of poetry. "As poetry, indeed, they first became truth." And then he points out how both in the Old and New Testament there are elements commonly understood as literal fact, and therefore now largely discredited as untrue, which must be interpreted as poetry, and so become once more the vehicle for the teaching of spiritual truth. The narratives of the Virgin birth of Christ and of the bodily resurrection are noted as of this character.

The truth behind the narrative of the Virgin Birth Professor Lobstein holds to be "the conviction that the Divine life embodied in Christ, and through Him imparted to mankind, has its source in the fountain of the hill of God, and springs not from the lowlands of our sin-stained earth; that the Son of God is indeed a new creation, the head of a humanity whose roots reach into Heaven; that he is the second Adam, born of God, living in God." Criticism of the legendary narrative cannot disturb this conviction of the spiritual significance of Christ; and so it is with the legends of the Resurrection; the supreme conviction of the living Christ and of the abiding things of the Spirit, which death cannot touch, rests on other and far surer grounds.

Having thus illustrated the true method of interpreting the ancient records, Professor Lobstein goes on to insist on the necessity for fearless criticism and frank acceptance of the resultant truth. "That men have respect for facts is the simplest moral condition of every kind of scientific investigation; it follows as a matter of course that we theologians also must be determined to listen to facts; we must make up our minds not to rebel against them, but willingly to submit to them. In this our honour as theologians, our piety as Christians, is at stake. Woe to theology and woe to our Church if she gains the reputation of shutting her eyes to plain facts." And, further, he urges that theologians and pastors have no right to keep the knowledge they gain to themselves, but are bound to impart it also to the people. "It is simply intolerable that what every well-informed man outside the Church accepts as simple matter of fact should not be recognised as truth within the Church."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

The most considerable article in this month's Contemporary, from our point of view, is Mr. W. H. Mallock's on "The Reconstruction of Belief." This able, but somewhat over-refining writer, justly contends that apologists for theism must abandon old lines of defence, and meet the attack of "naturalism," which is euphemistic for atheism, upon other ground. His article suggests the following method. It must be admitted by the "naturalist" critic that belief has been a potent, and in many ways a useful, not to say indispensable, factor in the progress of human civilisation; and in particular the belief in causation, be it validly based or not, must be reckoned among the permanent prepossessions of the average mind. Thus the way is prepared for argumsnt as to the nature of the cause which is commonly inferred as at the back of phenonema. If the apologist is to be guided by Mr. Mallock he will inquire as to the effects produced by the primary religious beliefs, viz.,—in a moral Deity, moral freedom of man, and immortality—upon civilised life at large, rather than specially upon the religious life; and some space is given in explication of the general effects of these respective forms of belief. As indicated above, the manner of the argument does not wholly satisfy one; but the article is distinctly stimulating. A short article by the Rev. A. W. Hutton on "Liberal Churchmen and 'The Reproach of Christ'" seeks to defend "broad" men like himself from charges levelled against them by critics within the Church. Mr. Hutton supports the policy of a "wise and gentle minimism" instead of one which would "overburden the simple faith of a Christian with a number of extra beliefs, some of which are calculated in this our day to make our religion contemptible." Dr. Emil Reich gives a second article on "The Bankruptcy of Higher Criticism," which at least shows its author to be for his part well-provided with a wealth of scornful rhetoric. Two other "wholesale" articles are those by Dr. Dillon (on Russia), and Professor Draghicesco (on Hungary) respectively. More immediately useful is the article by Mr. Coulter (Clerk of the Court) on "The New York Children's Court," in which the principle of keeping criminals of a tender age apart from the ugly surroundings of the ordinary courts is graphically illustrated. Here is a reform that ought to be introduced into our country without delay. Mr. Rollo Russell's account of "Scientific Local Weather Forecasts" is decidedly interesting and instructive.

In The Nineteenth Century Mr. Morley concludes his masterly essay on "Democracy and Reaction" based on Mr. Hobhouse's new book. On the whole, while Mr. Morley inevitably shows much disappointment and more hesitation as to the course, past and future, of democracy he concludes with a cheerfulness which does him credit. Perhaps the signs of a return to sobriety lately manifested in the electorate have reassured him. But, confessedly, the subject is profoundly momentous and as difficult as important. Professor Vambéry discusses the probabilities of the success of Japan on the Mohammedan world. He sees room for apprehension, yet cannot believe the disciples of Islam will accept con amore the leadership of the Japanese Buddhists. An account of "Charity a Hundred Years Ago," as illustrated in the records of the "Society for Bettering the Condition and Increasing the Comforts of the Poor" is given by the Countess of Jersey; and Sir John Macdonnell gives a discriminating, but encouraging view of the prospects of "International Arbitration" in the light of the experiences of the past century. The other articles do not call for special comment.

In the Independent Review the Rev. J. H. Skrine repudiates the notion that the "catholic" faith is identical with that of the "first six centuries," and he has no difficult task in criticising a view that so flagrantly dispossesses the succeeding centuries of their rights. He would identify the "Catholic" faith with that which produces the Christian type of life—a conclusion eminently satisfactory till we begin to apply it practically. Then, one must go a great way forward, or retreat, with the Anglican authorities, behind the shelter of more antiquity.

CUCKOO SONG.

Come cuckoo, come cuckoo, April's here,
Daffodils dance by the rippling mere;
Primroses yellow and violets' blue
Smile through the rain for the love of you

Come, for the blossom is fair to see;
Whiter than snow is the cherry-tree;
Green are the crests of the hazel vale,
Nodding to welcome the nightingale.

Come, cuckoo, come, I have waited long,
Waited and wearied for April song;
Winter has aged me with silent pain,
Come, cuckoo, make me a child again.

Wilt thou not, wanderer, come once more
Bringing the charm of the days of yore?
Yea, thou art coming o'er land and sea,
But there's another—oh, where is he?

Come cuckoo, come with the rainbow-rain;
Singer, invisible, sing again;
Winter is over, the flowers appear—
Cuckoo — hark! Cuckoo—he's here, he's here!

LITERATURE.

IBSEN'S LETTERS.*

Two volumes of the Letters of Henrik Ibsen, published last year at Copenhagen, cover a period of fifty years and constitute a most interesting document humain. The first part in particular throws valuable light on Ibsen's character and mental development. They show us the poet, now as the judge of his own mistakes, now as the grateful, warm-hearted friend, as the circumspect man of business, humorous, hot-tempered, scornful, as the case may be. Sometimes his anger is caused by his own private affairs, sometimes by bitter grief and disappointment on account of his people and country; for to Ibsen the aim and object of his poetry, to "rouse his people from its apathy, and to open its eyes to the great questions and issues of life," is not an empty phrase, but true and painfully earnest, and in all that concerns this task of his life we cannot but feel that charity is at the root of the severe words.

The Letters also help to show the unbroken coherence of the different periods of Ibsen's poetic career. His form of expression varies, the basis is the same everywhere: an uninterrupted searching for the truth, which does not shun severe self-analysis, and which is combined with the deep feeling that great gifts entail equally great responsibility. "Capacity is not a right, but a duty," we read in one letter; and in another, "the principal thing is to realise oneself," or—as Ibsen writes half in jest in reply to what may be called a cry of distress from G. Brandes—"What I now first and foremost wish you is a thorough egotism, which for a time may urge you to consider your own personality as the only thing of value and importance to you. : : : You cannot serve your own community better than by coining the metal which you possess in yourself." After all, we see, the final object is the duty towards others.

In the various outbursts of momentary feeling we naturally meet with self-contradictions. But where the fundamental ideas are concerned, we always find the poet on a straight line of development.

In dealing with persons, we find that his relations to them vary according to his conception of their being true or untrue to their real selves. The same applies to his views of existing social forms—they are objectionable or acceptable in proportion as they impede or serve their purpose. Jestingly he likes to call himself a state-satirist. Such lines as the following (in a letter to Björnson): "You may believe that in my quiet hours I sound, analyse, and probe my inward parts thoroughly enough, even in places where it smarts the worst," show us where he has found his knowledge of the complex life of the human soul.

In one letter he says: "Brand is myself in my best moments, and it is equally true that self-anatomy has helped me to produce many features both of Peer Gynt and of Stensgaard (in 'The League of Youth')." And elsewhere we read: "In 'Emperor and Galilean' there is much self-anatomy." Nor is the poet's own mind unfamiliar with the doubts of Duke Skule and the exuberant faith of King Haakon.

In 1865 he writes from Italy: "Now at last I have freed myself from æstheticism as something isolated, which in itself claims independent value, as it formerly held me in its power. Æsthetics in that sense now appear to me to be as great a curse to poetry as theology is to religion." But this struggle had indeed begun much earlier, as we see, among others, from "The Comedy of Love," and from that highly ironical poem "On the Viddes" (1859), in which the representatives of "isolated" æstheticism finally are made to feel "in their bosoms several tokens of fossilisation"; further, from the way in which he afterwards speaks of these works.

The Letters confirm all through that in many instances Ibsen had his models near at hand. Among those in the distance he mentions his sister as the model of Hedvig in "The Wild Duck"; and, he says, "For Aase (Peer Gynt's mother) my own mother, with the necessary exaggerations, served me as type; even so for Inga, King Haakon's mother (in 'The Pretenders'). In 'Peer Gynt' I have made use of the memories from my own home and childhood as a kind of model for my description of the life in the house of the rich Jon Gynt." "But," he says elsewhere, "I never write anything for the sole reason that I had found what is called a good subject"; and again: "What I have written has its root less in outward than in mental experiences." In a letter to his sister we read: "I look inward into myself, there is my battle-field, where I now conquer, now suffer defeat; but about all these things one cannot write in a letter. Don't attempt conversion. I will be true. What is to come, certainly will come. : : : Do not think I am lacking in the warmth of heart which is required above all where true and strong spiritual life is to prosper" (1869).

In a letter to an authoress he says, in 1870: "What really matters is not that we will this or that, but that we will what we must, because we are ourselves and nothing else," viz., because we have understood "what the Master meant us for," as we read in "Peer Gynt"; "all the rest only leads to falsehood."

In 1865, when we know his mind was taken up with the subjects of "Emperor and Galilean," "Brand" and "Peer Gynt," he wrote from Italy: "My only reading is the Bible; it is powerful and strong."

We will speak a little more in detail of "Emperor and Galilean" (which occupied his mind for nine years before it was published in 1873), as the poet himself considers this drama as his principal work. While working at it he writes to his publisher: "Here I express my positive conception of life, for which my critics have been asking so long"; and after having finished it he says: "This work is more felicitous in its solution than any of my earlier ones." To Edmund Gosse he writes: "It is a part of my own spiritual life which I have laid down in this work. What is described here I myself have experienced under different forms, and the historical subject I have chosen is more closely connected with the movements of our time than one might suppose at the outset." And to G. Brandes: "Don't be afraid of moralising tendencies; what I look at is the characters, the cross purposes, the history; it is not my business to draw out the moral—provided that by the 'moral' you do not mean the philosophy of the tale, for, naturally, the philosophy must shine forth in the final judgment on the contending and the victorious parties."

It is well known that Brandes considers himself as the model of Julian, and the Letters indirectly confirm this supposition. In 1870 when, we know, Ibsen was very much engrossed by his grand drama, he writes to Brandes: "I am frequently occupied with you, and have formed an image of you both for the present and for the future; for though I know little of you personally, you are very closely connected with the subject that fills my mind, and which I am trying to work out in poetic shape." In a previous letter to Jonas Collin, of 1867, we have read: "I must confess that the manner and expression of Brandes carries uncommon power and strength of conviction. : : : This, of course, is not meant to imply anything about my personal relation to his standpoint."

That this standpoint caused many serious debates when they met, is shown in the letters to Brandes himself. On one occasion Ibsen writes soothingly: "Believe me, I do not claim the kind of agreement which, as a rule, decides whether friendly relations are to be kept up." And later: "You are expected with pleasure, in spite of different opinions on many questions." Thus, notwithstanding all personal attachment, we frequently feel what separates them.

Just as Ibsen considers his own calling as a charge with which according to his "unshakable conviction and belief, God has entrusted him," he seems to think that Brandes has his mission as well, though quite a negative one: "The great One, no doubt, had his intentions with you"—viz., the same as with Julian of old—the sorely needed awakening and purification, which always succeeds a violent attack on Christianity. And a month later: "I am constantly struggling with 'Julian'; I feel the strongest desire to express myself to you about this piece, but I feel I cannot do it without exposing myself to being misunderstood." From the drama itself we see that the poet himself considers Julian as a tragic character, "a victim on the altar of necessity."

Ibsen does not overstep the limit of what his character and conscience allow him to do. To a request from his friend for contributions to his periodical he replies in the affirmative, but he adds: "This would be no direct support for you and your cause; but, dear Brandes, I cannot join you on any other terms." Indeed there came only two contributions from the poet's hand—the poem "Far Away" and the famous "Rhymed Epistle to Brandes" in 1875, which contains words of serious warning from the poet to his friend and to the other men of the new time—possibly, after all, the "voyage" is not so glorious as has been anticipated: "Have you not felt that something new is coming? not understood the turning of the tide,'' and that here and there a suspicion arises that we are sailing with ''a corpse in the cargo:'' When, in spite of all, atheism pure and simple pursued its course more and more violently, later years, as we know, brought the following works: ''The Master Builder,'' who places himself beside God; ''John Gabriel Borkmann,'' who claims the kingdom, the power and glory; and finally, ''When we Dead awaken,'' in which Rubek places himself on the throne of God, and demands worship. All these are ''Julians'' of our own times—all, like him, suffer defeat. The counterfeits have their ''philosophy'' as well as the original. But just these dramas are hard to understand for many, and if we want to see what they mean, we must make a clear distinction between the standpoints of the poet and of his friend.

*The late Miss Thaarup, of Copenhagen, had only just completed this article on Ibsen's Letters, and sent it to a friend for translation into English a week before her lamented death. Miss Thaarup was the author of a work on "Henrik Ibsen seen from a new standpoint," an English version of which is in preparation. —Ed. Inquirer.

SHORT NOTICES.

Where Does the Sky Begin, by Washington Gladden, is a volume of nineteen sermons by this broad-minded American minister. (James Clarke & Co., 4s. net.)

Towards Democracy, by Edward Carpenter. A complete edition, including the fourth part, ''Who shall command the Heart?'' printed on very thin paper, 507 pages, in limp binding, makes a very readable and handy little volume which disciples will be thankful to have and to use in making these poems more widely known. (Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d. net.)

Working Men's Social Clubs and Educational Institutes, by Henry Solly, founder and first secretary of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union (1867). A second edition, condensed, and supplemented by information carrying it forward to the present time, by B. J. Hall, secretary of the Union. A capital likeness of Mr. Solly is included as frontispiece to the volume, and besides a reprint of The Inquirer's memorial notice there are some charming ''Recollections of a Grandson,'' contributed by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, which add greatly to the value of the book as a personal memorial. To the record, so well completed by Mr. Hall, two of Mr. Solly's sermons are added—on ''Sacrifice'' and ''Almost a Christian.'' (Simpkin, Marshall, 3s. 6d.)

Travels Round Our Village, by Eleanor G. Hayden, author of ''From a Thatched Cottage,'' ''Turnpike Travellers,'' &c., illustrated by L. Leslie Brooke, is one of those pleasant books which take one into the heart of the country—in this instance into Wessex—among quiet scenes and simple folk, with plenty of good stories of their sayings and doings. Many of Mr. Leslie Brooke's illustrations are admirable—e.g., ''Where the Daffodils grow'' (page 80) and ''The Bridge'' (page 46). Several of the sketches have appeared before in the Spectator, Cornhill, or Country Life. The book ends with the quaint sayings of a shepherd, whom a physician met as he rode over a wild stretch of down; and, hearing that he lived in a desolate cottage, far away from anyone else, asked how they got medical help in time of illness. ''Well, sir,'' he replied, in all good faith, ''we dwun't ha' no doctor: we just dies a nat'ral death!'' (Constable, 3s. 6d. net.)

ARTHUR HARVIE.

Your sad announcement of the death of Arthur Harvie, and your touching comments thereon, make me feel that I must add a few words myself in appreciation of the beloved worker who has so suddenly passed from our midst. Some few there may be who knew him longer than I did and had a more intimate acquaintance with his early life; but few if any can have known him more closely and intimately than I during the few bright years of his faithful and strenuous ministry, and I feel that I must pay homage to him now that I shall see his earthly presence no more.

When he could not find entrance into our Manchester College on account of his health, with undaunted courage he resolutely set himself to careful and earnest study that he might be qualified to deliver to others the message which he felt that God had given him to deliver. His reading was wide and varied, but especially on matters affecting the moral and spiritual interests of his fellow creatures. In all such matters he was profoundly interested and enthusiastic. When, after the first 'prentice work at Devonport which was spoken of last week, an opening came in Manchester for him to speak that which he believed and knew, he promptly availed himself of it, and in modest and burning zeal he began his work there. Those early days were enriched by a devotion which never flagged. Already he began to make his mark, and the members of his congregation carry in their hearts a loving record of his fidelity and devotion. At this time we were looking out for a man who would undertake an arduous post in the further North. No one was deemed so likely as Arthur Harvie. I pressed his name upon my friends, and he was cordially invited to go to Northumberland. I little knew how arduous was the task to which he was invited. Difficulties and hindrances that I had not anticipated were in the way; but with a brave heart and unflagging zeal he faced and overcame them all, and, as a result of his self-sacrifice, earnest work, and deep consecration, he built up the Free Church in Gateshead, which will remain as a monument to his memory. He won troops of friends outside our borders as well as inside. His love of all that was humane, kindly, and helpful drew many noble natures to him, and he became a centre of numberless activities for the good of mankind. Among the best, most refined, and religious of the people of the North he won friends and admirers, while the poor, toiling people of the pits and workshops looked up to him with reverence as a trusted and honoured leader. He was always in the front, eager for service, the mouthpiece of struggling minorities, the advocate of the lowly and the oppressed, and the true servant of God by giving his life to the service of men. He will ever be held in honour among the most conspicuous workers for good in the north of England. Feeling that another worker might now, with greater success carry on the work at Gateshead, he went to the great field of work in Northampton. The two years of untiring labour there have been conspicuous in their usefulness, and will be a permanent asset in the history of that progressive town. He will be greatly missed. Warm in his friendship, consecrated in his work, reverent in his spirit, he was a high type of what a true man should be. After his brief life and work, his hallowed toil, this young brave soul has gone home, leaving a stimulus for our young men and an example for his brethren which will remain as one of the imperishable possessions of our churches. Many hearts all over England will beat with profound sympathy for his bereaved widow and children. I myself have lost for awhile a valued and honoured friend, and I lay this tribute of love upon his grave.

THE LATE REV. A. HARVIE.

Kettering-road Church, Northampton, was filled on Saturday morning, when the funeral service of the late minister, the Rev. Arthur Harvie, whose sudden death we recorded last week, was held. The service was conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who, in the course of a brief address, said: ''I knew him from a lad; I watched his strenuous youth; I rejoiced in his sure progress and access of power. With you I hoped that his earthly work would long continue, and that many a life would still be blessed through him in the coming years. A higher Wisdom rules to which we bow. 'The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord.' . . . Though his day was brief, it was full; and at sunset, though it came soon, he returned from broad fields of labour, bearing his sheaves with him. He has not lived in vain, nor spoken the great words of faith and hope and duty for nought. A brave soldier of God, he has fought the good fight, and won the eternal peace.''

Among those present besides the mourners and the congregation, were the Rev. C. Peach (representing the Vegetarian Society); the Rev T. Gardner and Mr. W. R. Wells (Anti-Vivisection Society); Mr. T. W. Britten, and Mr. F. W. Pollard (Band of Hope Union); Mr. E. H. Coysh, and Mr. J. D. Donald (Newcastle-on-Tyne); and the following Northampton ministers:—Revs. A. Morgan (Baptist), G. E. Startup (Wesleyan), T. P. Gilmore, C. S. Larkman, and F. Burnett (Congregationalists). The body was taken for cremation to Leicester, where the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas conducted a brief service. The ashes were interred at Kingsthorpe Cemetery, Northampton, on Sunday morning, in the presence of a very large concourse. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who officiated, also conducted the subsequent services at Kettering-road Church, morning and evening, which were numerously attended. In the evening at the close of service a resolution expressing the deepest sympathy and warm appreciation of their late pastor's work and character was passed by silent vote of the congregation, on the motion of Mr. John Sale, secretary of the church.

MR. TIMOTHY SMITH OSLER.

We record with sincere regret the death of Mr. Osler, of the Limes, Rosslyn Hill, Hampstead. which occurred on Saturday last. Though he had partly recovered from a stroke at the close of last year, it was only for a short time. A second attack followed, and after many days of partial unconsciousness, he passed peacefully away on the 1st inst., at the ripe old age of 81 years.

Timothy Smith Osler, son of Mr. Thomas Osler by his second wife, Maria, daughter of Mr. Timothy Smith, of Birmingham, was born at Birmingham, December 6, 1823. He was step-brother of the late Mr. A. Follett Osler, F.R.S., and Mr. Clarkson Osler. He was educated at Bristol College, and afterwards at University College, London. At Bristol College he was a pupil of Francis W. Newman, who was classical tutor there from 1834 to 1840. This laid the foundation of the sound classical scholarship which distinguished his London University career. Matriculating in 1840, and taking an exhibition in Classics, he took his degree of B.A. in 1842, with the first place in classical honours, and subsequently he took his LL.B., in 1848, with a scholarship. He was called to the Bar and practised, having a conveyancing and Chancery practice, until 1898. He never lost his interest in the University of which he had been an alumnus. Throughout the early part of the history of the University he took an active share in its deliberations and its government, first as a member of the Graduates' Committee, which preceded the establishment of Convocation in the University, then as a member of Convocation, and afterwards, from 1859 until the time of the recent reconstitution of the University, as a member of the Senate. He took a deep interest in the education of women, and was a vigorous advocate of their admission to the University.

In 1865 Mr. Osler was elected a trustee of Dr. Williams's Trust, and for forty years has taken an active and diligent part in the management of the Trust, of which for the last five years he was senior trustee. He took a specially active part in the deliberations of the trustees at the time of the establishment of Dr. Williams's School for Girls at Dolgelley in 1875, and again in the preparation of a supplementary scheme in 1903 for extending the limit of age and in other ways improving the educational status of the school. He was also a governor of the Highgate Grammar School. He was for fourteen years treasurer of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead; and for many years president of the Portland British Schools, and, after their transference to the School Board, president of the Portland Sunday-school and Institute, which succeeded to the Sunday and evening work of the Portland British Schools.

In addition to the support he gave throughout his life to these various agencies for the promotion of education and religion, especially among the young, his own personal literary and artistic interests never flagged. Among his most intimate friends were such men as Richard Holt Hutton, William Caldwell Roscoe, Walter Bagehot, John Langton Sandford, and Thomas Hornblower Gill.

In his active interest in the various institutions with which he was connected, his careful attention to small matters of detail, and his prompt discharge of any duty he undertook, Mr. Osler manifested to the last the character and temperament of a man in the prime of life and belonging altogether to the present time. It was impossible to think of him as old. It was by his political views and a certain charm of old-fashioned courtesy of manner, that younger men were reminded that he belonged of right to an older generation. None of the political labels of the present day commended itself to him. He was a Whig, and, if one wants a more definite classification, a Palmerstonian Whig.

Mr. Osler married, first, Henrietta, daughter of Robert Roscoe and granddaughter of the celebrated William Roscoe of Liverpool, and secondly, Hannah Eliza, daughter of the Rev. John James Tayler.

His children and grandchildren may be assured that his name will be held in affectionate remembrance by many friends, and that there will be widespread sympathy with them in their loss.

The funeral took place on Thursday, the services at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, and at the grave in Kensal Green Cemetery being conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow.

There was a large concourse of mourners. The University of London was represented by the Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Pye-Smith, the Highgate School by Mr. L. Bradly Dyne and Mr. E. W. Reeves, the Clerk to the Governors, and Dr. Williams's Trust by the Rev. F. H. Jones, secretary, and several Trustees.

AN ECHO.

"The Vineyard Workers, who have been taken from amongst us."

Could you but know
How your brave spirits dwell within the homes that here were yours,
'Twould gladden you to realise how oft in work we pause
And think—'twas here you lived, 'twas here you loved, and gave us cause
To miss you so!

Could you but know
How oft the silence that upon us falls is full of you,
And memories so sad, so sweet, that none would break it through,
Or change the feeling that you still are here, with us who loved
You, here below.

Could you but know
How charges that you left seem precious now as rarest gold,
How words of yours inspire us, as we each day unfold,
Perhaps you still would answer in the words Christ spake of old—
"God willed it so!"

THE CITY OF GOD.

By the late Rev. Arthur Harvie.

On March 26, the Sunday preceding his death, the Rev. A. Harvie delivered at Kettering-road Church, Northampton, a sermon on this subject, from which we give the following extracts. They afford a memorable illustration of his intensely practical gospel. After referring to difference between the actual Jerusalem and the ideal cherished in Hebrew poetry and tradition, he pointed to Augustine's vision of the "City of God," and that prophetic dream of a new Jerusalem, in the midst of which God shall truly "dwell."

Men (said the preacher) have waited and yearned for that City as though it should descend from heaven, or they ascend into it; it has been a vision that has enabled men to endure hardship and failure, it has comforted them when material forces seemed too strong, it has made them bold when the powers of evil were riding over the earth. Beautiful vision! City that may be born a million years hence, or in some other world—golden streets, jewelled walls, full of the radiance of God, we suspect that the glory glinting from thy towers through dazzling brightness of thy crystal gates has so affected some men's eyes that they have passed unnoticed the dirty lanes of their native town, while the music of the heavenly Zion has for not a few drowned the hideous nightly discords of an earthly metropolis.

It is by no means clear which is worse, to see a City of God far away in some distant past, resting there as type of another and a greater that shall one day be established, or to have no vision at all, to keep the two terms "City" and "God" separated by the distance between life and death, right and wrong; to believe that earth contains no holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High, and to imagine it folly to point to any town and say, "God is in the midst of her." The heart of the most prosaic leaps at the ideals, fast being turned into fact, of those who would solve some of our problems by founding model cities, model in their provision for physical welfare, golden because they afford to every dweller due share of light and sky and earth, Bournville and Port Sunlight, the Garden City, and various communities in America and on the Continent are New Jerusalems indeed, a thousand times more worthy our hymns than are the memories of the bloodstained stronghold of the Jebusites, better subjects of prayer and thanksgiving than any Zion of the next world, where there are no lungs to be diseased by foul air, or eyes to be starved for lack of beauty. The drawing of fresh political boundaries upon the maps of Europe and Asia are probably events fraught with less consequence to mankind than the commencement of some of the enterprises to restore to men and women natural and wholesome surroundings. Whether the words of the Psalmist, "A river the streams whereof make glad the City of God, God is in the midst of her," can be applied to ancient Jerusalem depends largely upon our historical knowledge and our enthusiasm for Judaism. Whether we can apply them to the model towns already mentioned depends upon our prophetic insight; whether or not we can and do apply them to Northampton or the town in which we live depends entirely upon the amount of religion we possess and whether our God is a God of the dead or of the living. If this is not the city of God, then there is no town that answers to that description; if we cannot say of this place "God is in the midst of her," then the earth has become a tomb, and we are but mouldering to decay. Because men foolishly have shut out loveliness from many of their dwelling places, because they have made nature an exile, and devised streets and houses which are hideous with an ugliness unknown in the earth elsewhere, the saying "God made the country, but man made the town" has taken hold as though it were a veritable word of Scripture. It is full of untruth, and every day we can demonstrate its inherent falseness. There is nothing divine about most of our dwelling places, it is true; some of them are not only inartistic, unnatural, but cursed with the spirit of pretence, ridden through with artificiality, and so degrading to all true life and true religion; but the supreme ugliness of towns is here and there relieved; our gardens front and back express our faith, and God speaks to us from many a bush in a suburban shrubbery as well as on the mountain side. Our streets are redeemed from their ungracious monotony by trees whose glorious nonconformity makes ridicule of our brick boxes with their hard, unalterable lines. Public buildings are part of town life, and, if they are really noble and worthy, testify the presence of God. Dignity—man's effort after the quiet strength he feels pressing ever close upon him—is manifested in some, grace and beauty in others: the stone bursts into flower, the aspiring minaret seeks the secret of the skies; these features of freedom, symbols of aims not wholly material, speak to all who have ears to hear of Him who trains the lark and builds the rose. Provision for the recreation of those who cannot seek the remoter fields is amply made. To see the joy of the children as they come in contact with the life of the fields in even that curtailed form which our parks and open spaces allow, to reflect that this is possible only by the combined sacrifices of the community, to know that there are many who do not grudge rates levied for the provision of physical and educational advantages of the whole community, but especially of the poorer classes, is to know that the spirit of self-sacrifice dwells in the town, to realise that "God is in the midst of her." Mere externals are the least. Beauty there may be to some small extent, provision for those unable to purchase many of life's advantages may be generously made, the town may have historic associations which still inspire and make her citizens noble despite the dulness of their days, but these are not sufficient. It is the people who make the town, and it is because of them we say "God is in the midst of her." There can be, there ought to be, something divine about each one of us as simple citizens, voters, ratepayers. Soon we shall be able, perhaps, to delight in our relations as employers and employed, shopkeeper and customer, but beyond all these remains the simple individual life with its ever-multiplying influences. The town may be your place of business, but first of all it is the place of your friends. Poor are you, indeed, if there are not for you sacred houses here, shrines, abodes of peace, and temples of love and joy. There is no poetry in your soul if there be not some path holy to you because of steps that have trod thereon. Oh, the good men and good women of this place, the teachers, the friends, the public men of the present as well as the past! At the call of need how many charitable deeds are shown! Sound the alarm, and how many there are ready to fight for social justice, for liberty of opinion, for purity of government, for wholesomeness of civic life! We may differ in our various means, but there is many a "ten righteous" who can and will and do save this city. Consider for a moment the organised and the unorganised religious work going on from morning to night, and some of it all night, inspired solely of God and love of man. Has anyone calculated the voluntary rate the citizens are paying in order to maintain ministers and churches, missions, and asylums, charities and reform movements? If God were not in the midst of us, where would all these things be? Could we look each other in the face morning by morning if we cared nought else than that our streets be properly swept and our factories allowed to keep running? The miracles of order, forethought, and contrivance which a beehive exhibits constrains us to say even of such a community "God is in the midst of her." How much more, then, of such a town as this, where to industry is added love, to orderliness is added reverence, to strength is added somewhat of grace, to all is added religion. Shall it not be said, "It is the city of God?" The realisation of the divine presence here in our community will make that very gladness for which so many long. It is the absence of that conviction from some hearts that turns the town into a place for getting a living, and makes of the community not a fellowship but a horde. To feel that in every street there is a vivid manifestation of God, and then to mass together as best we are able the whole utterance that the town sets forth, all the nobility, the unselfishness, the beauty, the truth, the purity, the holiness, the love, is to make us rejoice in an enduring safeguarding presence, a river whose arms encircling the place make glad the city of God. We will not hide from ourselves the thought of whatever wickedness and falseness is contained within our boundaries, we shall be bolder to help remove it when we look upon it as a pollution not to be endured where so many holy places abound. This is not a great town, as the metropolis and the large mercantile centres are considered, but it may be great in the best sense.

"Where the city of the faithfullest friends stands,
Where the city of the cleanliness of the sexes stands,
Where the city of the healthiest fathers stands,
Where the city of the best-bodied mothers stands,
There the great city stands."

A great city is that which has the greatest men and women; if it be a few ragged huts it is still the greatest city in the whole world. "God is in the midst of her, she shall never be moved."

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

The annual meeting of the Manchester Domestic Mission was held on Wednesday, March 22nd, 1905, in the Lord Mayor's parlour, Town Hall, Manchester. In the unavoidable absence of the Lord Mayor, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal took the chair. The annual report presented was the seventy-first in the history of the Mission. It is an extremely interesting publication, and it is a record of an astonishing amount of good work done amongst the poor. The Mission is one of the oldest of the Manchester societies whose purpose it is to brighten and uplift the lives of the poorest citizens. The Committee feel that, in view of the many agencies of a religious and social character that now call upon the public for support and service, there is a real danger that our older Society may suffer in the press of competing claims. It endeavours to accomplish a kind of work that arouses no sectarian antipathies, and that is calculated to stir up all those deeper sympathies that join men together in a common brotherhood. The report draws special attention to an appeal for £3,500, urgently required for extension of premises at Willert-street and Renshaw-street, to liquidate a debt of £350 on income and expenditure account, and to secure the society against the recurrence of such a deficit for the next few years. A smaller scheme of class-room extension has already been proceeded with at Renshaw-street to meet pressing needs. This was made possible by the generosity of an anonymous donor, since deceased, but the response of the general public has thus far been inadequate. The fact is, this Mission demands, and is entitled to, a much more liberal and generous financial assistance than is at present accorded to it. One would think it should be a source of real humiliation to realise that such an organisation, though exercising the strictest economy, cannot meet its year's expenditure by £158, nor raise the small sum of £3,500 (£1,500 of which has already been subscribed anonymously) for extensions which the splendid growth of its work and responsibility absolutely demand. The report records with deep regret the deaths of several of its old and much-respected subscribers; but it makes special mention of the late Mrs. James Worthington, and of the grievous loss which the society has sustained by her death. "Mrs. Worthington's interest in the work of the Missions extended over many years, and was unabated to the end. As long as she was able she took a personal share in their operations, and year by year she welcomed the Mission workers and Sunday scholars to Sale Lodge. Without her steady support and generous help—help frequently renewed for special purposes, and repeated within a short time of her death—the work of the Missions could not have been maintained and extended, and their premises enlarged, as they have been. The committee are thankful for the treasured memories which Mrs. Worthington's life and Christian example leave with them."

The missionaries' reports are inspiring reading, and they indicate a very remarkable amount and variety of work done. The Sunday-school at Willert-street numbers 600 scholors; and more are anxious to join, but at present there is not sufficient room. From one year's end to another something is being organised for the benefit of tired mothers or starving families or sick children or for the reclamation of the vicious and sinful. What is said of one Mission may also be said generally of the other. The needs of each locality are somewhat different in detail, and so necessarily is the work; but both Missions are as busy as hives, and their usefulness is only limited by the inadequacy of the support rendered.

A resolution adopting the report and sympathising with the missionaries in their work, was moved by the Rev. Dr. James Drummond, who said he did not speak as an expert, but as a friendly outsider and onlooker, to encourage those actually engaged in the work. He congratulated the society on the growth of its work. He referred to the original idea of mission work, that of home visitation, which naturally a missionary could say little about in his report. The work of ministering to the spiritual needs of others in the home was fundamental in the labours of the missionary. A great variety of social and religious work had grown out of early beginnings, and it needed much encouragement and help. The influence of one cultured man or woman was of untold importance, especially in preventive work amongst the young. The missionaries see from personal observation how the poor live, whose sad condition was fortunately attracting increasing attention. The missionaries were preparing the way, without which change in material conditions would be abortive.

Mr. Richard Robinson seconded.

The Rev. J. W. Bishop, in responding, referred to the work carried on in the crowded Mission rooms, both educational and preventive work. His activity had been much increased during the winter by the pressure of the unemployed question and consequent poverty. He had, as usual, done a great deal of visiting, which had been rendered very exacting by the unusual amount of poverty and sickness.

The Rev. A. W. Timmis also responded, and said that though they hoped for the day when there would be no more poverty, his work was meantime to help the poor to live as well as possible in their present conditions.

The committee and officers were appointed on the motion of Mr. T. Worthington, seconded by the Rev. A. L. Smith; and a resolution of thanks to the Lord Mayor and others was moved by the Rev. Dendy Agate, and seconded by Mr. P. H. Leigh.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

You have heard that among the Roman Catholics there are men and women called monks and nuns, who go apart and live in monasteries and convents, thinking that so they can best live a religious life, and be free from temptations which they find in the world outside; and there they gives themselves up to prayer and fasting, visiting the poor and sick outside, teaching children, and other good works. They want above all things to be like Jesus; but they forget that Jesus did not shut himself up, but lived amongst his fellow men and women, and faced all the trials and temptations which are around us in the outside world. Amongst these monks were some who thought continually of all that Jesus suffered in his last days, and in the terrible time when he was crucified, of his hands and feet pierced with the nails, and of the spear wound given him by a cruel soldier as he hung upon the cross; and some of them thought that if they prayed earnestly enough to be made like Jesus, they might get the very same marks on their hands and feet and side which Jesus had on his, from the death to which he was put, out of pure sympathy with Jesus.

There was a monk named Bernard, who was so holy and good that he was afterwards called Saint Bernard. He prayed again and again that he might receive these marks in his hands and feet and side, and so be very like Jesus. But his prayer had never been answered; and one day, after praying again for what he so longed for, he had a vision. He thought he saw Jesus, and that Jesus told him that this great wish of his could not be granted, and that these marks would not be given to him; but that when the body of Jesus was taken down from the cross there was found one wound which had been forgotten, a bruise on the shoulder, which came from carrying his cross. And in the vision Jesus told Bernard that he might gain that wound; but not by only praying for it, but by taking up and bearing his own cross every day.

To be crucified was, amongst the Jews, the most shameful death to which a criminal could be put, and as if in mockery of their shame and misery they were often obliged to carry their own cross to the place of death. As Jesus went to his death he was made to carry his own cross, and it was thus that in the story of St. Bernard he is supposed to have got the bruise on his shoulder. In that story Jesus is made to tell Bernard that he might get that bruise also, but only by carrying his own cross—not by thinking of that of Jesus.

What does the story mean? Was Bernard to have a cross to carry, and to carry it daily, as Jesus said?

In the gospel story Jesus said to his disciples the same thing. "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."

What did he mean? for surely every man does not have a cross to bear? The answer is partly found in those other words of Jesus, "let him deny himself."

To deny yourself is to give up something you wish for the sake of something else which is right or kind, or better in some way than what you like. A poor man when he has earned some money, after being out of work, would like to go into the country for a sight of the trees and sky; or he would like a new suit of clothes instead of his rags; but he has to deny himself, because the children must go to school, and must have boots and clothes bought to make them tidy, first. So he denies himself daily, and it is a sorrow to him to be so poor; but he is a sober, honest man, and it is his misfortune and not his fault, so he bears his trouble bravely; and that is his cross that he bears daily. He tries to be merry and cheerful when he goes home, though he is tired and ragged, and there is not much for supper; and before he goes to bed he puts his old coat over the children, as they have not many blankets. And the children are happy and merry because they have kind parents, and they do not know the burden which their parents bear—the cross of their painful poverty.

When the martyrs steadfastly walked to the fire that was to burn them, because they would not be untrue to their religion and their God, they took up and bore their heavy cross gladly.

But many smaller troubles than these come to all of us, and they are all of them "crosses" to be borne; and though some of them may leave us bruised and hurt, still God gives us strength to bear them.

In the story of the "Crofton Boys"* the great longing of the active little boy Hugh was to be a soldier. But at school an accident happened to him, one snowy day the boys wanted him to gather snow to make a snow man, but he was very busy working at something in the house, and to get out of the boy's way he got on to the playground wall. The boys pulled him down, and in doing so down came a heavy stone, which fell on Hugh's foot, and he was so injured that he had to lose his foot. When he heard this he was very good, and determined to be brave; it was very terrible to him, but he knew it was quite as terrible to his mother, who held his hand whilst it was being done. He did not cry out or make any noise, though he was quite a little boy, and though the pain was terrible; he only squeezed his mother's hand very tight, and asked her once if she thought God would be angry with him for crying a little. Afterwards he had to lie still for a long while till he got well; and one day his mother found him crying. Poor Hugh found that he had a cross to bear, and a very heavy one; for he could never be a soldier now! But he was a brave little boy, and after a talk with his mother he faced his trouble bravely; he did not fret and worry everyone; he learned to run about fast on his crutches, and did his best, though he was always lame and could never be a soldier.

Children, could you bear cheerfully such crosses? Could you deny yourselves grumbling, and troubling others with your trouble?

Yes, if you loved God enough to wish to follow Jesus and be like him, you would have strength to take up your cross daily and follow him. Some of the people whose lot seems to us the saddest, are amongst the brightest and most delightful that we know; because they have accepted their lot, as given them by God, and are too unselfish to mar others' happiness with their trouble. I can tell you some more stories about this another time.

A WORD FROM THE PRESIDENT.

In the few and simple, but impressive remarks offered to the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association last week by the President (the Right Hon. William Kenrick), he drew attention to a serious defect that is apt to creep in among the habits of Unitarians. Devoted as they often are to public work, there is a disposition at times to neglect public worship. The President honestly confessed that in the course of his busy, and, we may add, his widely beneficial, life, he had sometimes been led to think of his public duties as taking the first place. But experience has led him to a conclusion which deserves to be emphasised. However earnest men may be in the service of the community, however deeply engrossed in the problems of practical life, "it would be better for themselves and their work," said the President, if they maintained the habit of worship. We would fain trust that a word so gravely spoken will be laid to heart.

There are, we are glad to know, many men and women in our Unitarian circle who do take a full share of public duty. Their labours cover a wide field, ranging from the organisation of the lowlier benevolent agencies to the highest offices of the State. Now, it is the tritest of commonplaces among us to say that these works do not stand apart from religion, but in them our religion finds embodiment. The thing to be guarded against is absorption in them to such a degree that we miss their highest purposes. Just as the artist stands back a pace or two in order the better to judge of his painting, so the social and political worker does well when leaving his work awhile he withdraws into the serener atmosphere, the clearer light, and nourishes his high purpose in the sanctuary. Such, at least, is the deliberate judgment of that wise counsellor whose words we have quoted. Can we doubt that he is right?

We may profitably contemplate the nation's spiritual "budget" at this moment when the Chancellor of the Exchequer is about to tell us the state of the national finances. He, it is true, can set down his total in plain figures, while we in our inquiry can only judge broadly as we survey the national life. Nevertheless, we may reasonably and usefully estimate the position by asking a few questions. Are we as a nation increasing or diminishing our stock of great and generous ideas? Is our Press a true representation of the sentiments cherished by our people? Do our politicians summon us to noble or ignoble aims? Is commerce lightened by honesty of method, and industry dignified by mutual care and service? The machinery of charity runs on, but are we conscious of a steady current of philanthropic feeling that neither languishes nor indulges in spasms and extremes? Our answers to such questions are dependent no doubt on our experience, but limited at the best; and we must beware of undue depression fully as much as of undue elation and confidence. But, speaking soberly, and remembering the course of things during the last ten years, it must be admitted that a tone is too often missing that we should wish to hear. It may be that "offences must come," The millennium is not to-morrow nor the day after. But the worst woe has come if we cease to long, even with passion, for dawn of the better day. For our part, we believe that the fires of that noble passion are as real in the bosom of the nation as ever. The tricks of shifty politicians, the stratagems of unscrupulous financiers, and the prostitutions of journalism, do not represent the deeper life of the people. They are there because that deeper life has not manifested itself as it should. When the host of public workers, who in their hearts are ashamed of much that they have to wink at, take courage and speak out as they ought to do, signs of improvement will speedily arise. And the courage that they need can nowhere be so truly fostered as in the sought and felt presence of that Eternal One in whom alone is might, and that the might of Righteousness. "Better for themselves and their work"—aye, better for every man and his work, be it public or private, to purge the vision by the light of that presence, to discern the true values of things, to learn what is worth living for, and to drink in of the purer inspiration.

The busy man may say his minister does not help much in these directions. But again, if he helped the minister more the minister might better help him. "Whoso is wise will consider these things."

ON THE WINGS OF DELIGHT.

Through Tyrol to Italy.

These are the notes of an Editor broken loose. There was one who spoke the magic word Italy, and every obstacle was cleared away. She, our dear Lady Bountiful, the fairy godmother who is giving us these four weeks and more of a great delight, had gone before us, by way of some of the beautiful old cities of South Germany, and most of our party travelled straight through to Munich and found her waiting for us there. By Dover and Ostend, and then a through carriage for Munich, with half an hour of sunshine at Cologne for a glimpse of the Cathedral, and after the journey up the Rhine, a most fascinating stage from Aschaffenburg to Würzburg, through the richly-wooded hill country of the Spessart, and along the valley of the Main,—so we came, leaving Charing Cross on Monday evening, March 20, and being in Munich at 11.20 the following evening.

Two days in Munich, with its rich art treasures, was a welcome preparation for what we were to find in Italy. Among the pictures in the Old Pinakothek it was good to see the strong and earnest piety and the noble power of the German, Dutch, and Flemish masters,—the fascinating picture of "St. Luke painting a portrait of the Virgin," by Rogier van der Weyden, a number of Holbeins and Dürers, and many others, and then to pass into the Italian rooms, so full of sunshine and exquisite beauty, to Perugino's "Virgin appearing to St. Bernard," Raphael's "Holy Family" (of the Caniziani family), Francia's "Madonna in a Bower of Roses," and the like.

Then a wonderful journey, by Innsbruck, up the Brenner Pass, into the snow still lying on the track, and down to Botzen, all the way among the great hills, with the astonishing crags of the Dolomites, and the upper slopes all glistening in the snow. From Botzen next day down to Riva, through Trent, Mori, and Arco, brought us to the head of Lake Garda. There one felt almost in Italy among the palms and olives, and on Sunday morning, March 26, three of us looked down from the terrace by the ruined old watch-tower, which dominates the little town, and marvelled that the broad expanse of the lake could have such colours, with the great snow-clad sentinels standing round. That afternoon we went by the little steamer down the whole length of the lake, some thirty-four miles, with various calls at picturesque stations on the way, one of the last, after Salo, being at Sirmione (the Sirmio of Catullus), and at Desenzano some of us for the first time set foot on Italian soil. That was an ideal way by which to enter Italy, and in the evening light the quiet lake, with its distant hills to the north, was transfigured in an exquisite beauty beyond the power of words to describe. That night we slept in Verona.

We were bound for Venice, but first were to see Asolo, Browning's Asolo, on the way. Monday morning we were out betimes, rejoicing in the clear sunshine, as we saw the great sights of Verona, the picturesque market square, once the ancient forum of the city, and the noble tower of the Municipio, the other buildings and piazzas, sacred to the memory of the Scaligers and of Dante's exile, the tombs of the Scaligers by the little church of Santa Maria Antica, San Zeno Maggiore, "the finest Romanesque building in North Italy," with its great treasure, Mantegna's picture of the Madonna and saints on the wall behind the high altar, the Amphitheatre, built in the time of Diocletian, about 290 A.D., so perfectly preserved, from the upper walls of which one overlooked the whole city, the statue of Paul Veronese and the fine Gothic church of Sant' Anastasia. Then it was time to make for the station and our mid-day train for Castelfranco Veneto, which we reached early enough to see the beautiful Madonna of Giorgione in the cathedral, and thoroughly to enjoy the quaintness of the little town, within its four-square walls, and the broader roads beyond the moat, with one primitive, curious old inn, and the statue of the young Giorgione, who was a native of the place.

Tuesday, March 28, was a great day for us. At eight o'clock, when our two carriages rumbled out from the courtyard of the inn, the broad road was already crowded with country people come in for the market, and we met many more on the way. The morning was somewhat overcast, and for a long drive it was pleasanter so, and less fatiguing, than in the glare of brilliant sunshine on the roads. From Castelfranco to Asolo our way was due north, and all the way the distant Alps were in front of us, their snows lighted by the morning sun, while the clouds overshadowed us. The road, for the most part, was perfectly straight, through the well-cultivated plain, with broad fields of rice or maize or other things, and often rows of mulberry trees, and the vines trained in between. The roadside avenue seemed to be sometimes mulberry, sometimes willow, but there was as yet little sign of leaf upon the trees. In less than half an hour from Castelfranco we had our first glimpse of Asolo in the distance, the ruined castle of Catharine Cornaro, the widow of a fifteenth century king of Cyprus and Jerusalem, crowning its hill. Ten minutes later we drove through Riesi, the birthplace (on June 2, 1835) of Giuseppe Sarto, formerly Patriarch of Venice, now the Pope, Pius X. A tablet on the little two-storied house records the fact, and close by, on the same side of the road, is a somewhat larger house, an inn, which is kept by the Pope's sister, at the sign of "The Two Swords." The pleasant-looking old lady stood at the door as we drew up for a moment in front of the other house, but disappeared when she noticed that we were talking of her and her brother.

At nine o'clock we reached San Vito di Asolo, some four miles distant from the object of our pilgrimage, and from this point the road grew more and more charming. The banks were often bright with primroses, and we seemed, for the moment, in the midst of an English spring. There were endless violets on the roadside, between the trees; and then among the flowers one of our party, who had been in Rome, noticed blue as well as our familiar white wood anemones, and abundance of blue hepatica.

Now we saw Asolo itself, drawing nearer and nearer, not only the ruined castle, but the white campanile of the church, with its cupola, another more massive tower, and the picturesque grouping of of its houses, in the hollow and crowning the lower hill, and stretching along the southern slopes. The northern side of the town we had not time to see. Soon we were so near that the distant Alps, which so beautifully dominate the lower range of hills on which Asolo is perched, had disappeared, and we looked up at the little town, with the loftier height of its castle on the right, and the green meadows sloping down to the plains below. In the trees and gardens and hedgerows we could see how perfectly lovely it would be when spring was more fully come, and as we climbed the hill we thought of Pippa and her innocent delight, and all the memories of Browning that cluster round the place. For the last steep climb the men of the party walked, while the carriages took a somewhat longer road of easier incline, and then we entered the quaint little town, and looked for someone to direct us to Browning's house. At first there was a little confusion, because there are two houses in Asolo, one called on a picture postcard the "Torricella Browning," the house which the poet built for his son, the other Mrs. Bronson's house, where he himself so often stayed—the Mrs. Bronson to whom his last book, "Asolando," is dedicated. This was the house we really wished to see, and at last we found it, and found that we had passed the door as we came up into the town.

Miss Bronson was away, but by great good fortune we found that the servants in charge had been long there—the man had often waited upon Browning—and they were very good in showing us what we wished to see. Quite apart from the warm friendship which drew him to that house one can quite understand how Browning loved the place. On more than one side there is a glorious view over the broad plain to the south, and on the north-west over the low hills of Asolo to the great range of the Alps. We were privileged to stand upon the balcony, looking down across the garden to the distant view, and on another side to look across to the hillside opposite, and the old tower, which took the poet's fancy, so that he bought it and built the house there for his son. We saw the rooms, with familiar pictures on the walls, and the table at which Browning used to write, and the room in which he slept. Our time in Asolo was all too short, but it is a golden memory that we have been there.

A drive of an hour and forty minutes had brought us from Castelfranco to Asolo. Thence to Cornuto, by a road skirting the hills, eastward, in something over an hour, brought us to the railway again, to the station just beyond Montebelluna, and so we travelled southward through Treviso to Venice.

But what can one write of Venice? We arrived early in the afternoon, and the mere passage from the station by gondola to our hotel on the Grand Canal, looking across to the church of S. Maria della Salute, for those who came to Venice for the first time, was like the entrance into an enchanted world. You should have seen Giovanni, the stalwart gondolier, on the steps by the station and his delighted greeting of our Lady Bountiful, for she was here last year as well, and he served her then. He and his mate are the finest men we have yet seen among the gondoliers, and he doffed his hat and kissed her hand with the unaffected grace of a true-hearted gentleman.

Later in the afternoon we were out again in the gondola, and saw the splendid front of the Palace of the Doges, and then passing under the Bridge of Sighs came by devious ways past the noble equestrian statue of Colleoni, out into the open Lagoon, and then round to the north and back into the Grand Canal, under the Bridge of the Rialto, home. The delicious motion of the gondola, the passage through the streets, which are waterways, without noise and without dust, the wonderful skill and grace of the men, the fascination of the beautiful buildings, all these were much, and more than enough for our long dream of delight, yet best of all perhaps was the marvellous light over the great expanse of the waters in the Lagoon, with here and there a bright coloured sail, and far away to the north the long line of the snowy Alps. This we saw even more perfectly on the following morning, when the gondola took us to Torcello, the island some miles away, where the earliest settlement is said to have been made, out of which Venice grew, and where two old churches still remain, monuments of very early Christian art. But even on that first day of our coming to Venice the cup of our happiness was not yet full, for on landing for the second time we walked out from the back of our hotel, to the Piazza of St. Mark, and had our first sight of the splendid front of San Marco just as the evening sun was lighting up its pinnacles, and the rich colours of the mosaics in the upper arches, which no picture can reproduce. We saw it again after dark, against a clear sky, and every visit deepens the impression. We are here in Venice until Monday, April 3, and are then to go on to Florence for a week.

Venice, March 30.

What then do we mean, when we pray for forgiveness? Do we ask for an escape from the proper penalties of sin? Having sown the mortal poison, do we hope to gather the immortal fruit? Is this the meaning of the cry of Christendom for "Salvation"? No! for this would be only the shriek of terrified selfishness; and would be no expression of the true sorrow for sin. The first prayer of the genuine penitent is, not for deliverance from his load, but for strength to bear it all: his first fear is lest it should be too light or slip away, and leave the balances of righteousness unadjusted and in disorder: and did the mercy of others shield and spare him, all the more would he seek the expiation of sorrow and denial within himself.—James Martineau.

THE MARTINEAU CENTENARY.

Dr. Martineau's Relation to Idealist Theories of Ethics and Religion.

II.

Dr. John Watson's admirable appreciation of James Martineau in the Hibbert Journal for January, 1903, thus accurately indicates Dr. Martineau's chief service to ethical and religious thought :—"Everyone who is interested in religion "and morals must be thankful that, as "between the two schools of Hegel and "Lotze, Martineau for more than half a "century was the antagonist of necessity, "and in our country the most powerful "defender of personality. And he was "profoundly convinced that morals and "religion were both affected by the issue, "since the ethics of necessity can only "tell us 'what has been, what is, and "what probably will be,' but the ethics "of free-will 'what ought to be,' and that "moral freedom is the condition of the "'highest and deepest spiritual communion "between God and the soul.'" Dr. Watson here represents, we believe, the present dominant opinion in the Christian world ; for the days of Calvinism are passing away ; and a firm belief in man's possession of true freedom of moral choice characterises almost everywhere the pulpit utterances of the present day.

But while Dr. Martineau's writings, and especially his elaborate and powerful defence of the freedom of the will, are working mightily for good in the sphere of religious thought, it is evident that a very different conception of "moral freedom" has been, and still is to a great extent prevalent in most of our British universities. In the view of the Absolute Idealists, or Hegelians, it is not possible or conceivable that any phenomena, physical or psychical, should have been in the slightest degree different from what they have been ; every feature in the history of the human race, and in the moral character of individuals, has been, and is, wholly inevitable. Now Spinoza also arrived at the conviction that none of our moral decisions are attended by true freedom of choice between possible alternatives ; but the remarkable difference between the earlier Pantheist and the recent Hegelian Pantheist is that while the former consistently maintains that since man has no power of free choice, all such sentiments as repentance and remorse are entirely irrational and unjustifiable, the latter while admitting that none of our so-called sins could have been left undone, nevertheless contends that we are reasonably required to feel "shame and remorse"* for the commission of them. This association of the sentiment of self-condemnation with an entirely deterministic view of human conduct appeared to Dr. Martineau as it did to Coleridge, to be a mere verbal conjunction of essentially incompatible ideas. To him it seemed self-evident that when the power of free choice between alternatives vanishes all real moral responsibility vanishes with it ; and it was his firm conviction that if it were possible, which he greatly doubted, for Hegelian views on man's character and conduct to receive general assent, the bases both of public morals and of religious faith would be seriously undermined.

There is, we believe, no more valuable feature in Martineau's profound analysis of the moral consciousness than that in which he distinguishes between a man's permanent Causal Self and the character which that self has either inherited or fashioned in the course of its history. It is our special character at any time which determines the nature of our temptations, but in every moral crisis we are conscious that our true self rises above our formed character, that we can envisage the several motives or influences which are conflicting within us, estimate their relative moral worth, and by our own free causality, exercised in the way of volitional attention, largely determine whether the mean or the noble elements in our characters shall realise themselves in our personal activity. It is not to the character, but to the self which has the character that the decision for which we are responsible is due.

"Is there not," asks Dr. Martineau, "a causal self, over and above the caused self, or rather the caused state and contents of the self left as a deposit from previous behaviour ? Is there not a judging self, that knows and weighs the competing motives over and above the agitated self that feels them ?" To this question the Hegelian can give only a negative reply, for his philosophical system leaves no room for the possible existence of a "causal self." His whole speculation is built upon what Martineau regarded as the erroneous side of Kant's two-sided philosophy. It is built upon the Humian or Kantian conception of causation as simply a relation among phenomena. In this system there are no noümena, no metaphysical causes ; there is but the one eternal noümenon, God, of whose universal life or thought the human soul is a limited mode or phase. If, then, you ask the Hegelian to explain to you the true cause of a moral decision he can refer you only to the psychical phenomena which preceded or attended it ; and it is evident that among these phenomena you can find nothing which can possibly exercise freedom of choice between alternatives.

The powerful attraction which Hegelianism possesses for thinkers of a predominantly intellectual turn consists chiefly in this, that it represents all reality as potentially comprehensible by the human intellect. Man is a reproduction or limited phase of the creative thought of which the universe is the objective expression. By the study, then, of cosmical phenomena and the discovery of the rational relations which link phenomena together into an intelligible unity, the human intellect (it is assumed) is on its way to attain an exhaustive knowledge of all that really exists ; a knowledge not only of physical and psychical phenomena, but also of all the causes to the action of which these phenomena are due.
